Foreword.

This sixteenth volume of the complete writings of Luther brings the continuation of the Documente zur Reformationgeschichte from 1525 to 1537 in six chapters. The tenth deals with the peasant revolt and the death of Prince Frederick; the eleventh with the imperial congresses held in the years 1525 to 1529 in Augsburg, Speier, Esslingen, Regensburg and again in Speier; the twelfth with several alliances of papal princes against the confessors of the Protestant doctrine, and with the conventions of the Protestant princes and estates in Torgau, Rodach, Schleiz, Schwabach, Schmalkalden and Nuremberg; the thirteenth on the Imperial Diet of Augsburg in 1530 and the confession handed down at the same, also on Luther's stay at Coburg during the Diet; the fourteenth on the meetings of the Protestants at Schmalkalden and the so-called Schmalkaldic League, also on the first religious peace concluded thereafter; the fifteenth on the negotiations held between the imperial and papal envoys on the one hand and the Protestant estates on the other.

because of a concilium to be called. It should also be mentioned here that three confessional writings of our church, namely the Augsburg Confession, its Apology and the Schmalkaldic Articles, have been printed in this volume in their entirety and revised according to J. T. Müller, "Die symbolischen Bücher" ("The Symbolic Books"), and that several of Luther's main writings, as "Von den Conciliis und Kirchen" ("On the Conciliates and Churches"), are found in this volume.

We have omitted the duplicates of the old edition, namely No. 802, which belongs to an earlier section, and is already included in the 15th volume, Col. 2291; No. 1074, because duplicate of No. 12 in the appendix of this volume, and appendix No. 16, because duplicate of No. 1103. As worthless we have omitted what is offered to us in No. 826 of the old edition. This is a small collection of sentences and individual expressions which Aurifaber claims to be an extract made by Spalatin from the first sheet of Luther's intended rebuttal against the Mainz Council. For this we have taken the whole writing, as far as inserted. Torn apart is united, as, No. 999 is brought after No. 1073, No. 1013 after No. 1011. Several time determinations are partly completed, partly corrected, as at No.801. 804. 854(11.). 877. 953. 978. 1004. 1073. 1075. 1165 and 1185. A large number of writings are improved after the originals, e. g. No.773. 782. 890. 891. 894. 895. 897. 910. 911. 912. 922. 923. 942 and others. The letters written by Luther in Latin are newly translated from Latin, as well as some other writings, as No. 902 and 904.

In the old edition, we often encounter Walch's distortions of meaning in print and other errors, some of which run through all previous editions. An outstanding example of this kind is found in No. 1247, § 135 (Col. 2706 f. of the old edition; also still in the second edition of the Erlangen edition, Vol. 25, p. 354): "One can see that this Concilium [at Nicaea] neither conceived nor established anything new, but condemned the old faith against the new error of Arii through the holy Scriptures. Here, without changing the least thing, the right sense could be established by transposing a few words, namely, thus: "It is well seen that this Concilium has neither conceived nor established anything new, but has condemned the new error of Arii against the old faith by the holy Scriptures." Of other errors we give here only a selection. It is found in Walch, Col. 26: set instead of estimate; 28" measure - never; 40 envy - children; 49 given - admit; 52 use - irritate; idiä. Waare - delusion; 53 divine - amicable; 93 because-will; 98 dead - dead; 142 thou - there; 183 their friends - their benefices; 183 the old lovers - lapsed; 205 judge-rich; 336 mandate - month; 350 getheilt - geurtheilt; 398 undue - and due; 405 have - half; 408 rightly - rightly; 443 would be someone - who someone; 762 Barcelona - Bononia; 764 with - nit; 793 Chemnitzer - Zwickauer; 943 Speier-Steier[mark]; 944 grunzet - grenzet; 1053 Palmen - Psalmen; 1078 if.- wem; 1097 Stengler - Spengler; 1115 Freude - friends; 1123 Bösem - bosom; 1171 Nun - None [9. 1) For the sake of brevity, we leave the word "Columne" before the numbers and the colon after them, and put a dash (-) for "instead".

scatter - shout; 2383 Eßdram - Heraklam; 2386 aus - without; 2436 unbetrüglich - fraudulent; 2764 zu antilogisiren - zerantilogisiren; 2829 Jenischen Boten - des Jonas (Jonensem) Boten. In this last error Walch has the excuse that De Wette also has the reading Jenensem. From this indication it is easy to see that one must often get into quite an embarrassment when reading Walch's old edition. Of course, we have not been able to make everything smooth, but we have done our best to smooth the way for the reader.

Also in this volume, as in the previous one, we have added a chronologically arranged index of Luther's documents, letters, and concerns.

May God also bless the course of this volume. We learn from the writings contained therein how wonderfully God has protected and preserved his church, which teaches and confesses his holy and pure word, against all the violence and attempts of the adversaries, however powerful they were and however evil they meant it. May he keep us in his truth until our blessed end, amen.

St. Louis, on Reformation Day, 1900.

762: D. M. Luther's warning letter to the council and the congregation of the city of Mühlhausen because of Münzer, who sneaked in there without being called.

Dat. Weimar, 21 August 1524.

The original, whose variants are given in the Erlanger Briefwechsel, IV, 377, is in the city archives of Mulhouse, but has not yet been used to correct this letter. First printed under the title: "Ein Sendbrief an die ersamen vnd weysen Herrn Burgermeyster, Rhatt vnd gantze Gemeyn der stadt Mülhausen. M. Luther. M.D. ZMijj. " 2 sheets in 4. Further in 1533 by Hans Lufft in Wittenberg, together with Luther's letter to the at Frankfurt am Main. Of the latter printing appeared a reprint by Friedr. Peypus in Nuremberg. In the collective editions: in the Wittenberg (1551), vol. II, p. 10; in the Jena (1585) vol. II, p. 440; in the Altenburg, vol. II, p. 789; in the Leipzig, vol. XIX, p. 235; in De Wette, vol. II, p. 536 and in the Erlangen, vol. 53, p. 253. On the determination of the time, see the last note to this writing.

To the honorable and wise mayor, council and entire community of the city of Mulhouse, my dear gentlemen and good friends.

Grace and peace in Christ our Saviour. Honourable, wise, dear Sirs! Good friends have asked me, after it has become known how one, called Magister Thomas Münzer, is willing to go to you in your city/) to advise you faithfully in this matter and to warn you of his teaching, which he praises highly from Christ's Spirit; which, as Christian loyalty and duty admonish me, I have not wanted to omit; I would also have been quite willing and inclined, because I am here outside 2) in the country, to ask you personally myself. But my business, in printing at Wittenberg, does not leave me further time nor space.

(2) Therefore pray, beware of this false spirit and prophet, which cometh in sheep's clothing, and is inwardly a ravening wolf [Matt. 7:15]. For in many places, especially in Zwickau and now in Allstädt, he has shown what kind of a tree he is, because he bears no other fruit than to commit murder and riot and shed blood, for which purpose he has come to the city of Zwickau.

1) Münzer had escaped from Allstädt by night shortly after August 3 and had already taken up residence in Mulhouse when Luther wrote this letter. This warning therefore came too late.

2) In the old printing: heraußen.

Allstädt preached, wrote and sang publicly. The Holy Spirit does not do much boasting, but does great things before he boasts. But this spirit has now boasted and raised itself up for three years, and yet it has not yet done a single thing, nor has it shown any fruit, except that it would gladly murder, as you may well know, both from Zwickau and Allstädt. Also he sends only countrymen, whom God hath not sent (for they cannot prove it), nor are called by men, but come ^) of themselves, and go not in at the door; wherefore they do also, as Christ saith of them, John 10:8, "All that came before me are thieves and murderers." Over this no man can make them come to the light, and stand to answer them, except they be of their own kind: he that heareth them, and followeth them, is called the elect son of God; he that heareth them not, must be ungodly, and want to kill him. How great a thing their doctrine is, there is much to be said, but it will soon come to pass.

003 But if my words will not move you, do so, and put off the matter with a delay, until ye know truly what manner of children they are. For it is begun, it shall not long remain in darkness. I am faithful to you, God knows that, and I will gladly forestall your journey and harm, if God wills it; I hope you will bear me good witness of this yourselves. For I can boast in Christ that I have never harmed anyone with my teaching and counsel, nor have I ever wanted to, as this spirit intends, but have been comforting and helpful to everyone, so that you have no just cause to despise this counsel of mine.

004 But if ye despise these things, and receive the prophet, and mischief cometh unto you therefrom, I am guiltless of your hurt, because I have warned you Christianly and kindly. Let an honorable council take him before them, even before the whole congregation (it may happen), and ask him who sent him here or called him to preach? The honorable council has not done so.

3) In the old print: to boast.

005 If then he say that God and his Spirit have sent him as the apostles, let him prove it by signs and wonders, or forbid him to preach: for where God would change the ordinance, he doeth miraculous signs every way. I have never preached nor wanted to preach where I have not been asked and called by men; for I cannot boast that God has sent me from heaven without means, as they do, and run themselves, though no one sends them nor calls them 1) (as Jeremiah (Cap. 23,21.) writes); therefore they do no good.

May God grant you His grace to faithfully recognize and accomplish His divine will, Amen. At Weimar, on Sunday (after) Assumptionis Norme (21 August),? ) ^ . nno 1524.

763 V. Mart. Luther's letter of July 1524 to the princes of Saxony concerning the spirit of sedition, in which he admonishes them to prevent it according to the power granted to them by God, otherwise they would not be excusable before God and the world.

This writing was published by Lucas Cranach in Wittenberg under the title: "Eyn brief an die Fürsten zu Sachsen von dem auffrurischen gehst. Martin Luther. Wittenberg. 1524." In addition, several more individual editions; the Erlangen correspondence lists five in all. In the collections: in the Wittenberg (1551), vol. II, p. 6; in the Jena (1585), vol. II, p. 441; in the Eisleben, vol. II, p. 223; in the Altenburg, vol. II, p. 790; in the Leipzig, vol. XIX, p. 236; in the Erlanger, vol. 53, p. 255; and in De Wette, vol. II, p. 538. Vincentius Obsopoeus translated this letter into Latin and included it in his larras spistolarum. Printed from it in the Wittenberg (1558), tom.VII, toi. 506, and in Aurifaber, vol. II, p. 223. - Obsopoeus and both the Latin and German Wittenberg editions give no date; all other editions have the wrong date: August 21, 1524. As early as August 3, Münzer, in a letter to the Churfürst Friedrich (Fürsteman, Neues Urkundenbuch,

1) In the old print: "loads".

2) The letter is written from Weimar, because Luther, prompted by the letter of the council and the congregation in Orlamünde of August 16, 1524 (St. Louiser Ausg., Vol. XV, No. 683), was on the journey there. In the editions this letter has the wrong date: "on Sunday Assumptionis Diarias, Vnno 1524", because in 1524 Assumptionis, August 15, was a Monday. This error has already been recognized several times-as by Grotefend, Chronologie, p. 39 and by Lingke, Reisegesch. Luthers, p. 147. It is to be read: post Assumptionis 2c. p. 248 a) of our writing as a mention already made against him, therefore it will have to be put into July. Seidemann-De Wette, vol. VI, p.580, dated: "Last half of July."

To the most illustrious, highborn princes and lords, Herr Frederick, Elector of the Roman Empire, and Johann, Duke of Saxony, Landgrave of Thuringia, and Margrave of Meissen, my most gracious lords.

Grace and peace in Christ Jesus our Saviour! The holy word of God is always fortunate, when it comes to pass that Satan opposes it with all his power: first, with his fist and with outrageous violence; where this does not help, he attacks it with a false tongue, with false spirits and teachers, so that, if he cannot restrain it by force, he may suppress it with elevation and lies. So he did in the beginning; when the gospel first came into the world, he attacked it mightily by the Jews and Gentiles, shedding much blood, and making Christendom full of martyrs. Since this did not help, he raised up false prophets and false spirits, and made the world full of heretics and sects, except for the pope, who even with vain sects and heresy, as befits the last and mightiest antichrist, has brought it to the ground.

002 So must it be now, that it may be seen how the righteous word of God is, because it goeth as it hath always gone. Then the pope, emperors, kings, and princes attack it with their fists, and want to suppress it by force; they condemn, revile, and persecute it unheard and unrecognized, as the foolish. But the verdict and our defiance have long since been pronounced, Ps. 2:1, 2, 4, 5: "Why do the nations rage, and the peoples write in vain? The kings of the earth are rebellious, and the princes contend with one another against the Lord and his anointed. But he that dwelleth in heaven mocketh them, and the LORD laugheth at them: then shall he speak to them in wrath, and they shall be afraid in fury." Surely it will be the same with our rulers who rage. And they will have it so: for they will neither see nor hear. God hath blinded and hardened them, that they should run to destruction. They have been sufficiently warned.

(3) Satan sees all this, and perceives that such raging will not penetrate; yea, he feels and senses that (as is the way of God's word) the more one presses it, the further it runs and increases; therefore he now also starts it with false spirits and sects. And we must consider this, and not be deceived; for it must be, as Paul says to the Corinthians (1 Corinthians 11:19), "There must be sects, that they which are approved may be made manifest."

4th Thus, after the exorcised Satan has now wandered for a year or three through arid places, seeking rest and not finding it [Luc. 11, 24.], he has settled in E. F. G. Fürstenthum and made a nest in Allstädt, and thinks to fight against us under our peace, shield, and protection. F. G. principality, and made a nest at Allstädt, and thinks to fight against us under our peace, shield, and protection. For Duke Georgen's principality, although it lies close by, is all too kind and gentle to such an intrepid, unconquerable spirit (as they boast) that they may not show such bold courage and defiance there; therefore he also cries out horribly and complains that he must suffer much, although no one has yet touched them with fist, mouth, or pen, and they themselves dream of a great cross that they are suffering. Satan must lie so easily and without cause, for he cannot hide himself.

005 Now this is a peculiar joy to me, that not ours have begun such a being, and they themselves also want to be praised, that they are not of our part, have neither learned nor received anything from us; but they come from heaven, and hear God himself speaking with them as with the angels; and it is a bad thing that one teaches the faith and love and cross of Christ at Wittenberg. God's voice (they say) you must hear yourself, and suffer God's work in you, and feel how heavy your pound is; it is nothing with the Scriptures; yes Bible, Bubel, Babel 2c.

006 If we should speak such words of them, their cross and suffering (I think) would be more precious than Christ's suffering, and would praise it more and more. So gladly would the poor spirit have the sufferings and cross of him praised, and yet might not suffer one to doubt or consider a little their heavenly voice and God's work, but want to have believed it by force, without hesitation; that I have neither read nor heard of a haughty, proud holy spirit (if it were). But now there is neither time nor space to judge their doctrine, which I have twice before well recognized and judged, and where it will be necessary, still well can and will judge by God's grace.

(7) I have given this letter to E. F. G. solely for the reason that I have heard, and also understood from her writing, as if the same spirit did not want to leave the matter in the word, but intended to enter into it with his fist, and wanted to set himself by force against the authorities, and therefore immediately cause a physical uproar. Here Satan has his mischief kicked; that is too much given in the day. What would the spirit do if he gained the followers of the mob? I heard it before from the same spirit here in Wittenberg, that he thinks this thing must be done with the sword. Then I thought it was intended that they would overthrow worldly authorities and be lords in the world themselves, when Christ denies this before Pilate and says (Jn 18:36): his kingdom is not of this world; and also teaches the disciples (Luc 22:25, 26): they should not be like worldly princes.

8) Although I now assure myself that E. F. G. will know how to behave in this matter better than I can advise, I am nevertheless obliged to do my part, and to humbly ask and exhort E. F. G. to have a serious understanding in this matter and, out of duty, to use proper force to ward off such mischief and to put an end to the riot. F. G. to have a serious understanding in this matter, and out of duty and obligation to use proper force to ward off such mischief, and to put an end to the uproar. For the authorities are well aware that their authority and temporal rule is given and commanded by God for the purpose of keeping the peace and punishing the unruly, as St. Paul teaches in Romans 13:4. Therefore, the authorities are not to sleep or delay here, for God will demand it and want an answer for such negligent use and seriousness of the commanded sword. Thus it would not be excusable before the people and the world, that E. F. G. should tolerate and suffer rebellious and free fists.

009 But whether they will pretend (as they do in fine words) that they are driven by the spirit, that it must be done, and that they must put their fists into it, I answer, First of all, it must be a bad spirit, which cannot prove its fruit otherwise than by breaking up churches and monasteries, and by burning the saints. Which the most wicked of men on earth might well do, especially where they are safe and without resistance. But I would think more of it if the spirit of Allstädt led to Dresden, or Berlin, or Ingolstadt, and stormed and broke monasteries there and burned saints.

010 Secondly, that they glory in the spirit is not true, for we have here St. John's saying [1 Ep. 4:1], that spirits ought first to be tried, whether they be of God. Now this spirit is not yet tested, but goes on with impetuosity, and rumbles according to its will. If it were good, it would let itself be tested first and judged humbly, as Christ's spirit does.

011 This would be a fine fruit of the spirit, by which he might be tried, if he would not thus crown himself in angles, and shun the light, but stand openly before his enemies and adversaries, and confess, and give answer. But the spirit of Allstädt avoids such things as the devil avoids the cross, and yet in the meantime he utters the most fearless words in his nest, as if he were full of three holy spirits, so that even such unskilful fame may be a fine indication of who the spirit is. For in his writing he claims that he wants to stand and answer publicly before a harmless congregation, but not in the corner before two or three, and that he has offered body and soul in the most free way. 2c.

012 Tell me, my beloved, who is that valiant and defiant holy spirit, that telleth himself so straitly, and willeth not but stand before a safe congregation? Item, he will not answer in the corner before two or three? What manner of spirit is this, that is afraid of two or three, and cannot bear a dangerous congregation? I will tell thee, he revengeth the roast; he is once or twice beaten out of his nose before me at Wittenberg in my monastery, therefore he is afraid of the soup, and will not answer in the corner before two or three.

For there are those who are his, who say yes to his excellent words. If I (who am of no spirit at all, and hear no heavenly voice) had let myself hear such words against my papists, how should they cry out, and shut me up!

(13) I cannot boast nor defy myself with such high words; I am a poor, miserable man, and did not begin my cause so well, but with great trembling and fear (as St. Paul also confesses of himself 1 Cor. 2, 3.) who would also have known how to boast of heavenly voices). How humbly I first attacked the pope, how I pleaded, how I sought, as my first writings show. Nevertheless, in such a poor spirit I have done that which this world-eating spirit has not yet attempted, but has so far shunned and fled in a chivalrous and manly manner, and also boasts honestly of such shunning, as a chivalrous and high spirit deed.

(14) For I stood in Leipzig [1519] to debate before the most dangerous congregation. I appeared at Augsburg [1518] without an escort before my highest enemies. At Worms [1521] I stood before the emperor and the entire empire, even though I knew beforehand that my escort had been broken and that wild, strange treachery and cunning were directed at me.

(15) Though I was weak and poor, yet my heart stood at the time thus: If I had known that so many devils had aimed at me as there were tiles on the roofs of Worms, I would still have ridden in, and had not yet heard anything of the heavenly voice and God's pounds and works, nor of the universal spirit. Item, I had to stand in angles one, two, three, who, where and how one wanted. My stupid and poor spirit has had to stand free as a field flower, and no time, person, place, way, or measure has been right; has had to be ready and willing for anyone to answer, as St. Peter teaches [1 Ep. 3:15].

016 And this Spirit, which is as high above us as the sun is above the earth, which scarcely looketh upon us for little worms, tuneth to himself vainly harmless, friendly, and safe healers and hearers, and will not answer to two or three in but places. He feels something he does not like to feel, and means to frighten us with pompous words. Well, we can do nothing, except what Christ gives us; if he will let us go, a sounding leaf may frighten us; but if he will keep us, the spirit shall know his great glory.

(17) And I hereby beseech E. F. G., if it be necessary, I will tell how it was between me and this spirit in my room, so that E. F. G. and all the world may feel and grasp that this spirit is certainly a lying devil, and yet a bad devil. I have had one angry with me, and still have. For the spirits that thunder and rumble so proudly do not do it, but creep secretly, and do harm before they are heard.

(18) For this reason I have had to tell them that the F. F. G. should not be afraid or shy before this spirit, and should give an earnest command that they should keep their fists within, and leave their monastery and church-breaking and saint-burning in order, but, if they wish to prove their spirit, they should do so as is proper, and try themselves beforehand, whether before us or before the papists. For they think (praise God) that we are worse enemies than the papists. Even though they use and enjoy our victory, they take wives and reproach papal laws, which they did not win, and their blood did not stand in danger for it, but I had to obtain it with my life and limb, which I have hitherto dared to do. I must boast, as St. Paul did, 2 Cor. 11:16, though it is foolishness, and I would rather leave it alone, if I could, before the lying spirits.

019 But if they say, as they do, that their spirit is too high, and ours too low, and that their thing may not be known of us, I answer, St. Peter also knew well that his spirit, and the spirit of all Christians, was higher than

1) In the first printing and in the Wittenberg: "uncertain". Obsopoeus: tavsutes. of the Gentiles and the Jews; nor does he give sl. Ep. 3,16.]: We are to be ready and willing to answer every man meekly.

020 Christ also knew that his spirit was higher than that of the Jews, nor did he let himself down, and justified himself, saying [John 8:46], "Who accuseth me of sin among you?" and before Annas [John 18:24], "If I have spoken evil, bear witness of it." 2c. I also know and am certain by the grace of God that I am more learned in the Scriptures than all the Sophists and Papists; but from pride God has yet graciously protected me, and will also protect me, that I should refuse to answer and be heard before the very least Jew or Gentile, or whoever it may be.

021 Why also do they themselves send forth their things in writing, if they will not stand before two or three, nor in a dangerous congregation? Or do they think that their writing comes before a harmless congregation, and not before two or three in particular? Yes, it amazes me how they forget their spirit, and want to teach the people orally and in writing, when they boast that everyone must hear God's voice for himself, and mock us for speaking God's word orally and in writing, as if it were of no value or use, and have a much higher, more exalted office than the apostles and prophets and Christ Himself, all of whom have spoken God's word orally or in writing, and have never said anything about the heavenly, divine voice that we need to hear. So this spirit of the heavens pretends that he himself does not see what he is saying.

022 But I know that we which have the gospel, and know it, though we be poor sinners, have the right spirit, or, as St Paul saith, Romans 8:23, krimities 8pircku8, the firstfruits of the spirit, though we have not the fullness of the spirit. For there is none other, but the same one Spirit, which divideth out his gifts whimsically. We know what faith and love and the cross are, and there is no greater thing on earth to know than faith and love. From this we also know and can judge which doctrine is right or wrong, according to faith or not. As we also know this lying spirit.

and judge that this is what he has in mind: he wants to abolish the Scriptures and the oral word of God, and to abolish the sacraments of baptism and the altar, and to lead us into the spirit, where we are to tempt God with our own works and free will and wait for his work, and to set the time, place and measure for God, if he wants to work with us.

023 For such abominable presumption is evident from their writing, that they write, even with expressed words, against the gospel of St. Mark, saying, Ooutra Nareum uUimo oax., as if St. Marcus had written wrongly of baptism. And since they are not allowed to strike St. John in the mouth as St. Marcus did: "He that is not otherwise born of the Spirit and water," Joh. 3, 5. r., they do not interpret the word "water" to mean anything, and badly reject bodily baptism in water.

024 But I would gladly know, because the Spirit is not without fruit, and their spirit is so much higher than ours, whether it also bringeth forth higher fruit than ours; yea, it must indeed bring forth other and better fruit than ours, because it is better and higher. So we teach and confess that our spirit, which we preach and teach, brings forth the fruits mentioned by St. Paul in Gal. 5:22, 23, as love, joy, peace, patience, kindness, faithfulness? ) Meekness and temperance; and as he saith Rom. 8:13, that he put to death the works of the flesh, and crucified with Christ the old Adam with his lusts, Gal. 5. And summa, the fruit of our spirit is the fulfilling of the ten commandments of God.

(25) Therefore the universal spirit, which will not let our spirit be anything, must certainly bear something higher than love and faith, peace, patience, 2c., since St. Paul says that love is the highest fruit, 1 Cor. 13:13, and must do much better than God has commanded. I would like to know what that would be, since we know that the Spirit, acquired through Christ, is only given to us to fulfill God's commandment, as Paul says Rom. 8, 3. 4.

026 But if they will say, We live not as we teach, neither have we such a spirit.

1) In the old editions: "Traw" - faithfulness and faith.

I would gladly suffer them to say such things, for in doing so one might palpably feel that there is not a good spirit speaking out of them. We confess this ourselves, and it is not necessary for us to get it from a heavenly voice and a higher spirit, because we unfortunately do not do everything we ought to do. St. Paul says in Galatians 5:17 that all things will never come to pass, because the spirit and the flesh are both with and against one another on earth.

(27) Thus I do not yet sense any special fruit of the All-City Spirit without it wanting to strike with its fist and break wood and stones. Love, peace, patience, kindness and gentleness have been spared so far, so that the fruits of the spirit do not become too common. By the grace of God, however, I can show many fruits of the spirit among our people, and I would still like to set my person alone, which is the least and most sinful, against all the fruits of the whole spirit of the city, if it is to be praised, however highly it reproaches my life.

028 But to reprove any man's doctrine for the infirmity of his life is not the Holy Ghost. For the Holy Spirit reproves false doctrine, and tolerates the weak in faith and life, as Rom. 14:1, and 15:1, St. Paul teaches, and in all places. Neither do I mind that the universal spirit is so unfruitful, but that it teaches and wants to establish other doctrines. I would have little to do with the papists, too, if they only taught rightly; their evil life would not do great harm. Because this spirit wants to go out and take offense at our sick life, and so insolently judges the doctrine for life's sake, he has sufficiently proved who he is; for the Spirit of Christ judges no one who teaches right, and tolerates and bears, and helps those who do not yet live right, and does not so despise poor sinners as this Pharisaic spirit does.

29.. Well, this is the doctrine, which will be found in time. Now let this be the summa, most gracious sirs, that E. F. G. shall not resist the office of the word. Let them only preach confidently and freshly what they can, and against whom they will: for, as I have said, there must be sects [1 Cor. 11:19.], and the word of God must be in the field.

And they lie down and fight: therefore also the evangelists are called hosts, Ps. 68:12, and Christ a king of hosts in the prophets. If their spirit is right, it will not be afraid of us, and will be at ease. If ours be right, neither will he be afraid of them, nor of any. Let the spirits burst upon one another, and let them meet. But if some are deceived, then let it be according to the course of the war: where there is strife and battle, some shall fall and be sore: but he that fighteth righteously shall be crowned.

030 But if they will do more than fight with the word, and break and smite with the fist, let the Lord take hold, whether it be we or they, and straightway forbid the land, saying, We will gladly suffer and see that ye fight with the word, that the right doctrine may be established; but hold your fist still, for that is our office, or else lift you up unto the land. For we who guide the word of GOD are not to fight with our fists. It is a spiritual strife that winneth hearts and souls from the devil, and is also thus written by Daniel sCap.8,25.] that the antichrist shall be destroyed without hand. Thus also saith Isaias, Cap. 11:4, that Christ shall fight in his kingdom with the spirit of his fine mouth, and with the rod of his lips. To preach and to suffer is our office, but not to strike with fists and to defend ourselves. So also Christ and his apostles did not break churches, nor cut down images, but won hearts with the word of God, after which churches and images themselves fell.

Thirty-one: so shall we do. First, tear the hearts away from the monasteries and spirits. When they are gone, and churches and monasteries lie desolate, then let the sovereigns do with them what they will. What is wood and stone to us, if we have the hearts away? Behold, as I do, I have never touched a stone, neither have I broken nor burned any monastery: nor by my word are the monasteries now in many places made desolate, even among the princes who are opposed to the gospel. If I had attacked with the storm, as these prophets did, hearts would have remained captive in all the world, and I would have broken down stone and wood in some place or other.

...that would have been useful? Fame and honor may be sought with it, but the salvation of souls is not sought with it. Some think that I have done more harm to the pope without any fist than a mighty king would do. But because these prophets would like to do something special and better, and yet they cannot, they leave the souls to be saved, and attack wood and stone; this is the new and wonderful work of the high spirit.

(32) But whether they would argue that in the Law of Moses the Jews were commanded to break down all idols and to destroy the altars of idols, (Deut. 7:5, 12:2, 3) the answer is that they themselves know that God has done many works from the beginning through one word and one faith, through many saints. And the Epistle to the Hebrews, Cap. 6, 12, also interprets this, saying, "We are to follow the faith of such saints, for we cannot follow the work of all saints. Now when the Jews broke down altars and idols, they had at that time a sure commandment from God for the same work, which we have not at this time. For when Abraham sacrificed his son, he certainly had God's commandment for it; and yet afterward all did wrong who sacrificed their children according to the work. It is not necessary to imitate 2) the works, or we should also be circumcised, and do all the Jewish works.

033 Yea, if it were lawful for us Christians to break churches, and to storm as the Jews did, it would follow that we should bodily slay all unbelievers, even as the Jews were commanded to slay the Canaanites and Amorites, Deut. 7:1, as hard as they break images. By this the Spirit of God would gain nothing more to do than to shed blood; and those who did not "hear his heavenly voice" would all be strangled by him, so that the offenses would not remain among the people of God, which are much greater in the living unbelievers than in the images of wood and stone.

034 For this purpose was such a commandment given to the Jews...

1) In De Wette's, in Erlanger's, and in Walch's, here is still inappropriate: "1 Mos'1,2."

2) In the first edition and the Jena: "nachomen"; Wittenberg: "nachkamen", so also De Wette and the Erlanger.

than to the people who were proved by the miracles of God, who were certainly God's people, and yet did so with proper authority and sovereignty, and did not separate themselves into a group. But this spirit has not yet known that there are God's people, with some miracle; for he is dividing himself as if he alone were God's people, and is feeding without the proper authority of God, and without God's commandment, and wants to have his spirit believed.

(35) The removal of the vexation must be done by the word of God. For though all outward vexations be broken and removed, it is of no avail, if the hearts be not brought from unbelief unto the right faith. For an unbelieving heart always finds new vexations, as it happened among the Jews, that they set up ten idols, when before they had broken one. Therefore, in the New Testament, the right way must be used to drive out the devil and the evil, namely, the word of God, and with it the hearts of the faithful.

If you turn away from him, the devil and all his splendor and power 1) will fall from him.

(36) I will leave it at that this time, and I have humbly asked E. F. G. to be serious about such storming and raving. F. G. that they do so with earnestness, so that only the word of God may be acted upon in these matters, as is proper for Christians, and that the cause of sedition, to which He Omnes is otherwise more than too much inclined, may be prevented. For it is not Christians who are willing to fight with their fists over the word, and are not rather willing to suffer anything, if they are full of ten holy spirits. May God's mercy strengthen and protect E. F. G. forever, Amen.

Of the outrage of the Bauerü in Swabia, which broke out in 1525. Of the demands of duration".

764: The complaint and request of the peasants, written in 12 articles. Before April 1525.

Complaints and friendly requests, with attached Christian prayers of the whole community, now assembled, in twelve main articles in the shortest possible way.

This writing is found in the Wittenberg edition (1551), vol. II, p. 75; in the Jena edition (1553), vol. III, p. 115; in the Altenburg edition, vol. III, p. III, and in the Leipzig edition, vol. XIX, p. 250. Sleidanus considers the author to be Christoph Schapler, preacher in Memmingen, a follower of Zwingli, in his eommout. d6 "tat" rslix., x. 118, Christoph Schapler, preacher at Memmingen, a follower of Zwingli, while Elias Frick, in the German Seckendorf, p. 681, considers Joh. Heuglin, whom the Bishop of Constance had burned at Mersburg, May 10, 1527. Luther, in his admonition to the peasants (No. 767 in this volume, K35), says: "He who has written your articles is not a pious man." - It should also be noted that a large number of scriptural passages are cited in the margin, which do not serve any purpose at all (in the Gan 33), in order to give the impression as if the articles were thereby proven from Scripture". Luther 1. e. speaks of this also. - Luther began the "Exhortation to Peace on the Twelve Articles of the Bauerschaft," 2c. at Eisleben, April 19. Thence our determination of the time. When Luther began this writing, the articles of the Bauerschaft would already have gone out in print, as he says at the very beginning. Köstlin, M. Luther (3), Vol. I, p. 734 states that these articles had been circulated since the month of March.

To the Christian reader peace and grace of God through Christ.

1. There are many unbelievers who now take occasion to revile the gospel on account of the assembled peasantry, saying: These are the fruits of the new gospel, to be obedient to no one, to rise up in indignation and revolt in all places, to run with great violence to the multitude and to gather together, to reform and to destroy ecclesiastical and temporal authorities, and perhaps even to slay them.

(2) To all these ungodly, sacrilegious judges answer these articles that follow. First of all, that they have brought this dishonor to the word of God.

annul. On the other hand, the disobedience, yes, the indignation of all peasants, Christian excuse.

003 In the first place, the gospel is not a cause of rebellion or sedition, because it speaks of Christ, the promised Messiah, whose word and life teach nothing but love, peace, patience, and unity, so that all who believe in this Christ may become sweet, peaceful, patient, and united. If then the reason of all the articles of the peasants (as is clearly seen) is to hear the gospel, and to live according to it, how then may the antichrists call the gospel a cause of indignation and disobedience?

004 But that some unbelievers and enemies of the gospel should rebel and rise up against such affections and desires, the gospel is not the cause, but the devil, the most pernicious enemy of the gospel, who through unbelief awakens such in his own, that the word of God (which teaches love, peace, and unity) may be suppressed and taken away.

5th Secondly. For it follows clearly that the peasants, desiring in their articles such a gospel for doctrine and life, may not be called disobedient, rebellious. But whether God wants to hear the peasants (anxiously calling for His word to live): who wants to rebuke the will of God, who wants to reach into His judgment, yes, who wants to resist His majesty? If he has heard the children of Israel crying unto him, and settled out of the hand of Pharaoni s^2 Mos. 3, 7. f. Aj, may he not this day save his own? Yea, he will save, and in a short time s^1 Luc. 18, 8.]. Therefore, Christian reader, read such following articles with diligence, and judge afterwards.

The following are the 12 articles of the Bauerschaft:

I. First, it is our humble request and desire, as well as the will and opinion of all of us, that we now want to have the authority and power to have a whole congregation choose and elect a pastor themselves, and also have the authority to remove him again if he behaves improperly. The same chosen pastor shall preach the holy gospel to us loudly and clearly, without any human addition, doctrine, or commandment; for<sup>1)</sup> always proclaiming the true faith to us gives us a reason to ask God for His grace, and to imagine and confirm the same true faith in us. For if his grace is not imagined in us, we always remain flesh and blood, which is of no use; as it is clearly stated in the Scriptures that we are saved by the true faith alone.

1) So the Jenaer. Wittenbergers: then.

We need such a forerunner and pastor, who is founded in the Scriptures. Therefore, we need such a forerunner and pastor, and this is founded in Scripture.

Secondly, after the right tithe has been established in the Old Testament, and all things fulfilled in the New, nevertheless we will gladly give the right tithe of grain 2) as it is due. Accordingly, it is to be given to God and distributed to his own; if it is due to a pastor who clearly proclaims the word of God, we are of the will henceforth to collect and collect this tithe from our church priests, if a congregation is established, and to give it to a pastor, who is chosen by a whole congregation, his fairly sufficient stay, to him and his own, according to the knowledge of a whole congregation; And what is left over shall be given to the poor of the same village, according to the manner of the things, and the judgment of the congregation.

What is left over is to be kept, whether one has to travel because of the need of the land; so that no land tax may be levied on the poor, it is to be paid out of this surplus. Even if it were the case that one or more villages had sold the tithe themselves, out of some necessity, those who have to show it in the form of a whole village, shall not be compensated, but we shall compare ourselves with him according to form and substance, and redeem it to him again with due aim and time. But whoever has not bought such from any village, and their ancestors themselves have given them such, we do not want to, shall not, and are not obliged to give them anything else, but only, as stated above, to maintain our chosen priest with it, to pay it off afterwards, or to give it to the poor, as the holy scripture states, whether they are spiritual or secular. We do not want to give the small tithe at all, because God the Lord created cattle free from man, which we consider an unseemly tithe) that men have invented, therefore we do not want to give it any further.

III Thirdly, the custom has hitherto been that we have been taken for their own people;

2) "gladly" is missing from the Wittenberger.

3) So the Jenaer. Wittenberger: Ueberflusse.

4) This is the reading of the Jena edition. Wittenberger: "dieselbigen so der, um zu zeige" 2c. The meaning of this somewhat obscure passage will be: He who can show documents that he has bought the tithe of a whole village, he shall not pay it 2c.

5) So the Wittenbergers. Jenaer:

"set".

Which is to be pitied, that Christ hath redeemed and bought us all with the shedding of his precious blood, even as the shepherd, and as the most high, no man excepted. Therefore it is in accordance with the Scriptures that we are and will be free. God does not teach us to be free or to have no authority. We are to live in commandments, not in the free will of the flesh, but to love God as our Lord, to recognize in him our neighbor, and to show him all the things 1) that we would like to have, which God commanded us at the Last Supper; therefore we are to live according to his commandment. [This commandment does not indicate and instruct us that we are not obedient to authority; not only to authority, but we are to humble ourselves against everyone, so that we also gladly obey our chosen and appointed authority (appointed to us by God) in all proper and Christian matters. 2) There is no doubt that you will gladly relinquish our status as true and right Christians, or tell us in the Gospel that we are. 3)

IV. Fourthly, it has hitherto been the custom that no poor man has had the power to see game, birds or fish in the flowing water, which seems to us to be quite unseemly and unbrotherly, but selfish and not in accordance with the word of God. In some places, too, the authorities want the game to be defiant and to do us great harm, and our own (which God has made grow for man's benefit) the unreasonable animals must eat uselessly, suffer wantonly, and keep silent about it, which is against God and our neighbor. When God the Lord created man, he gave him power over all animals, over the bird in the air and over the fish in the water [Gen. 1:28, 30]. Therefore our desire is, if any man have water, that he may prove it with sufficient writing, that the water was thus knowingly purchased, we desire not to take it by force, but that there should be a Christian understanding in it, because of brotherly love. But if any man cannot give sufficient notice of this, let him communicate it to a congregation in a proper manner.

V. Fifth, we are also burdened with timber. For our lords have given them all the timber they need, and if the poor man needs any, he must buy it for two pence. It is our opinion what kind of woods they are,

1) Inserted by us.

2) In the Jena: to be obedient; in the Wittenberg: obedient, to be 2c. - Property - serfdom.

3) "That we may be," namely, bondmen.

If the clergy or seculars who have not bought it have it, they shall be returned to the whole community, and the community shall be quite free to let anyone take his need into the house, to burn, for free. Even if it were necessary to build, they could do so free of charge, but with the knowledge of those chosen by the community to do so. But if there be none, but that which hath been honestly purchased, they shall be compared with them in a brotherly and Christian manner. If, however, the property had been taken from among them at the beginning, and had been sold later, they should compare themselves according to the condition of the property and the knowledge of brotherly love and holy scripture.

VI. sixthly, because of our hard labour, which is increased day by day, and daily increaseth: we desire that there may be some understanding in this, and that we may not be severely afflicted, but that we may be graciously regarded in this, as our parents served, according to the word of God alone.

VII. Seventh, that we henceforth will not let a manor be burdened any further, but as a manor fairly bestows it upon one, so he shall possess it, according to the union of this lord and peasant. The lord shall not urge or compel him any further, nor demand more service or anything else from him in vain, so that the peasant may use and eat such property without complaint 4). If, however, the master needs services, the farmer shall be willing and obedient to him before others, but at the proper hour and time, so that the farmer is not disadvantaged, and shall do so for a fair penny.

VIII. For the eighth time we are burdened, and of those who have estates in their possession, that these estates cannot 5) bear the taxes, and the peasants forfeit theirs on them and perish: that the lordship have these estates inspected by respectable people, and create an interest 6) according to equity, so that the peasant does not do his work in vain. For every day laborer is worthy of his wages.

IX. In the ninth place we are accused of great iniquities, which are always made new statutes; not that we are punished according to the form of the thing, but at times because of great envy, and at times because of great favour; is our opinion to punish us by old written punishment, according to which the matter is acted, and not according to favour.

4) Walch: "measure". - Immediately following should probably be read "dem Herrn" instead of: "des Herrn" in the editions.

5s "Gült" - levy, tax, land rent.

6) By us "am" I-ein) is put instead of: "am"; for this is a South German document.

X. For the tenth time we have been complained of, that some have appropriated to them meadows, such fields as belong to a commonwealth; the same we shall take again into our common hands, unless it be that they have purchased it honestly. But if they have bought it unjustly, they shall settle it amicably, brotherly, according to the state of the case.

XI. In the eleventh place, we want to completely abolish the custom called death, which is not to be suffered, nor to allow widows and orphans to be deprived of their property against God and honor in such a disgraceful way, as has happened in many places (in various forms), and of those who were supposed to protect them *) and guard them, they have harmed us and harmed us, and if they had had little reason, they would have even taken this; which God will have no more, but shall be all gone; no man shall owe anything for it, neither little nor much.

XII. Twelfthly, it is our decision and final opinion that if one or more of the articles, as stated here, were not in accordance with the word of God (as we do not think they are), we would refrain from these articles, if they were explained to us on the basis of Scripture, if some of the articles were permitted to us now, and if it were subsequently found that they were unlawful, they would be dead and gone from that time on, and would no longer be valid. Such things, if there are more articles in the Scriptures that are contrary to God and detrimental to our neighbor, we also want to reserve and decide, and to practice and use all Christian doctrine. Therefore we will ask God the Lord, who can give us these things, and no one else. The peace of Christ be with us all, amen.

B. How Elector Ludwig of the Palatinate consults Melanchthon about the demands of the walls, and of Luther's and Melanchthon's writings published in this matter.

his opinion on the twelve articles of the peasants, if he could not come in person to Heidelberg.
Dat. Heidelberg, 18 May 1525.

From Cyprian's "Useful Documents," vol. II, p. 345.

By the Grace of God Ludwig Palatine of the Rhine, Elector and Prince 2c.

Our greetings to you, dear friend, We do not doubt that you have heard and know well the extent to which the uprising and elevation of the common man against all authority is also taking place around and in our principality in a noticeable way and with great difficulty, in an appearance of handling the Gospel, but in addition to this there is much unscrupulousness with robbery, fire, death and other unchristian acts against us the nobles, We have ordered the churches and the cloisters, where they would have a great deal of trouble, to do something about it, although we now have good reason to act against these disobedient and insubordinate assemblies. Thus we, as the sovereign prince, have borne a burden of our own people and Christian blood to soak up *) and spill, and thereby to prevent further losses^ bequeathing and inheriting land and people to us the way of goodness, The same persons have ridden to two assembled houses, and have agreed to deal with them in good faith, and have done so much with them, that we have not been able to find out about the XII. Article XII, which they have requested of us, as you will note here, we will further consider and act upon, which may or may not be held, a Diet which is to be held in the next week after Pentecost, in the manner which we may compare them with you, that has its way, but which we could not tolerate, that should stand with the princes and sovereigns of the realm, what they commonly decided to grant and do in what they consider good, that we also want to let us be sociable and comply with it. Because now not only us, but all the sovereignty and authority for the preservation of the peace and right noticeably and much in it, also smelting further aftertaxes and damage, to which for the striving Landt

4) "lests" will probably be as much as: Setzens, Schädigens.

We have shed our blood and Christian blood, which we have taken the greatest pains to bring about, and also that we do not want to establish justice and righteousness with God, and that you, as a born and bred man, have experienced and practiced the care of others in the Holy Scriptures, and are undoubtedly inclined to peace and righteousness, to which you are named in such articles as a juror. Therefore, we kindly ask and request that you take good care of the matter and appear before us here in Heydelberg at the next Pentecost in one of our persons, or if it should not be possible, at least give us your counsel and good advice from the divine law of the Gospel Scriptures, indicating the end and place where it is written, which we, as a secular authority, find to be kept in the XIIIth article. Article XII, which we, as a secular authority of this XIIIth Article, find it our duty to keep, the like of which the opponents owe to us in the same rejoinder, to send to us in writing in the above-mentioned time 1) In which we graciously acknowledge a good work also acceptable to us, D. Heydelberg, Thursday after Cantate [18 May] Anno MVXXV.

To our dear faithful Philippo Melanchthon now at Wittenberg.

766 Philipp Melanchthon's writing against the articles of the Bauerschast. End of May or beginning of June 1525.

This writing has appeared in a single edition in quarto; then in the Wittenberg edition (1551), Pd. Since the Elector of the Palatinate informs Melanchthon in his previous letter that "in the next week after Pentecost (Pentecost fell on June 4) a Diet is to be held" for the discussion of this matter, our writing must be set at the end of May or beginning of June. But the "Appendix" shows that it was not printed until after the victory over the peasants.

001 Forasmuch as the brotherhood appeals to the holy gospel, and uses the same for a pretence, it is necessary at first to know what the holy gospel requires of us, or does not require; that the brotherhood may be judged articles, which they all suppose to enforce under the pretence and name of God, and be heard that all their articles are a reason to hear the gospel, and to live according to it, but they do not know what the holy gospel requires of us.

1) This Melanchthon will have fulfilled by the next writing.

The peasantry covets much that it has no right, that it also does not call the gospel. To this end they exercise violence, and seek to carry out their intentions with riots and insurrections, and with murder.

002 But now they have offered themselves to be instructed with the gospel. Wherefore it is right that the gospel and true Christian doctrine should be reproached unto them: for there are doubtless many among the common multitude that sin through ignorance, who, if they were rightly instructed, it is to be hoped would desist from such wickedness, and consider the judgment of God, their souls, and their poor wives and children.

003 But many are so wilful, and so blinded of the devil, that they will not, neither suffer peace. And these in many places, though they have been warned and exhorted to peace by the scriptures and preaching of godly men, are not helped; and because they anger God more, they become only more wicked and obstinate from such exhortation. Of these we will speak hereafter. Now, however, let us understand what the Gospel demands, and how a Christian heart is to be kind to God, to his neighbor, and to the authorities.

4 St. Paul saith, 1 Tim. I, 5, that this is the content of the law, recently formulated: "Love from a pure heart, with a good conscience, and true faith." With faith one acts against God, with love against one's neighbor and authorities. Now what is faith? This is faith, when God shows sin to the conscience, and truly frightens it, so that it begins to heartily fear God's judgment. For God has commanded to punish sin and to preach repentance. When the heart hears from Christ that grace and forgiveness of sins have been granted through him without our merit, it feels comfort and joy, so that it stands at rest before God, certain that God has been reconciled, and therefore, in afflictions such as death or other hardships, it relies on God, knowing that God has an eye on us and will help us, and can therefore be satisfied, because it is certain of such comfort. This is called faith, which the gospel preaches.

005 When the king of Assyria was before Jerusalem, and Ezekiah was much too weak to smite him, a heart without right faith either would have despaired, and have yielded to the enemy, or else would have fled, or else would have killed himself, or else would have ventured to do something in despair, and have smitten with the enemy, thinking, If it succeed, it shall profit; but if it fail, it shall not.

we must perish. But what does Ezekiel do? Because his heart knows God, believes and looks to God for help, he asks God to advise him. God helped him, as it is written in Isa. 37.

006 Paul saith, that it should be faith without hypocrisy. For there are many people on earth who call themselves Christians, and boast of faith, but when it comes to the point, they realize that they do not believe. For as soon as misfortune comes, they despair of God, thinking that he does not respect us, and does not care for us as much as is preached, and seek help as long as they can from their own power, wisdom, or strength, even from the devil, as Saul did; when he was anxious, and the enemies had "drawn near," he sought help and counsel from the sorceress.

007 So many boast of faith, and say that they are Christians, as also the company will be called Christians. But let every man know, if his heart have not sincere fear of the judgment of God, and trust in God in all offences, but his heart throb for good, for power, for heaps, that he is no Christian. For Isaiah 66:2 says that God dwells with those who are of a fearful and lowly heart; and John 3:14: "As Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, so must the Son of man be lifted up, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life."

(8) Such a right faith cannot be imagined by human reason or will by its own power, but the Holy Spirit works and creates it in the hearts of many; as John 6:45 is written, "They must all be taught of God," and Romans 8:14, "They are the children of God whom the Spirit of God impels."

(9) Thus the chief thing of a Christian life is such faith, by which he becomes one with God and is reconciled, and comes to rest in all cases. And as your faith is inward in the heart, so Christian being is primarily an inward being. And one must strive for the main part and the seal, as it is called John 6:27, of the Christian being. For this is where the glitter separates itself from true piety, which God works.

010 God also commands this faith throughout the Scriptures, and especially in the first commandment, Jer. 9:23-24: "Let not the wise man glory in his wisdom, nor the mighty man in his power, nor the rich man in his wealth: but let every man glory in this, that he knoweth me, that I am a God which have mercy upon the earth."

To do justice and judgment, and to help the righteous; these things please me," that is, to keep and believe in God, and to provide oneself for God, that is right worship and godliness.

Of love.

(11) The other part is: love from a pure heart and a good conscience. For when the heart thus recognizes how great a mercy God has shown us, it knows that it should in turn show gratitude to those whom God has commanded us to love and serve. Now God has said: "You shall love your neighbor as yourself, you shall not kill, you shall not commit unchastity, you shall not steal" 2c. Thus, a Christian heart desires to please God in these things; it serves its neighbor, it is kind to him, it demonstrates discipline and chastity in him, it helps him to preserve his goods. These things are required by Christ Matth. 5, 20. ff. and Paul Rom. 12, 8. ff.

From the Superior.

(12) And especially does the gospel demand obedience to authority. And because this article is so despised by those who call themselves evangelicals, let us hold up the gospel and God's word to them, in which they see how hard they fight against God under the appearance of the gospel. Paul to the Romans on the 13th, v. 1 ff., speaks thus: "Let every man be subject to the authority that rules over him; for there is no authority but from God alone, and all authority is ordered by God. Whoever resists the authority resists God's order, and whoever resists will be punished. And righteousness is not a terror to good works, but to evil. But if thou fear not the ruler, do good, and thou shalt have praise of him. For she is a servant of God, for thy good. But if thou do evil, fear her: for she beareth not the sword in vain, but is the servant of God, to avenge and punish him that doeth evil. Therefore it is necessary to be her servant, not only for the sake of punishment, but also for the sake of conscience. Therefore give to the womb, for they are servants of God, and have work to do. Therefore give to all that ye owe: to whomsoever the bosom belongeth, to him give the bosom; to whomsoever the toll belongeth, to him give the toll; to whomsoever fear belongeth, to him give fear; to whomsoever honor belongeth, to him give honor."

13 Here St. Paul teaches three things. First, from whence authority is instituted, saying that God has ordained authority. For because not

Since everyone is a Christian and willingly abstains from harming others, but there are also many wanton people who commit sacrilege against other people's bodies, goods, wives, or children, God has, in addition to the Gospel, instituted such secular government and discipline to protect the honorable and to create peace for them, and to punish sacrilege. For this purpose, the authorities have established a court and a law so that people may divide, possess and use their physical goods in peace, and have appointed judges, soldiers and the like to protect peace and prevent murder. Luc. 3:14: "Be content with your wages."

014 A Christian may use such a worldly ordinance, though it be not in one place as in another. For, as has been said above, Christianity is primarily an inward life and being, and is not bound to such an order, but should use it according to love and peace. Goods are divided differently in Saxony than on the Rhine, and it may be that one is more unpleasant than the other; nevertheless, for the sake of peace, a Christian should remain within the rights of his country, and this does him no harm to his soul; indeed, if he does not want to be satisfied, then he does harm to his soul.

015 So there is bondage in some places; he shall bear it for peace, though it be not in other dominions. The gospel doth not require that such country ordinances be changed, but enjoins obedience, without doing contrary to God, as the authorities enjoin. For there one should keep the rule of Apost. 5, 29: "One must be obedient to God more than to men."

016 And this is well to be remembered, that God hath appointed the rulers, that they, the rulers, might know that they were in a state pleasing to God. For one cannot serve God in works or positions that He has not ordained or instituted. This is also comforting to the authorities, so that they may have confidence and reason to believe that God will preserve them against the will of the rebellious, as God has often indicated. As with David, though his own son drove him out of the land, and the whole country had fallen from him, yet God restored him, and subdued the rebellious. For Solomon says Proverbs 21:30: "There is no wisdom, no understanding, no art against the Lord," and Paul says here that all who resist the rulers will be punished. And David asks God to and restore him to the office which he hath ordained, Ps. 7:7: "Judge thou the office which thou hast ordained."

(17) It is also comforting to the subjects that they know that God is pleased with their obedience to the authorities, and what they do for the good of the authorities, that they do this for God, and thus truly serve God in the burdens they bear from the authorities, whether it be traveling, giving tribute, or otherwise. And it is just as holy a work to do such things as when God especially blesses one from heaven. Raising the dead, or whatever you want to call it.

018 This also is terrible unto the rebellious, because they have a mighty great Lord for an enemy, against whom they fight. One may stand before guns and other weapons, but to stand against God is impossible. Now God's command is as good as if he had commanded each one in particular by an angel from heaven not to resist superiority. How hard the devil must have possessed the hearts that do not respect such words of God, and yet boast of the Gospel.

019 Secondly, Paul binds the conference, and teaches that one ought not to be obedient to authority merely because it has inflicted punishment, as I must be obedient to a robber, but for the sake of conscience, that is, God requires such obedience, and will condemn those who disobey. And even if the world were too weak to punish such an outrage, God would not let it go unpunished. God is not pleased with such disobedience to authority, unless he specially commands one to act against authority, as he commanded Mosiah or Jesus; then he gave signs and testimony, so that one might be sure whom he should obey, and whom he had made Lord.

020 Thirdly, St. Paul teacheth here, wherein we ought to show obedience to the rulers, saying, we ought to give the bounty and the toll, that is, to keep the peace, confess it much; to reward men, to build, 2c. we ought to give such money. If the princes use it badly, let them answer for it; we owe it to them to advance what is ours, for the sake of peace.

(21) Secondly, one should show fear, of which it has been said above that one should fear authority, because it has command from God. Therefore, one should fear the commandment of authority as if it had been commanded by God, and in service he should look to God's will, not only to the eyes of the ruler, as St. Paul commanded the servants, that they should not only look to the eyes of their masters, but to serve from the heart 2c., because one serves God -aran sEph. 6, 5. 6. Col. 3, 22. 23.]

(22) Solomon teaches such earnest fear, Proverbs 16:14: "The king's displeasure is a messenger of death, but a wise man reconciles him"; and Cap. 20:2: "The king's wrath is as a lion's roar; he that enrages him denounces his life." This is a terrifying judgment, which God accuses of sin, and wants to punish those who anger the rulers. Therefore beware of the disobedient. For though the world were too weak to punish disobedience, yet God would not let it go unpunished; as is also said above of the saying of Paul, Rom. 13:5: "They are to be punished."

023 Fourthly, honour shall be offered unto them. To offer honor is not only to make outward gestures, to bow down and take off one's hat; it is to consider them, the rulers, wise and just, and therefore to be grateful to them. Now it happens, as in the game, that he who is entitled thinks he will do best. So the subjects often think, when they govern, that it would behoove them, that they would prevent much harm, and that they would do justice more favorably and more diligently. 2c. Some also often cry out that injustice is done to them or to others; and do not think that they are to bear God's will in authority, and that there has never been a rule on earth that has been without blame; one cannot dispute it all. There is no doubt that the two best rulers on earth were David and Solomon; nor did David hear from his own son, he did not hear the people, he did not judge the things. So Israel also complained, that they should bear Solomon's tribute longer.

(24) There is no reason on earth so great as to be sufficient for the regiment. Yes, where God does not give happiness, it is not possible to maintain a regiment for three days with human wisdom. Therefore St. Paul demands that one should give honor to the leadership, that is, that one should consider it wise and just. And if in the course of time other things please us, that we yield to their wisdom and righteousness for the sake of peace, and be thankful for other benefits, which we receive much by their toil, care, and labor. For though someone may be wronged, yet otherwise they help us to peace, that we may train our children in discipline and godliness, and seek nourishment for them. Is not this worthy of thanksgiving?

025 Now it would be great ingratitude if a friend had given me a hundred florins, and I found among them a florin or two that were too light; for this cause I murmured, and

...and did not thank him for the rest. So do the peasants in many articles. They want to hunt and fish, which is not very important to them, and so they insist on their landlords, not considering how much they would otherwise receive from them. As that the princes must prevent that each knave fall today to one, tomorrow to the other in his own, desecrate his wife and children, deprive them of their food 2c. Item, create peace, so that the children may be brought up in the fear of God and in respectability. Thus the gospel requires not only obedience to authority, but also reverence.

26 Therefore God also commanded in Exodus 22:28: "You shall not curse your ruler," that is, you shall show him honor, praise him, and consider what he decrees and establishes to be wise and right. For as one says: God is in the ship, so indeed God is in the government, and gives fortune and misfortune according to His will. Therefore Solomon says Proverbs 29:26: "Many seek the face of a prince, but every man's judgment comes from the Lord," that is, many take comfort in the grace and power of princes, but as God wills, so it comes to pass; Cap. 21:1. The king's heart is in the hand of the Lord, like streams of water, and he inclines it wherever he wills"; and Cap. 16,10: "Divination is in the mouth of the king, his mouth does not fail in judgment", that is, the government is God's order, and God stands with the princes, and gives them wisdom to govern and maintains their government. For where God does not keep it, and where God does not give grace and wisdom, it may not be maintained by human skill.

27. sayest thou: But how if they reproach me too harshly or unjustly? Answer: Though a prince do iniquity, and flay thee, and scrape thee, yet it is not lawful to make insurrection; neither is it lawful, if any man kill thee a brother, to avenge the same with his own violence. God will not have it that iniquities should be committed against authority, or that any should presume to rule without orderly officers. For Christ says Matt. 26:52: "He that taketh the sword shall perish with the sword," that is, no one shall avenge himself with his own power, or be subject to the sword and rule, without orderly officers. St. Peter had a right cause in wanting to defend Christ, for Christ was being wronged. Nevertheless Peter did wrong, because he wanted to fight against the authorities, and he was not commanded to use the sword. It did not help, and Christ pronounced judgment on him.

appalling verdict, that he was guilty of death: "He that taketh the sword shall perish by the sword."

28. also rebellion is forbidden, Rom. 13, 2. since St. Paul says: "Whoever rebels against authority will be punished". God is hard on those who rebel against authority. Also the histories show that the rebellious have always been punished at last; as Gen. 16 Dathan and Abiram devoured the earth, and Judges 9:53. 9,53. a woman threw Abimelech to death. So also did Absalom, Siba perish. Zambri ^Simri^, 1 Kings 16:18, burned himself. God also punished Baasha, that he stirred up a rebellion against Nadab, although the same king was not pleasing to God, 1 Kings 16:11. God has judged the like among the heathen Apium Decemvirum, Catilinam, and others much, at Rome and in other countries. For God wills in all the world that men should be obedient to authority, and punishes disobedience among all nations, whether they be called Jews, Gentiles, or Christians. Solomon also saith, Proverbs 24:21 f., My child, fear the LORD and the king, and mingle not with the rebellious: for their calamity shall come suddenly."

029 Above this the gospel requireth that one suffer iniquity, not of the rulers only, but of all men: as it is written, Match. 5:39: "I say unto you, that ye resist not evil: but if any man smite thee on the right cheek, turn to him the other also." And Rom. 12:19: "Avenge not yourselves, beloved, but rather give place unto wrath. For it is written: Vengeance is mine, I will repay." This is what Christians do; they do not take up the sword, and do not fall upon the goods of others; they do not, like these peasants who call themselves a Christian community, storm to the shame of Christ, because they not only intend disobedience, which God also punishes in the Gentiles and the Turks, but also commit robbery.

030 From all this we conclude that, because the gospel requires obedience to authority, and rebellion, even if princes do evil, and also otherwise require injustice, they act contrary to the gospel in this, that they rebel against their authority, and commit and use violence and iniquity against it. And they make themselves liars by writing that they desire to live according to the gospel, and yet they act so publicly against God that it may be assumed that the devil is driving them and intends to destroy them, body and soul. For be it as it may, this sacrilege will be punished in the end, just as the devil has done.

Luther's Works. Vol. XVI.

St. Paul says Rom. 13, 2: "Whoever rebels against authority will be punished," and as it is seen that no murder goes unpunished; for God, because of His order which He has made, keeps Gen. 9, 6: "Whoever spills the blood of man, his blood shall also be spilled by man," so also this outrage will not go unpunished, for a riot is manifold murder.

031 Therefore, though all the articles of the church were commanded in the gospel, yet they would do against God, that they should enforce it by force and sedition. They are still so wicked, and do such things of their own will under the appearance of God's name. But God says: "Whoever takes His name in vain will not go unpunished. Now let him who fears God, and out of foolishness would have consented to go with the mob, desist from it, and consider soul and body, wife and child; for it will not go unpunished.

(32) Let this be said in general of the farmer's action. Now let us talk about the articles.

033 First, I would that he that wrote the articles, and put on so much writing by mistake, had added his name. This would be done in the light. It has a very wicked appearance to make use of such blind tricks; to make the poor simple-minded people believe that such articles, though founded in Scripture, are in many places forgeries of Scripture. But whether such lies are of God or of the devil is to be well judged, for they are abominable lies that thus falsely put on the Scriptures.

From Parishes.

034 It is the duty of the authorities to let the gospel be preached. For Christ saith, Matt. 10:15, That the city which will not hear the gospel shall be punished more severely than Sodoma and Gomorrah: and Proverbs 25:4, 5, When they separate the foam from the silver, it becometh a pure vessel. So also, when one takes away contempt of GOD from the king, righteousness will bring happiness to his throne." God also set Pharaoh as an example, so that the rulers would learn not to despise God's word, but to give it room.

035 But if any authority, being possessed of the gospel, would not suffer the gospel to be preached purely, yet let no sedition be stirred up, for God hath forbidden sedition; but let every one that believeth aright keep his faith for himself.

He shall confess and teach his household and anyone else who desires to learn. If any authority does anything to him, he should suffer for it, and not seek revenge or help from the mob. Yea, this is no Christian that seeketh help of the multitude: for Paul saith Rom. 12:19, "Avenge not yourselves, beloved, but give place unto wrath." So Christ punished Peter when he wanted to fight, and he also asked that the disciples not be harmed. He wanted to stand up for himself. It is not good to be a Christian and lay the cross on the backs of others; you must bear it yourself.

036 So shall it be done also with pastors. Where a tyrant will not suffer right preachers, thou shalt not do violence to false teachers, but, as Christ is called, shun them. For Christ did not command that the goods of the Pharisees should be taken away, that they should be put to death, but that their doctrine should be shunned.

(37) If thou wilt have one that teacheth rightly, keep him at thine own expense, if the superintendency will not let him follow the goods of the parish. For even if a pastor is received from a parish, that parish has no power to withdraw the use of the property from him to whom it has been given by a superior, but to change the order of such use rests solely with the superior who has hitherto had such property in his power. Where the authorities have placed a priest in such property, it is robbery if you want to expel him without the authority's will. The goods or use which you are accustomed to give to the authorities are no longer yours, but the authorities'; to take anything away from them is violence and sacrilege.

038 Wherefore, if thou wilt have a better preacher, it is expedient that thou reward him of thine own, without robbery: Gal. 6:6, "He that is taught shall divide with him that teacheth him." For even in St. Paul's time the authorities had not ordained anything for it; the heathen had all the use of it.

039 Wherefore, if an authority permit not the same, yet thou shalt not make a disturbance, but shalt go to the places where thou mayest hear right doctrine. If thou meet with any evil concerning it, thou shalt suffer it, and shalt not make a disturbance. I also speak of right doctrine, not seditious. The gospel teaches not sedition, but peace, discipline, and patience.

040 But where a godly government would have the gospel preached, it were well that the churches themselves should have power everywhere to elect and call pastors, as in Acts 6, the election of deacons. 6 the election of deacons. For even a whole

And Paul wants to banish the Corinthians 1 Cor. 5, 1. ff. not only, but with the whole church. That therefore to set up and to put down was the power of the church.

41 But in such an election there must also be a prince, who is entitled to see that nothing rebellious is preached. For a prince is set for the protection of the pious and the punishment of the wicked, Romans 13:3, 4. Now it has happened in many places in the German lands that the peasants themselves have accepted preachers, who have pretended to the mob, have taught that one should not give decimates, should not give interest, and the like much more, which has grown into a miserable outrage. Yea, whosoever hath taught obedience, or that one should give interest and decimas, they have sought to stone him, when the gospel teacheth, not only to give that which is ordained for rulers, but also to let go the cloak, when one taketh away thy skirt unjustly [Matthew 5:40].

042 Therefore St. Paul commanded Tito to ordain priests; and to Timothy he saith, Let none be chosen, except he be tried beforehand. Therefore let princes and churches search them out beforehand, that they may know what they are up to. Hitherto the bishops have taken up ordination, but have not tried any, but have made priests, as Jeroboam did, loose, careless, inexperienced men. What good will come of this is now being determined.

From tithing.

(43) Tithes are not given by virtue of the Old Testament. For the Old Testament does not bind us, especially in matters of worldly order and government, how goods are to be divided, 2c. as St. Paul teaches in Col. 2 and Gal. 5. But one is obliged to give what a worldly authority has appointed, and where it has created it, it is called decimā or octavā. For Paul saith, Rom. 13:7, "To whomsoever the bosom belongeth, give the bosom: to whomsoever the toll belongeth, give the toll." For a ruler must have a great cost for the common need of the country. The Romans undoubtedly took much property that God had assigned to the priests or to the temple, and the Jews disputed whether they were obliged to give it otherwise than God had ordained. Yes, if the peasants now had such a note, how they would rage! Nevertheless, they have been guilty,

They let them go to the dominion, because they were no longer masters of their goods, but God gave them to other dominions. On this Christ says of the Didrachmo sLinsgroschen: "Lest we offend them," 2c., Matth. 17, 27. So John Baptist" Luc. 3, 14. also approved such an order, that one gives to a dominion its pay, as he says to the Roman officials: "Be content with your pay."

044 Therefore it is necessary to tithe, because the government has made such an order with the goods. But if anyone rebels against this order, he will take away the authority's right. In Egypt they gave the fifth part, and all the king's goods were his own; and Joseph, who had the Holy Ghost, made such an order, and so burdened the people; yet they were bound to give it.

045 But thou sayest, The rulers have no need of it; the monks and priests have it, and do nothing for it. Answer: What is that to thee? Nevertheless thou shalt not take anything from authority, and shalt give what is laid up for thee where it is ordered, until it do otherwise; in this thou doest right; for to take anything from one's own authority is sacrilege. But I would that the authorities would have mercy on the foundations and monasteries; of this we will speak hereafter.

046 But in sum, the peasants have neither right nor justification to break off the tithes of the rulers, and to deal with them as they please. For to break the law of the land is to break the common peace, which is contrary to love.

047 In many places the tithe is of the temporal government; in many places it is bought of the temporal government. To seize it by force and take what does not belong to you is robbery.

(48) Of the small tithe they write that they do not want to give it at all, for God created the animals freely. Yes, God created them, but in addition to that He ordained that each one should use his own. Otherwise it followed that you would go into my stable and take from it according to your sense 2c. Free means that one may eat it without conscience complaint, which is not forbidden, as the swine were forbidden to the Jews; does not mean free, that one may take from another what is his. Therefore the author of the article has here used the Scriptures badly, and the peasants do wrong that they want to break off such a thing from a ruler with their own sin.

On the III article

Of serfdom.

049 It is also an abomination and violence, that they will not be bondmen. But that they put on scripture, that Christ hath made us free, is spoken of spiritual liberty, that we may be sure that through him our sin is taken away, without our satisfaction, and that we may lately provide, pray, and hope to God for good; and that Christ giveth the Holy Ghost to his own, whereby they resist the devil, that the devil may not cast them into sin, as the ungodly, whose hearts he hath power over, drives them to murder, adultery, blasphemy 2c.

50 Therefore Christian liberty is in the heart, and cannot be seen with carnal eyes. Outwardly a Christian patiently and cheerfully bears all worldly and civil ordinances, and needs them as food and clothing; he may be a serf and a subject; he may also be noble and a ruler; he may hold to Saxon rights or Roman rights in the use and division of goods. All these things do not deceive the faith; indeed, the gospel requires that such worldly ordinances be kept for the sake of peace. Paul to Eph. 6, v. 5-7: "Ye bondmen, be obedient to your fleshly masters with fear and trembling, with willing hearts, as to Christ, not with service only in view, as pleasing men, but as servants of Christ; and do such wills of God kindly from the heart. "2c., and to Colossians 3:22: "Ye bondmen, be obedient in all things to your fleshly masters. "2c. [V. 25:] "He that doeth wrong shall receive what he hath wronged." So Joseph himself was a bondman in Egypt a long time, and other saints much.

011 Therefore the imposition of the peasants hath no appearance; yea, it were needful that such a wild, unruly people as the Germans were should have less liberty than they have. Joseph complained severely to Egypt that the people should not be allowed to go too far. But our rulers allow the people to be all brave, they only take money from them, and besides that they do not keep them in any kind of discipline; from this follows great evil.

Of hunting.

022 It is unlawful to hunt in the forests of princes. For Roman law also teaches that a man may forbid a man to enter his own territory.

But that the peasants say that God created it freely, let it be understood that each may use his own without harm to others.

053 Neither shall the princes hurt any man with the wild, as it may be ordered, or suffer any to fall upon his own.

054 Here the peasants themselves will judge, and demand that every man prove where he hath his water or the like. This is violence, for they are not judges. If a village has a complaint against the one who has taken a possession from a community, it may petition him legally. For thus saith God, Deut. 25:1, If there be a quarrel between men, let them be brought before the courts, and let them be judged: and Christ, Luc. 12:14, would not judge, saying, Who hath made me a judge, or a hereditary judge over you? but direct them to the proper officers.

55 This also is my opinion, that they should not go by force. But if anyone has taken common forests, he is justified in asking for them. Also, a lord may often have cause to take possession of common lands, to cultivate them, or otherwise; and even if it were force, it is unjust to demand it with insurrection.

(56) Let the ministries also act lawfully, for therefore in the world there is judgment and authority, as Paul saith Romans 13:3, for the fear of the wicked, and for the protection of the righteous, that no man should be oppressed contrary to law. Also, for the sake of peace, let the authorities yield a little, as the ancients advised Roboam to yield, 1 Kings 12:7. This is also an answer to the seventh article.

To the VIII. Article

From Zins.

(57) This is a wide matter, of interest, to speak of it shortly. In the first place, it is not wrong for a man to buy a servitude in another man's property, for God allows a man to give away his body; should he not also allow this in the property? Now where the property does not bear the interest, it may be rightly decided by any one. It often happens that the peasants themselves buy the estates. and take up; is it fair that they should kick^ of goods? It is not so, that when they have made debts, they would call others to pay them. Paul 1 Thess. 4, 6. saith, "Let no man overreach, nor overcharge his brother in doing. For the Lord is the avenger of all these things."

To the IX Article

Of punishment.

(58) A government may inflict punishment according to the need of the land, for God has ordained it to ward off evil and to punish it. And are not the peasants right to want to make a rule, a law in it? They are such an unruly, wanton, bloodthirsty people, the Germans, that they should be held much more harshly. For Solomon saith, Proverbs 26:3, A horse shall have a whip, and an ass a bridle, and a fool a rod upon his back; and Sir 33:25, An ass his fodder, his whip, and his burden. So to the servant his bread, punishment, and labour.

59. God also calls the government of the world a sword. But a sword that shall cut, whether it be a punishment of goods, or of life, or of limb, as the iniquity requires. It is merciful when one cuts another, and damages him in the body, paralyzing him, so that one can pay with money. You can see how severely God punished in the wilderness. He also said in the Law, Deut. 19:13, 21: "You shall not show mercy." In this way he indicated that he wanted people to be serious in their conduct, but that no one should be wronged, and that there should be no violence done by authority, as Ahab did and others whom God punished severely. Now there is much beating without measure in Germany, also feasting and fornication, which sins God punished with death in the Old Testament. Deut. 21, 18. ff.

Before the tenth article is spoken above in the sixth.

To the XI article.

(60) The case of death is a servitude. Now we have said above that servitude is to be suffered, and also that it is not contrary to the gospel. But here in this place the sovereignty should depart, and look upon the poor orphans, whom they help.

1) This "they" will refer to those who bought the interest; the next "they" to the peasants.

guilty before God. Because so pleads court. 14, 4. 5.: If you have mercy on the fatherless, I will heal the wounds 2c. God has also commanded, Deut. 24, 17: "Thou shalt not take the widow's garment as a pledge." This is God's way of indicating that He wants the poor, abandoned orphans to be spared.

Decision.

(61) First, the community is wrong and acts against God by rebelling and using force against the authorities, if all articles were very Christian, for God demands obedience to the authorities, as St. Paul says in Romans 13:2. He that resisteth authority shall be punished"; and Proverbs 24:21 f.: "My child, fear the Lord and the King, and mingle not with the rebellious: for their calamity shall come suddenly; and who knoweth when the calamity of the rebellious shall come?"

022 Secondly, the gospel is a pretext for suffering injustice; therefore the peasants act unchristianly, covering themselves with the name of the gospel. And hold that the devil provokes the peasants to this, only that the holy gospel is reviled and blasphemed, and thus false delusion is introduced from the faith, that the gospel again, as before, is obscured.

(63) Thirdly, it is wrong to make a disturbance, if the articles were all right, but one should give way to authority. Now the several articles are also unjust, as is shown above; that it is to be pitied that the blind people put their poor wife and child, their body and soul, in danger, because of such wicked things. Yea, by this it may be perceived that the devil is worshipped; he delighteth in death, as Christ saith John 8:44, "The devil was a murderer from the beginning."

(64) A prince deserves honor and all good things when he has made peace for a country, so that we may train the poor children to discipline and godliness. How blind we are to break the peace ourselves, and to deal dishonestly with those who have kept the peace, to whom we owe a great debt of gratitude. Consider this, every honorable heart, and think of God's will, which demands heartfelt gratitude toward the rulers, and refrain from iniquity and wantonness. God will show one day what displeasure He bears in such iniquity. For he says, Proverbs 24:22, "Their accident will come suddenly."

1) In Luther: "operation" - driving, instigating.

(65) Be not deceived, dear friend, that thou art called a hypocrite, or otherwise; God will judge the matter well, and hath already judged it in many places. The rebellious are still so possessed by the devil that they will not be satisfied; they despise their oaths; what they grant they do not keep, and cry out that it is evangelical. But it is written in the other commandment, that it shall not go well with any unfaithful man: for the text thus saith, God will not leave him unpunished that usurpeth his name."

66 Fourthly, I beseech the princes to do amicably at the first, and to forbear something that would be just, according to the counsel of the ancients, 1 Kings 12:7, who advised king Roboam that he had set up the grievances of Solomon, who without doubt had ruled very well, and had not grieved anyone unjustly.

67 Even though they have sinned in many ways, who knows what God will do to them if they do not humble themselves? For God has kept it this way, that He has cast down all rule from the beginning, when the will to reign has become too great. The Assyrians, the Syrians, the Greeks, the Romans, and Carthage were all destroyed; the Jewish kingdom, which God Himself had ordered and established, also fell apart, and which had such great promises from God that the Jews always thought that it would remain standing until the end of the world. But because one forgets God in great happiness, punishment always follows, as God especially showed in the case of King Nabuchodonosor. Dan. 4, 30.

68 It is also necessary that the princes take action with the monasteries and foundations, so that the great abuse that is in the mass may be stopped. For it is evident how carelessly the mass is treated, and how a great fair is made of it, when St. Paul says: "He that eateth and drinketh unworthily eateth and drinketh judgment to himself, lest he should distinguish the body of the Lord" [1 Cor. 11:27]. Now it is known how it goes on in the churches everywhere, how loose people let themselves be driven to mass for the sake of their bellies. Therefore God punishes the land and the people, as St. Paul also says that many weak and sick people were among the Corinthians because of the abuse of the mass [1 Cor. 11:30].

(69) The princes should also allow ecclesiastical persons to marry. For St. Paul says that they are devilish spirits who forbid marriage; and they should deal with the estates of monasteries and convents in such a way that the poor people who are in foundations or convents are primarily provided for from them.

and not cast out naked, as they are now, and driven out by the murderous peasants.

(Seventy) After that, such goods should be used for the benefit of the poor, especially for schools, so that Christian doctrine could be learned in earnest, and other things that serve to preserve worldly government. For everything that was given to the old monasteries by kings and princes was given so that they could receive Christian teaching, which the bishops did not consider for a long time. Wherever schools are not properly established, unlearned preachers will have to be set up everywhere, who will cause discord and the destruction of all things, as has already happened in many cases. In the same way, there will not be people in the government who are fit to rule.

Seventy-one: Now if the princes were thus kind to their own, and helped that some abuses were done away, it might be hoped that a good word would find a good place, as Solomon saith, Ussporisio mollis rriitiZat irain. Where there are some who do not want to accept the good opinion of the rulers, but continue to exercise their will, take what is theirs from the rich, disgrace their wives and children, and push the rulers to the ground, the rulers should try everything in their power to punish them as murderers; and they should know that they serve God in this, for God has appointed them to prevent murder, Rom. 13:4: "The rulers are God's servants and avengers, to punish the wicked.

022 So David fought against his own son, and slew twenty thousand rebels one day. So he also made war against Siba the rebel.

73. and let the princes pray God, that, since he hath established authority, and they are his servants, he will also preserve, protect, and shield them, for the sake of the poor people, of whom there are still many in all countries, who have no pleasure in rebellion, but would gladly be at rest, and have peace. If one knows what one is doing right and has a good conscience, one should flee to God, who calls Himself a helper in trouble, Ps. 9, 10. But rebels cannot have a good conscience, who have nothing else in mind but robbery and murder. May God grant mercy and peace. For where God does not protect the city, our watch is in vain, Ps. 127, 1.

044 Therefore, if God has given victory, and the murderous mob, which has not wanted peace, is punished according to God's order, let them

The rulers must be moderate, so that nothing unjust happens to the innocent; they must also show mercy to the poor, some of whom have sinned out of fear and some out of foolishness. But it is hard, if it be well, ...to be moderate. But should the lords, as the sensible ones, leave the best in them?)

75. Christ says Matth. 5, 5: "Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth," that is, the world thinks it wants to gain and keep power and riches with revenge and defiance, but God refuses such pokes and gives happiness to the meek, and Solomon says Proverbs 20, 28: "Kindness and faithfulness protect the king, and mercy fortifies his kingdom. For God wants people to show love and to forgive one another, especially the mighty and wise for the weak and foolish, who are in need of love. Therefore he will again forgive us. To give happiness and salvation; and as Paul saith, To the members whom we count unrighteous we put the greatest honour; and to the members which are evil to us we adorn the most. In the same way, the mighty and the wise should deal with the poor, foolish, erring people, and show mercy to those who can be hoped to improve, help them up again, and wait for thanksgiving and reward from God.

Seventy-six: so David, after he had driven out of the land, and had slain his son that stirred up the rebellion, and was restored, said to Jordan, Let no man perish any more, and let live Shimei, which before had cast stones at him in the flight, and cursed him: but David slew no man more, save they that perish in the battle, which should not or could not be spared.

(77) Thus did David, who had the Holy Ghost. When it was necessary, he punished severely, but also showed mercy where he could. The heathen also behaved honorably in such a case. For God has set many examples before the rulers, not only through holy and Jewish princes, but also through pagan ones.

(78) It came to pass in Athens that many honest and wealthy citizens were driven out by thirty men who were in the regiment and who did much valiantly. But the game was turned around, as God does not allow any crime to go on for long, and the citizens who had been driven out returned by God's help and slew the thirty men. Now

I) So the Wittenbergers. It might want to read "see" far.

In the meantime, the properties of the expelled citizens had come into foreign hands; many had also committed other crimes, and during the Thirties had committed outrages against the oppressed citizens. But so that there would be no cause for further bloodshed and for the city to become desolate, it was decided that everyone should forget his loss, and no one would be expelled from the estates or otherwise accused of such an act that had occurred before the Thirty. This resulted in unity and peace in the city, since they forgave each other, and for the sake of common peace many forgave their hereditary estates.

79. so may God have mercy, that the lords also forget their harm, and forgive the poor, and not demand recompense with vehemence.

80 In Sicyon there was a still more praiseworthy thing done. There was a rebel there who was powerful and drove out Aratum, whose parents had ruled before, and thus chased away many other honest citizens. God helped Aratum after many years and punished the rebel, who up to that time had done much to provoke the rebellion, and had committed much murder, and had taken the goods of the citizens who had been driven out to his companions. Now that Aeratus had come back into power, and the citizens who had been driven out were to be given back their property, in the meantime a great change had taken place in the estates through marriages, inheritances, etc., so that it was very difficult to expel all those who were sitting in other people's estates. So he helped to make peace:

81. He borrowed a large sum of money from his friend King Ptolemao in Egypt, and appointed men to act between the rightful lords of the estates and the others, so that whoever wanted to give up estates should be given as much money as they were worth. And if any would not yield, they should make restitution of the money to the other. So everyone was satisfied, and there was joy, and the city prospered again.

82) This is called dealing kindly and nobly with the people; for it is the duty of princes not only to punish the wicked, but also to help the innocent, that they may live in peace and quietness, as St. Paul says. For this reason they should also help to ensure that what is conducive to peace and tranquillity is carried out, so that the courts are properly appointed and the youth is properly educated. The schools also ought to be well ordered, that Christian and other doctrines may be taught, so that the people may be educated to peace and respectability.

(83) Also, the authorities should be concerned that God's word be rightly preached, and that the ordinances be kept. If they changed the customs of the churches, which are against God, God would give them peace and happiness in their government, as He gave Ezekiel and other pious kings, who changed the old customs of worship. For he saith 1 Sam. 2:30. "Him that honoureth me I will honor again; him that despiseth me I will put to shame again."

767 and 768. D. M. Luther's "Exhortation to Peace on the Twelve Articles of the Bauerschaft in Swabia." May 1525.

This writing, which Luther had begun in Eisleben on April 19 in the garden of the Mansfeld chancellor Thür, was published in May by Joseph Klug in Wittenberg under the title: "Crmanunge auff die zwelff artikel der Bawrfchafft ynn Schwaben. Mart. Luther Wittenberg. In the same year, a large number of individual editions came out (the Erlangen edition (2) gives a total of 19 printings), partly in Wittenberg, partly in southern Germany, Nuremberg, Strasbourg and Tübingen, including one in Low German. In the collective editions: in the Wittenberg (1551), vol. II, p. 77; in the Jena (1556), vol. III, p. 118; in the Altenburg, vol. III, p. 114; in the Leipzig, vol. XIX, p. 253; in the Erlanger (I), vol. 24, p. 259, and in the second edition of the same, vol. 24, p. 271. We have followed the text of the latter, comparing the Wittenberg and the Jena. Namely, we have quoted the scriptural passages, as these, according to the Bible. The refutation of the twelve articles, which Walch had separated from this writing as No. 768, we have reunited with it.

(1) The peasants who have now gathered in Swabia have written twelve articles of their unmistakable grievances against the authorities, and have undertaken to establish them with several sayings of Scripture, and to have them printed. In the twelfth article, they offer to gladly and willingly accept better instruction where it is lacking and necessary, and they want to be instructed, as long as this is done by clear, public, undeniable sayings of Scripture; as it is right and just that no one's conscience be instructed and instructed further or differently than with divine Scripture.

(2) Now if this is their earnestness and simple-minded opinion, as it is not otherwise to be interpreted by me, because they give themselves freely to the day with the same articles and do not want to shun the light, then there is still good hope that it will turn out well. And to me, as one that is is reckoned among those who act divine Scripture now on earth, but especially if they call me by name in the other note and appoint me, it gives all the greater courage and confidence to give my instruction, friendly Christian opinion, according to brotherly love duty, also to the day publicly, lest by my silence I also be assigned and laid open before God and the world, if some mischief and accident should arise from it.

003 But if such things be offered of them only for colour and appearance, as there are no doubt some of that kind among them; for it is not possible that so great a number should be all true Christians, and have good opinion, but that a great part of the rest should need good opinion for their will, and seek their own under it; such, no doubt, will not succeed much, or ever succeed to their great hurt and everlasting destruction.

4. Because this matter is great and annual, as it concerns both God's kingdom and the world's kingdom; for if this rebellion should continue and gain the upper hand, both kingdoms would fall, that neither worldly rule nor divine word, but an eternal disturbance of the whole German land would follow: So it is necessary that we speak and counsel freely about it, no one regarded; again, that we also listen willingly, and let ourselves be told once, so that our hearts are not hardened and our ears blocked, as has happened so far, God's wrath gains its full course and momentum. For as many cruel signs as have hitherto occurred in heaven and on earth, a great calamity exists and indicates a great change in German lands, even though we unfortunately turn little away from it, but God nevertheless continues and will one day soften our hard heads.

To the princes and lords.

001 First, let us thank no man on earth for this mischief and sedition, but you princes and lords, especially you blind bishops and foolish priests and monks, who, still hardened this day, do not cease from raging and raging against the holy gospel, though you know it is right, and

(And you could not disprove it) and do no more in the worldly government than to flay and cherish your splendor and haughtiness, until the poor common man cannot bear it any longer. The sword is upon your necks; yet you think you sit so firmly in the saddle, you may not be lifted out. Such certainty and presumption will break your necks, and you will see it. I have told you before many times, beware of the saying, Ps. 107:40: DMnait oontomptum super? rinoip68, "he poureth contempt upon 2) princes." ! You struggle for it, and want to be struck on the head, no warning nor admonition helps for it.

002 Well then, because ye are the cause of this wrath of God, it shall surely come upon you, if ye mend not your ways in time. The signs in heaven and the wonders on earth are for you, dear sirs; they do not signify any good to you, nor will any good happen to you. There is already a great part of wrath that God sends so many false teachers and prophets among us, so that we may first richly deserve hell and eternal damnation through error and blasphemy. The other part is also present, that the peasants are rooting themselves out, from which, where God does not defend us, moved by our repentance, ruin, disturbance and devastation of the German land must follow through horrible murder and bloodshed.

For this ye ought to know, good sirs, that God maketh it so, that ye cannot, nor will, nor shall your wantonness endure the length thereof. You must become different and yield to God's word. If you do not do it in a kind and willing way, you must do it in a mighty and pernicious way. If these peasants do not do it, others must do it. And though ye smite them all, yet are they undefeated; God will raise up others. For he will smite you, and smite you he will. It is not peasants, dear lords, who set themselves against you; it is God Himself who sets Himself against you to punish your desolation. There are some un-

1) In the old editions: "announces".

2) The Erlanger Vorlage offers: "over", but the first Psalter translation of 1524, the Wittenberg and the Jena editions read: "from", like our Bible.

They said to you that they would set the country and the people to work to destroy the Lutheran doctrine. How do you think? if you had been your own prophets, and had already set about the country and the people? Do not jest with God, dear sirs. The Jews also said, > "We have no king" [John 19:15], and it has become such a serious matter that they must be without a king forever.

004 But that ye might still further sin, and perish without all mercy, some have looked, and blamed the gospel, saying, This is the fruit of my doctrine. Nay, nay, blaspheme quickly, good sirs, ye will not know what I have taught, and what the gospel is. But he is at the door, who will soon teach you, if you do not amend your ways. You and everyone must bear me witness that I have taught with all silence, have fought fiercely against rebellion, and have kept and admonished the subjects with the greatest diligence for obedience and honor, even to your tyrannical and praising authority, since this rebellion cannot come from me, but the prophets of murder, who are as dear to me as they are to you, have come among this rabble, so that they have now been gone longer than three years, and no one has so nearly flourished and resisted as I alone.

005 If therefore God will punish you, and cause the devil by his false prophets to stir up a mad mob against you, and perhaps will that I should no more resist, nor be able: what can I or my gospel do thereto? Which hitherto, and yet, hath not only suffered your persecutions, and murders, and ravings, but hath also pleaded for you, that your sovereignty should help to protect and administer it among the common man.

006 And if I had a mind to revenge myself on you, I would laugh in my fist now, and watch the peasants, or even strike at them, and help to make things worse; but let my God keep me for that, as before. Therefore, my dear sirs, whether you are enemies or friends, I humbly ask you not to despise my loyalty, even though I am a poor man. Nor despise this sedition, that I pray. Not that I respect or fear that they should be too powerful for you, nor do I want you to be afraid of them for that reason.

But fear God, behold his wrath: if he punish you as ye have deserved, as I have done, he punisheth you, though the number of the peasants were a hundred times less: he can turn stones into peasants, and again, and by one peasant slay an hundred of yours, that all your armour and strength shall be too little for you.

007 Now if ye have any counsel, my lords, for God's sake give way a little to wrath. Let a cartload of hay give way to a drunken man; how much more should you cease from raving and unruly tyranny, and act with reason toward the peasants than toward the drunken or the insane. Do not start a quarrel with them, for you do not know where the end will be. Seek amicably beforehand, for you do not know what God will do, lest a spark be kindled and set all Germany on fire, so that no one can extinguish it. Our sins are there before God, because of which we have to fear His wrath, even if only one leaf rustles, let alone if such a crowd stirs. For ye lose nothing with goodness, and if ye lose any thing, it may be restored unto you tenfold in peace; for in strife ye may lose both body and estate. Why do you want to give yourselves up to the chase, if you could do more good with other good ways?

008 They have set forth twelve articles, among which some are so just and right, that they take away your glory from God and from the world, and make the Psalms true, that they pour contempt upon princes. But they are almost all set on their profit and their good, and not set on their best. I would have had other articles to put against you, which concern Germany and the regiment in general, as I have done in the book to the German nobility, which would have been more appropriate. But because you have thrown them to the wind, you must now hear and suffer such self-serving articles, and it serves you just as well as it should not be said to them.

009 The first article, where they desire to hear the gospel, and the right to choose a pastor, ye cannot with some appearance refuse. Although their own profit is involved in their pretending to receive tithes from such a priest, who is not a priest.

But if it is theirs, this is the sum of preaching the gospel to them. No authority can or should oppose this. Yes, authority should not prevent what anyone wants to teach and believe, whether it be the gospel or lies; it is enough that it prevents sedition and discord.

(10) The other articles, which refer to bodily burdens, such as the death of the body, taxes, and the like, are also just and right. For the government is not instituted to seek its benefit and good will in the subjects, but to provide benefit and the best for the subjects. Now it is not a length of time that they should be so unprofitable and so unjust. What good would it do if a farmer's field yielded as many guilders as stalks and grains, if the lordship only took more and more, and thus made his splendor greater and greater, and the manor were to be flung about with clothes, food, drink, building, and the like, as if it were chaff? They should take in the wealth and stop the spending, so that a poor man might keep some. You have heard further instruction from their notes, for they have made their grievances abundantly clear.

To the building community.

(1) Hitherto, beloved friends, ye have heard nothing else, but that I confess that it is alas all too true and certain that the princes and lords who forbid the preaching of the gospel, and who so blatantly afflict the people, are worthy and well deserving that God should overthrow them from the throne, as those who greatly sin against God and men; neither have they any excuse. Nothing less is to be prescribed for you, that you may do your things in good conscience and right. For if you have a good conscience, you have the comforting advantage that God will stand by you and help you through it. And even though you may for a time refuse to do it, or even though you may die for it, you will at last be forgiven, and your soul will be preserved for ever with all its saints. But if ye have not right, nor a good conscience, ye must perish: and though ye have temporally prevailed, and slain all princes, yet in the end ye shall be eternally lost in body and soul. Therefore is it unto you

Do not joke here; body and soul are eternally on your side. And the most important thing is to be aware of this, and to look at it with all seriousness, not only how powerful you are, and how great a wrong they do, but how good a right and conscience you have.

(2) Therefore my friendly, brotherly request is, dear lords and brethren, watch diligently what ye do, and believe not all manner of spirits and preachers, now that the wicked Satan hath awakened many wild riotous and murderous spirits under the name of the gospel, and filled the world therewith. Hear then, and be told, as ye then offer yourselves manifoldly. I will not spare you my faithful warning, as I am bound to do. Whether some, poisoned by the spirits of murder, will hate me for it and call me a hypocrite, I will not inquire; it is enough for me whether I save some of your good-hearted, righteous ones from the journey of divine wrath. I will fear the others so little, though they despise me; neither shall they harm me; I know one greater and mightier than they are, who teacheth me thus Ps. 3:17: "I fear not many hundred thousand that are set about against me." My defiance shall endure their defiance, that verily I know.

First of all, brethren, you take the name of God, and call yourselves a Christian group or association, and pretend that you want to act according to the divine law. Well then, you also know that God's name, word, and title are not to be used in vain or uselessly, as he says in the other commandment, Exodus 20:7, "You shall not use the name of God your Lord uselessly," and he adds, "For God is not to be used uselessly. 8]: "For God will not let him be innocent who takes His name in vain." Here the text stands bright and clear, which concerns you as well as all men, and, notwithstanding your great multitude, right and terror, dreads his wrath both for you, and for us, and for all others.

004 He is also, as ye know, mighty and strong enough unto you, to punish you, as he doth here, where ye take his name in vain and uselessly; that no happiness, but all mischief, is waiting for you, where ye are.

If he be false to his name, know ye how to judge, and be ye kindly warned. It is an evil thing for him to strangle or hinder so many peasants, who drown the whole world with the flood of sin, and sink Sodoma with fire. He is an almighty, terrible God.

005 Secondly, that ye are they which uselessly lead and profane the name of God, is easily proved; and that therefore in the end all calamities shall befall you, there is no doubt, except God be true. For here is the word of God speaking through the mouth of Christ [Matt. 26:52, P "He that taketh the sword shall perish by the sword." This is no different than that no one should submit to violence with his own iniquity, but as Paul says [Rom. 13:1]: "Let every soul be subject to authority with fear and honor.

(6) How could you, before these sayings and judgments of God, who pride yourselves on following divine law, and yet take the sword yourselves, and rebel against the authority ordained by God? Do you not think that the judgment of St. Paul, Rom. 13:2, will come upon you: "Whoever resists God's order will be condemned"? That is to use God's name uselessly, to pretend to be doing God's right, and yet to strive against God's right under the same name. Oh, beware, dear sirs, it will not come to this in the end.

007 Third, Yea, say ye, the authorities are too wicked and unjust, because they will not let us have the gospel, and press us too hard into burdens of temporal goods, and so destroy us both in body and soul. I answer, That the authorities are wicked and unjust, excuseth neither rebellion nor sedition. For the punishment of wickedness does not belong to any one, but to the temporal authorities who wield the sword, as Paul says in Romans 13:4 and Peter in 1 Epistle 2:14, that they are ordained by God to punish the wicked. So there is also the natural law, and the law of all the earth, that no man should be his own judge, nor avenge himself. For the saying is true: He who strikes back is unjust. Item, who like

...and he that smiteth him maketh strife. Divine right agrees with this, and says Deut. 32:35: "Vengeance is mine, I will repay, saith the Lord." Now you may not deny that your rebellion is such that you make yourselves judges, and avenge yourselves, and will not suffer injustice. This is not only against Christian law and the gospel, but also against natural law and all equity.

(8) Now, if you are to stand firm in your undertaking, and yet you have both divine and Christian law in the New and Old Testaments, even natural law against you, you must bring up a new, special command from God, confirmed with signs and wonders, which will give you power to do this and will be called. Otherwise, God will not let his word and order be broken by your own iniquity, but because you praise divine law and yet go against it, he will have you, as those who bring his name to shame, fall and punish you most horribly and condemn you eternally, as was said above.

009 For here also it is according to the saying of Christ, Matt. 7:3, that ye see the mote that is in the eye of the rulers, and see not the beam that is in your own eye: according to the saying of St. Paul, Rom. 3:8, Let us do evil, that good may follow; which condemnation is just and right. For the authorities do wrong, it is true, that they hinder the gospel, and weigh you down in temporal goods. But much more do ye wrong, that ye not only reject the word of God, but also trample it under foot, and encroach upon its power and right, and also pass over God, and take from the authorities their power and right also, yea, all that they have; for what keep they, if they have lost their power?

010 I set you yourselves judges here, and put it to your judgment which robber is the worst: whether it be he that taketh away a great piece of another's goods, and yet leaveth him something; or he that taketh away all that he hath, and the body with it? The rulers take from you your goods, that is, a piece. Again, you take from them their power, in which all their goods, life, and limb, stand. Therefore are ye much greater robbers than they.

...and intend it worse than they have done. Yea, say you, we will leave them body and goods enough. Whosoever will, I'll not believe it. He that dareeth so much wrong as to take away a man's power, the greatest and chiefest part of it, shall not leave it; he shall take away the other and least part of it also. If the wolf eats a whole sheep, he will certainly eat an ear of it. And even if you were so pious that you left them enough body and goods, nevertheless this is all too much robbery and injustice, that you take the best, namely the power, and make yourselves masters over them. God will judge you to be the greatest robbers.

011 Can ye not think, or reckon, my good friends, that if your conduct were right, every one would be a judge against another, and there would be no authority, nor rule, nor order, nor justice, in the world, but murder and bloodshed? For as soon as he saw that any man had wronged him, he would come and judge and punish him himself. Now if this is unjust and cannot be done by a single person, it cannot be done by a mob or a group. But if it is to be inflicted on a mob or a group, it cannot be justly or rightly denied to the individual. For the cause is the same on both sides, namely, injustice.

012 And how would ye do, if such iniquity were begun in your company, that every one should set himself against another, and take vengeance on his offender? Would ye suffer it? Would ye not say, Let him judge and avenge others that are set by you? How then will ye stand before God and the world, judging and avenging yourselves against your offenders, yea, against your sovereignty, ordained of God?

013 Now all this is said of the common law, divine and natural, which the heathen, the Turk, and the Jew also must keep, if peace and order be otherwise in the world. And if ye keep all these things, yet do ye no better than the heathen and the Turk. For not to judge nor to avenge oneself, but to leave such things to the power and authority, makes no one a Christian.

Whether gladly or unwillingly. But because ye go contrary to this law, ye are manifestly worse than the heathen and the Turk, let alone that ye should be Christians. But what think ye that Christ will say to this, that ye bear his name, and call yourselves a Christian company, when ye are so far from it, ye do and live so abominably contrary to his law, that ye are not yet worthy to be called Gentiles or Turks, but much worse than they that are contrary to divine and natural law, which are common to all the heathen?

014 Behold, good friends, what manner of preachers ye have, how they mean your souls. I fear that there have come among you some prophets of murder, who would gladly become lords of the world through you, for which they have long since striven; and they ask not that they may lead you in body, and in estate, and in honour, and in soul, both temporally and eternally. If you now wish to do divine justice, as you boast, then do it, for God says, [Deut. 32:35], "Vengeance is mine, I will repay"; item [1 Pet. 2:18], "Be subject not only to good lords, but also to evil ones." If ye do it, well; if ye do it not, ye may do evil, but it shall come upon you at last, let no man doubt it: for God is just, and will not suffer it. Therefore beware of your freedom, lest you run away from the rain and fall into the water; and if you think you will become free in body, then you will lose your body, your goods and your soul forever. The wrath of God is upon you, be afraid, I counsel you; false prophets have the devil sent among you, beware of them.

015 Now therefore let us also speak of the Christian and evangelical law, which bindeth not the heathen, as the former. For if ye boast, and gladly hear that ye are called Christians, and desire to be accounted so, ye shall also suffer your law to be reproached unto you. Listen now, dear Christians, to your Christian right. Thus saith your most high Lord, Christ, whose name ye bear, Matt. 5:39-41, Ye shall not resist evil: but whosoever shall compel thee to go a mile, go with him two miles. And whosoever taketh away thy coat, let him have it also.

56 ErI. (2.) 24,283-285. sec. 2. of the outbreak of the peasant revolt. No. 767 f. w. xvi, 72-74. 57
Rock. And he that smote thee on one cheek, turn the other also to him. "

016 Hear ye, O Christian assembly? How rhyme ye your nobleness with this right? Ye will not suffer evil and wrong to be done unto you, but be free, and suffer only good and right; and Christ saith, Let no evil or wrong be withstood, but let it always be withstood, suffered, and taken. If ye will not bear this right, rather put away the Christian name from you, and boast of another that is according to your doings; or Christ himself will take away his name from you, which shall be too grievous for you.

017 So saith St. Paul Romans 12:19, "Avenge not yourselves, beloved, but rather give place unto the wrath of God:" 2 Corinthians 11:19, 20, he commendeth the Corinthians, that they suffer gladly when any man smiteth or robbeth them; 1 Corinthians 6:7, he reproveth them, that they judge for good, and suffer not injustice. Yea, our Duke Jesus Christ saith Matt. 5:44, "We ought to wish good to them that offend us, and to pray for our persecutors, and to love our enemies, and to do good to our transgressors." These are our Christian rights, dear friends.

018 Now therefore see how far the false prophets have led you away, and have called you Christians, when they have made you worse than the heathen. For by these sayings a child may well understand that Christian justice is: not to resist injustice, not to take up the sword, not to resist, not to revenge, but to go forth, body and soul, that he who robs may rob; for we have enough in our Lord, who will not leave us as he has promised. Suffering, suffering, cross, cross, is the Christian's right, and no other.

019 But now therefore ye fight for temporal goods, and will not leave the garment for the mantle, but repeat the mantle: when then will ye die, and leave the body, or love your enemies, or do good? O of loose Christians! Dear friends, Christians are not so mean that so many should be gathered together in one heap; it is a strange bird about a Christian; would to God we were the more part good, pious heathens who held the natural law, I'll keep silent of the Christian.

020 I will also tell you some examples of the Christian law, that ye may see whither the foolish prophets have led you. Consider St. Peter in the garden, who sought to defend his Lord Christ with the sword, and cut off the ear of Malcho. Tell me, who can? Was not Peter right in this? Was it not a grievous wrong that they should take from Christ not only his goods, but also his life? Yes, they not only took away his body and his goods, but by so doing they utterly suppressed the gospel, by which they were to be saved, and so deprived them of the kingdom of heaven. You have not yet suffered all such injustice, dear friends.

021 Now behold what Christ doeth and teacheth here. How great such an injustice was, yet he defends St. Peter, and calls him to take the sword, and will not suffer him to avenge or defend such an injustice. For this he passes a fatal sentence on him, as on a murderer, and says, "He that taketh the sword shall perish by the sword." Then we must grasp that it is not enough if someone does us wrong, and we have good cause and right, but we must also have the right and power of the sword, commanded by God to punish such. For this also a Christian must suffer, if the gospel be withheld from him; otherwise it is possible to withhold the gospel from any man, as we shall hear.

(22) Another example: Christ Himself, what does He do, when His life is taken from Him on the cross, and with it He lays down His ministry, for which He was sent by God Himself, to do good to souls? [Is.61,1.] This he does, as St. Peter sI. Ep. 2, 23J says: "He put it in the home of the one who judges rightly", and he suffered such grievous injustice. Above this he prayed for his persecutors, saying [Luc.23:34J: "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do." Now that you are true Christians, you must truly do likewise, and follow this example. If ye do not, let the Christian name and the glory of the Christian law soon perish. For then ye are certainly not Christians, butbut against Christ and his right, against doctrine and example.

1) "he" is missing in the Erlanger.

023 But if ye do, ye shall soon see God's wonders, that he will help you, as he did Christ, whom he smelled after the consummation of his passion, so that his gospel and kingdom prevailed and prevailed with power, in defiance of all his enemies. So would he also help you, that his gospel might spring up with power among you, if ye would first go forth, and give him the matter home, and withstand his vengeance. But if you yourselves fall into it, and would not conquer and keep it with suffering, but with your fist, you will hinder his vengeance, and will make it so that you will keep neither the gospel nor the fist.

024 I must also count myself as a present example of this time. The pope and the emperor have set and raged against me. Now how have I come to this, that the more the pope and emperor have raged, the more my gospel has passed away? I have never drawn a sword nor sought vengeance, I have not started a riot nor a rebellion, but have helped the temporal authorities, even those who persecuted the gospel and me, to defend their power and honor as much as I could. But in this I have remained secret to God, and have always relied on his hand in spite of myself. For this reason, in defiance of both the pope and all tyrants, he has not only kept me alive (which many, and rightly so, consider a great miracle, and I myself must also confess), but has allowed my gospel to increase more and more. Now you fall into my way, wanting to help the gospel, and do not see that you are hindering and suppressing it in the highest way.

025 All this I say, my dear friends, to warn you faithfully, that ye speak out in this matter of the Christian name, and of the glory of Christian right. For, be ye right as ye will, it behoveth no Christian to be right, nor to fight, but to suffer injustice, and to suffer evil; which is not otherwise, 1 Cor. 6:7. As ye yourselves confess in the preface, that all who believe in Christ become sweet, peaceable, patient, and of one mind. But by the deed ye vainly prove.

Impatience, strife, and evil against your own word. You would call those patient who do not want to suffer injustice or evil, but only right and good. But that is a fine patience, which even a knave can endure, let alone a man of faith.

026 Wherefore again I say, I will let your cause be as good and as right as it can be; but because ye will defend it yourselves, and suffer neither violence nor injustice, ye may do and forbear what God doth not forbid you. But the Christian name, the Christian name, I say, let it remain, and do not make it the cover of shame of your impatient, unpeaceful, unchristian conduct; I will not let you have it nor grant it to you, but tear both off from you with writings and words according to my ability, as long as a vein stirs in my body. For you will not succeed, nor will you be ruined in body and soul.

27. Not that I would justify or defend the authorities in their unmistakable injustice, which ye suffer; for they are and do grievous injustice, I confess; but this I will: Wherefore ye will not let both these things be rejected, and (as God is for) sit down together, and meet together, that on no part shall they be called Christians, but, as otherwise in the course of the world, one people contendeth with another, and (as it is said) that God punisheth one wicked man with another. Of this kind and name will I reckon you, whether it come to the dispute (which God graciously turneth), that the authorities may know how they dispute not against Christians, but against heathen; and ye also know that ye dispute not as Christians, but as heathen against the authorities. For Christians do not fight for themselves with the sword, nor with guns, but with the cross and suffering, just as their duke, Christ, does not wield the sword, but hangs on the coffin. Therefore also their victory does not stand in obedience and dominion or force, but in defeat and powerlessness; as St. Paul says 2 Cor. 10:4, "The weapons of our knighthood are not bodily, but mighty in God," and again, "Strength is made perfect through powerlessness."

028 Now therefore your title and your name shall be this, that ye are the people that contending that they will not suffer wrong nor evil, as nature giveth; the name ye shall bear, and the name of Christ ye shall leave in peace. For this also is your work, and so do ye. If ye will not keep the name, but keep the Christian name, then I have no other understanding of the matter, but that it be unto me; and I will reckon and hold you to be enemies, who seek to hinder or suppress my gospel, more than the pope and the emperor have done hitherto, because ye go against the gospel in the name of the gospel, and do so.

(29) Again, I will not save you from what I will do. I will place the matter in God's hands, dare to take it on by the grace of God, and rely on him in defiance, as I have done so far against the pope and emperor, and pray for you that he will enlighten you and stand against your presumption, so that he will not let it happen. For I see that the devil, if he has not yet been able to kill me through the pope, seeks to destroy and devour me through the bloodthirsty prophets of murder and the spirits of the mob that are among you. Well, let him eat me, and his belly shall be tight enough with it, that I know. And though you win, yet shall you not much enjoy it. But I humbly and kindly beseech you to consider carefully, and so hold that I have no need of such defiance and prayer to God against you.

030 For though I am a poor, sinful man, yet I know and am sure that in this case I have a right cause when I contend for the Christian name, and pray that it may not be profaned. So also I am certain that my prayer is acceptable before God and will be heard. For He Himself taught us to pray in this way in the Lord's Prayer, where we say, "Let your name be hallowed" [Matt. 6:9], and forbid to profane it in the other commandment [Deut. 20:7]. Therefore I pray that ye will not despise such a prayer of mine, and of all them that pray with me. For it will be too powerful for you, and will awaken God against you, as St. Jacob says [chap. 5:16]: "The righteous prayer is able to do much where it endures," as Elijah's prayer did. And we also have the comforting promise of God that He will save us.

wants to hear, John 14:14: "Whatsoever ye shall ask in my name, that will I do"; and 1 John 5:14: "If we ask anything according to his will, he heareth us."

31. You cannot have such comfort and confidence to ask, because your conscience and the Scriptures convince you that your conduct is pagan and not Christian, and acts under the name of the gospel against the gospel and to the dishonor of the Christian name. I also know that none of you has ever asked nor called upon God in this matter, nor can you yet. For you must not lift up your eyes against him in the matter, but only defy him with your fists, which you have gathered together out of impatience and ill will, which will not go well with you.

If you were Christians, you would leave off fist and sword, defiance and anger, and go to Our Father, and with prayer promote your cause to God, and say: Match. 6,10.: "Thy will be done"; item, v. 13.: "Deliver us from evil, Amen." As you see, in the Psalter the true saints bear and lament their distress before God, and seek help from Him, not defending themselves nor resisting evil. Such prayer would have helped you more in all your troubles than if the world were full of you. Have also a good conscience and comforting confidence that you will be heard, as his promises are, 1 Tim. 4:10, "He is the helper of all men, especially of them that believe"; and Ps. 50:15, "Call upon me in trouble, and I will help thee"; and Ps. 91:15, "He hath called upon me, and I will hear him; I am with him in trouble, and I will pluck him out."

033 Behold, this is the right Christian way to be delivered from calamity and evil, namely, to endure and to call upon God. But because ye do none of these things, neither calling, nor forbearing, but helping yourselves with your own power, and making yourselves your God and Saviour, God must not and cannot be your God nor Saviour.

1) In the Wittenberg: "federn," which, as Dietz 8. v. indicates, can mean both "fordern" and "fördern"; we have preferred the latter meaning on account of the preposition "bei." Jenaer: "fordern"; Erlanger: "fodern"; a codex: "fürdern".

be. So you also, as pagans and blasphemers, may accomplish something, if God decrees it, for which we ask, but not that, for your eternal and temporal destruction. But as Christians or evangelicals you will gain nothing, I would bet a thousand necks on it.

(34) From this it is easy to answer all your articles. For though they were all naturally right and just, yet ye have forgotten the Christian right, that ye have not conquered and executed them with patience and prayer to God, as Christian men ought;) but with your own impatience and iniquity have undertaken to dissuade the superiority, and to compel them by force; which also is contrary to the law of the land and natural equity.

035 And he that wrote your articles is not a pious and upright man. For he hath drawn many chapters out of the scriptures in the margin, as the articles ought to be founded; and yet he keepeth the pulp in his mouth, and leaveth the sayings without, that he may make a pretence of his wickedness, and of your pretensions, to seduce you, and to stir you up, and to make you go astray. For these chapters, when they are read, do not speak much of your wickedness, but rather of the contradiction that you should live and drive in a Christian way. There may be a prophet of the Romans who will seek his strength through you in the gospel; may God prevent him and keep you from him.

036 In the first place, that ye in the preface anticipate and boast how ye will not be rebellious, but excuse yourselves, that ye desire to teach and live according to the gospel, 2c. your own mouth and work punish you. For ye confess that ye roll and revolt, and desire to beautify this with the gospel. Thus you have heard above that the gospel teaches Christians to suffer and to tolerate injustice, and to pray to God in all kinds of distress. But ye will not suffer, but, like the heathen, compel the authorities according to your will and impatience.

037 Ye also bring forth the children of Israel for an example, that God heareth their cry, and

d) "have" is missing from the Erlanger.

I have redeemed them. Why do you not keep the same example of which you boast? Call ye also thus unto God, and wait until he send you also a Moses, who shall shew you by signs and wonders that he is sent of God. The children of Israel did not put themselves to the sword against Pharaoh, neither did they help themselves, as ye have done. Therefore such an example is a reproach to you, and a condemnation to you, who boast of it, and yet do the contrary.

038 Neither is it true that ye boast that ye teach and live according to the gospel. There is not one article that teaches any part of the gospel, but all is directed to your having your body and goods free. And, in sum, they all set up worldly and temporal things, that ye should have power and goods, that ye should suffer no unrighteousness; whereas the gospel takes no notice of worldly things at all, and sets up the outward life only in suffering, unrighteousness, the cross, patience, and contempt of temporal goods and life.

039 How then doth the gospel rhyme with you? without seeking the appearance thereof of your unevangelical and unchristian conduct, and seeing not how ye thereby revile the holy gospel of Christ, and make it a cover of shame. Therefore you must change your position here, and either abandon this matter altogether, and commit yourselves to suffer such injustice, if you wish to be and be called Christians; or, if you wish to carry out the matter, put forward another name, and not be called and respected as Christians; there is no remedy, and will not be otherwise.

040 It is true that ye are right in that ye desire the gospel, if ye be otherwise earnest. Yea, I will make this article more severe than ye yourselves do, saying thus, It is ever an offence to shut up heaven to any man, and to cast him into hell by force: for no man shall suffer such things, neither shall he let a hundred necks pass over them. But he that rejecteth me the gospel shutteth heaven unto me, and forceth me into hell: because there is no other way nor means to salvation but the gospel, I shall not suffer this for the loss of my soul.

Forty-one: Behold, is not justice proved strong enough? It doth not yet follow that I am

I will set my fist against the authorities that do such wrong to me. Thus speakest thou: How then shall I both suffer and not suffer? Here it is easy to answer, "It is impossible for anyone to be denied the gospel. Neither is there any power in heaven or earth that can do this. For it is a public doctrine, which passeth freely under heaven, and is not bound to any place, as the star which shewed the birth of Christ to the wise men of the east, walking in the air.

042 It is true that cities, places, and regions, where the gospel is, or where preachers are, the lords of those places may well resist. But thou mayest leave the same city or place, and run after the gospel into another place; and it is not necessary that thou shouldest take or keep the city or place also for the gospel's sake; but let the Lord have his city, and follow the gospel; and so thou shalt suffer wrong to be done thee, and shun thee; and at the same time thou shalt not suffer the gospel to be taken from thee, or to be hindered. Behold, the two things come to pass, suffering and not suffering. Otherwise, though thou wouldest keep the city with the gospel, thou robest the lord of the city of his own, and pretendest that thou doest it for the gospel. But the gospel teacheth thee neither to rob nor to take, even though the lord of the manor usurp it against God, and unjustly, and to the hurt of it. The gospel must not be kept in a physical place or in a city; it must and will remain in the heart.

43 Christ taught this in Matthew 10:23: "If they drive you out of one city, flee into another. He saith not, If they drive you out of one city, tarry in it, and take it up for the praise of the gospel, and be cut off against the rulers of the city, as they will and teach now; but, "Flee ye always into another, until the Son of man come." 2c. "For I tell you, ye shall not align all the cities until the Son of man come."

(44) Thus saith he also Matt. 23:34, that the wicked shall drive out his evangelists from city to city. St. Paul also says in 1 Corinthians 4:11: "We are not in any place.

Luther's Works. Vol. XVI.

certain place." If, then, a Christian must always move from one place to another for the sake of the gospel, leaving everything he has and where he is, or if he sits uncertainly and waits all hours, he is doing just as a Christian should do. For because he will not suffer the gospel to be taken from him or to be withheld, he suffers cities, places, goods, and all that he is and has to be taken from him and withheld. Where then rhymes your nobility, which take and keep cities and places that are not yours, and will not suffer them to be taken from you, but take them from their natural masters, and resist them? What manner of Christians are these that become robbers, thieves, and husks for the gospel's sake, and say that they are evangelicals?

^Relocation of the twelve articles of the permanent chest. ^

On the first article.

A whole congregation shall have power to elect and remove a pastor. This article is right, if only it were applied in a Christian manner, so that the chapters, as indicated in the margin, would serve no purpose. If the goods of the parish come from the authorities and not from the congregation, then the congregation may not give the same goods to the one it chooses, for that would be robbed and taken away; but, if it wants to have a parish priest, it must first humbly request such from the authorities. If the authorities do not wish to do so, they should choose one of their own, and feed him from their own goods, and leave the authorities their goods, or obtain them from them by right. If, however, the authorities do not wish to suffer their chosen and nourished pastor, let him flee to another city, and let anyone who wishes flee with him, as Christ teaches. That is, to choose and have a Christian and evangelical pastor of one's own. Anyone who does otherwise is acting unchristian, like a robber and an outlaw.

I) This title is found in the Jena edition. In the table of contents, Walch recognizes it as a mistake that the following is made into a special number, since it belongs to the preceding number.

To the other article.

The tithes are to be distributed to the parish priest and poor people, and the rest is to be kept for the country's needs 2c. This article is vain robbery and public thievery. For they want to seize the tithe, which is not theirs but the authority's, and do what they want with it. Not so, my dear friends, that is to say, that the authorities are entirely deposed, since in the preface you stipulate that no one is to be deprived of what is theirs. If you want to give and do good, do it from your good, as the wise man says; for God says through Isaiah: "I hate the sacrifice that comes from robbery" [Is. 61, 8J.

You speak in this article as if you were already lords of the land, and had taken all the goods of the sovereignty to yourselves, and would neither be subject to anyone nor give them to anyone. By this you may take hold of what you have in mind. Gentlemen, cease, cease, you shall not end. The chapters of Scripture, which your false preacher and false prophet has smeared in the margin, do not help you, but are against you.

On the third article.

There shall be no bondman, because Christ hath made us all free. What is this? That is making Christian liberty quite carnal. Did not Abraham and other patriarchs and prophets also have serfs? Read St. Paul, what he teaches about servants, who were all serfs at that time. Therefore this article is contrary to the gospel, and is a robbery, that every man should take his own body, which is his own, from his lord. For a bondman may be a Christian, and have Christian liberty, even as a prisoner or a sick man is a Christian, and yet is not free. This article seeks to make all men equal, and to turn the spiritual kingdom of Christ into a worldly, external kingdom, which is impossible. For a worldly kingdom cannot stand where there is not inequality in persons, that some are free, some are captives, some are masters, some are subjects 2c. As St. Paul says in Gal. 3:28, that in Christ master and servant are one thing. Of this my lord and friend, Urban Rhegius, hath written well and enough; thou mayest read further.

Watch out for the owers*) Article.

The other articles, about the freedom of game, birds, fish, wood, forests, about services, interest, taxes, fees/death 2c., I leave to the legal experts. For it is not for me, as an evangelist, to judge and adjudicate in this matter. I am to instruct and teach the consciences about divine and Christian matters; there are books enough about this in imperial law. I have said above that such things do not concern a Christian; he does not ask for them, he lets rob, take, press, torture, scrape, eat, and rage, whoever he wants, for he is a martyr on earth. For this reason, the community here should also bear the Christian name with peace, and act under the name as those who would like to have human and natural justice, not as those who sought Christian justice, which means that they stand still in all these matters, suffer, and complain to God alone.

Behold, my lords and friends, this is my instruction, which ye desired of me in another note; and I pray you, remember your offering, that ye may be gladly instructed in the scriptures. Now when this comes to you, do not cry out so soon, Luther pretends to the prince, he speaks against the gospel. Read first, and see my reason from the Scriptures, for it is for you. I am excused before God and the world. I know well the false prophets that are among you: obey them not; they deceive you indeed. They do not mean your consciences, but would gladly make Galatians of you, so that they might gain goods and honors through you, and afterward be eternally damned in hell with you.

Admonition both to the Superior and Bauerschast.

001 Now, gentlemen, since there is nothing Christian on either side, nor is there any Christian matter pending between you, but both lords and peasants have to do with pagan or worldly right and wrong, and with temporal good, and both sides are acting against God.

1) Not "nine," for in the 12th article the peasants demand nothing, but offer to be instructed.

2) "Zeise" is as much as Accise, vketiZal, tridutuin.

and are under his wrath, as you have heard: let yourselves be told and advised for God's sake, and attack the things as such things are to be attacked, that is, with justice, and not with violence nor with strife, lest you cause an infinite shedding of blood in German lands. For since you are both unjust in part and want to avenge and protect yourselves, you will ruin yourselves on both sides, and God will push one boy against the other.

002 Ye lords have the scriptures and history against you, as tyrants are punished, that even the heathen poets write, as tyrants die seldom of dry death, but are commonly strangled, and perish in blood. Because it is certain that you rule tyrannically and maliciously, forbidding the gospel and thus oppressing and oppressing the poor man, you have no consolation or hope, except that you perish as your peers have perished. Behold all kingdoms, how they have come to an end by the sword, as Assyria, Persia, Greece, Rome, and so on, all of which have perished at last, even as they perished others before. So that God proves that he is judge on earth and leaves no injustice unpunished. For this reason nothing more certain than judgment lies on your neck, whether now or hereafter, if you do not amend.

(3) You peasants also have scripture and experience against you, that no rebellion has ever come to a good end; and God has always kept this word strictly: "He who takes the sword shall perish by the sword" Math. 26, 52/. Because you do wrong by judging and avenging yourselves, and because you use the Christian name unworthily, you are surely under God's wrath. And even if you win and destroy all dominion, in the end you will have to tear yourselves to pieces among yourselves, like raging beasts. For since there is no spirit but flesh and blood ruling among you, God will soon send an evil spirit among you, as He did with those who were in safety and with Abimelech. 9,49. 53/. Behold, how all ruthlessness has finally come to an end, as Korah, Num. 1b,

31. 32. item, Absalom, Seba, Simri, and the like s2 Sam. 18, 9. 14. jud. 8, 21. 1 Kings 1b, 9,18/. In short, both tyrants and mobs are God's. Therefore he incited them against each other, so that they would both perish shamefully, and so that his wrath and judgment would be executed against the wicked.

004 This is most grievous to me, and most to be pitied, and I would gladly buy it with my life and death, that two insurmountable losses should follow on both sides. For since neither side contends with a good conscience, but both sides look to maintain injustice, it must first follow that those who are slain are eternally lost, body and soul, as those who die in their sins without repentance and mercy, in the wrath of God; there is neither help nor counsel for them. For the lords would contend that they should confirm and maintain their tyranny and persecution of the gospel, and unrighteous afflictions of the poor, or ever confirm and manage those who are of such a nature; this is ever abominably unjust and contrary to God; whosoever is found therein must be eternally lost. Again, the peasants would contend to defend their ruthlessness and abuse of the Christian name, which is also both highly against God, and whoever dies in it and over it must also be eternally lost; there is no help for it either.

005 The other pity is, that Germany shall be laid waste, and where such bloodshed is once begun, it shall hardly cease, except all be destroyed. For the war is soon begun, but it is not in our power to stop it, if we will. What have you done to so many innocent children, women, and old men, whom you fools have taken with you on such a journey, to make the land full of blood, robbery, widows, and orphans?

006 O, the devil hath a great evil in his mind! God is greatly wroth, and biddeth us to let him go, and to chill his little weal in our blood and souls. Take heed, good sirs, and be wise; it is for you both. What does it profit you to condemn yourselves eternally and wilfully, and to leave behind you a desolate and bloody land for your descendants?

You can better counsel the things of time by repentance toward God, and friendly agreement or willing suffering before men. With defiance and strife ye shall accomplish nothing.

007 Therefore my faithful counsel would be, that some earls and lords of the nobility, and some aldermen of the cities, should be chosen, and that the things should be done and settled in a friendly manner; that ye lords should let down your stiff courage, which ye must leave at last, whether ye will or no; and depart a little from your tyranny and oppression, that the poor man also may gain air and space to live. Again, let the peasants also be instructed, and let some articles, which are too much and too high, be handed over and let go, so that the matter, though it may not be handled in a Christian way, may be settled according to human rights and contracts.

008 If ye will not follow such counsel, as God is for, I must leave you together; but I am innocent of your souls, blood, and goods; ye shall bear it yourselves. I have told you that you are wrong in both parts, and that you fight for wrong. Gentlemen, do not fight against Christians. For Christians do nothing to you, but suffer all things; but you fight against public robbers and desecrators of the Christian name; those who die among them are already eternally damned. Again, ye peasants also fight not against Christians, but against tyrants and persecutors of God and men, and against murderers of the saints of Christ: which die are they also eternally damned. Then you both have your part in the sure judgment of God, that I know for certain! Do now what ye will, if ye will not follow to preserve your body and soul.

769. 9. Martin Luther's writing against the predatory and murderous mobs of the peasants. Boron mid-May 1525.

Luther wrote this writing soon after the previous one, still before the middle of May (Köstlin, M. Luther (3), Vol. I, p. 746), which went out under the following title: "WJder die mördischen und reubischen Rotten der Paurenn. Martinus Luther Wittenberg. Psalm vij. Seine tück werden in selbs treffen, Vnd sein mutwill Wirt über jn außgeen." Without place and year. 1 quarto sheet. Also together with the preceding writing with the superscription: "Widder die stürmenden bawren Martinus Luther." The Erlangen edition (2) lists twenty individual editions as a whole. In the collective editions: in the Wittenberg (1551), vol. II, p. 87; in the Jena (1556), vol. III, p. 129; in the Altenburg, vol. III, p. 124; in the Leipzig, vol. XIX, p. 264; in the first edition of the Erlanger, vol. 24, p. 287, and in the second edition, p. 299. We have followed the latter, comparing the Wittenberg and the Jena.

Psalm 7:17.

"His calamity shall come upon his head, and his iniquity shall fall upon his crown."

001 In the former booklet I was not permitted to judge the peasants, because they offered themselves to be justified and better instructed, as Christ commanded that one should not judge, Matt. 7:1. But before I look around, they go on, and take hold with their fists, forgetting their commandments; they rob and rage, and act like mad dogs. Now they see what they have had in their wrong mind, and that what they have said in the name of the gospel in the twelve articles was a vain lie. In short, they are doing the devil's work, and it is especially the archdevil who rules at Mulhouse, and does nothing but rob, murder and shed blood, as Christ says of him, Jn 8:44, that he is a murderer from the beginning. Now that such peasants and wretched people have allowed themselves to be deceived, and do otherwise than they have spoken, I must also write differently of them; and first put their sin before their eyes, as God commands Isaiah Cap. 58,1. and Ezekiel Cap. 2, 7, if some would acknowledge themselves, and then instruct the consciences of the worldly rulers as to how they should conduct themselves in this matter.

I) The Erlanger has here the words which Walch prefixed to the Scripture in German [Ps. 7,17. s: Oonvertetur äolor sjus, in ouput 6jus, et in vsrtiosni ipsins ininynts "one dssosn^at. In one edition they are from the title page in Latin, in the original of the Erlanger in German. The latter contains, besides our writing, also the next following one, to which, without any doubt, the words of the Psalm belong, but not to our "Exhortation".

(2) These peasants are charged with three grievous sins against God and man, by which they have deserved death in body and soul manifoldly. First, that they swore allegiance and obeisance to their superior, to be submissive and obedient, as God commanded when he said [Matth. 22, 211: "Pray to Caesar what is Caesar's"; and Rom. 13,1: "Let every man be subject to his superior" 2c. But because they break this obedience wilfully and with iniquity, and set themselves in opposition to their masters, they have thereby forfeited body and soul, as the faithless, perjured, lying, disobedient knaves and wicked men are wont to do. Wherefore also St. Paul, Rom. 13:2, pronounces such a sentence upon them, "They that resist authority shall be judged." Which judgment will also finally befall the peasants, be it sooner or later. For God will have kept faith and duty.

003 Secondly, that they cause sedition, rob, and plunder with iniquity monasteries and castles which are not theirs, that they alone, as public highwaymen and murderers, may be guilty of death both of body and soul; even a seditious man, whom it may be witnessed, is already in the custody of God and of the emperor, that he who first can and may slay the same doeth right and well. For over a public rebel every man is both chief judge and executioner. Just as when a fire starts, he who is the first to put it out is the best. For sedition is not a bad murder, but like a great fire that kindles and devastates a land; so sedition brings with it a land full of murder and bloodshed, and makes widows and orphans, and like the greatest misfortune, therefore here let him throw, choke, and stab, secretly or publicly, whoever can, and remember that there can be nothing more poisonous, more harmful, more devilish than a rebellious man. It is as if a mad dog should be beaten to death; if thou beat'st not, he beat'st thee, and all the country with thee.

004 Thirdly, that they cover such horrible, abominable sin with the gospel, calling themselves Christian brethren, taking oaths and oaths, and compelling men to hold with them to such abominations. So that they become the greatest blasphemers and desecrators of his holy name, and honor and serve the devil under the appearance of the gospel, by which they deserve death ten times over, both in body and soul. And beware also that the devil may feel the latter day, that he should do such unheard-of things. As if he should say, 'Tis the last, therefore it shall be the most grievous, and will stir the ground, and cast out the and even expel the bottom. God forbid him. Behold, what a mighty prince the devil is, how he has the world in his hands, and how he can mix it together, and how soon he can catch, seduce, blind, harden, and outrage so many thousands of peasants, and do with them whatever his most furious fury wills.

005 Neither doth it avail the peasants to pretend, Genesis 1:28 and 2:15, that all things are created free and common; and that we are all baptized equal. For in the New Testament Moses neither holds nor applies, but there stands our Master Christ, casting us body and estate under Caesar and temporal law, saying [Matt. 22:2.], "Render unto Caesar the things that are Caesar's." So also Paul saith Rom. 13:1. to all baptized Christians: ",-Every man be subject to authority"; and Peter sl. Ep. 2:13.], "Be subject to all human order." To this doctrine of Christ we owe to liveJ as the Father beareth from heaven, saying, "This is my dear Son, whom hearken ye" [Matt. 17:5. Marc. 9:7. Luc. 9:35.].

006 For baptism doth not make free bodies and things, but souls. Also the evan-

1) Wittenberger and Jenaer:

The apostles and disciples of Acts 4:32, who did not demand that the goods of Pilate and Herod be common, as our foolish peasants do, but their own goods. 4, 32. who did not demand that Pilate's and Herod's foreign goods be common, as our foolish peasants rage, but their own goods. But our peasants want to have other people's goods in common, and keep their own for themselves; these are fine Christians to me. I think that there is no devil in hell any more, but that all the peasants have been driven into it; the raging is excessive and beyond all measure.

(7) Since the peasants are now charging both God and man, and are so often already guilty of death in body and soul, and neither confess nor wait for justice, but are always raging, I must here instruct the temporal authorities how they are to proceed in this with a clear conscience. First of all, I will not refuse the authorities, who are able and willing to beat and punish such peasants without first asking for justice and equity, even if they [the authorities] do not suffer the gospel; For it is well justified, since the peasants no longer fight for the gospel, but have publicly become faithless, perjured, disobedient, rebellious murderers, robbers, blasphemers, whom even pagan authorities have the right and power to punish, and are even obliged to punish such boys. For this reason she carries the sword and is God's servant over the one who does evil, Rom. 13,4.

008 But the authorities, being Christian, and suffering the gospel, wherefore even the peasants have no pretence against them, shall here act with fear. And first of all, give the things back to God, and confess that we have well deserved it, since we fear that God may thus arouse the devil to the common punishment of the German land. Then we humbly ask for help against the devil. For here we do not only fight against blood and flesh, but against the spiritual evil-doers in the air, who must be attacked with prayer [Eph. 6:12, 18]. Now when the heart is so set against God that one lets his divine will prevail, whether he wills us or not to be princes and lords, one is to defend oneself against the mad peasants for the sake of abundance (even though they are not worthy of it) rightly and justly.

...to the like. After that, if that does not help, quickly reach for the sword.

(9) For a ruler and lord must think here, as he is God's officer and servant of His wrath, Romans 13:4, to whom the sword is commanded over such wretches, and sins as highly before God, if he does not punish and defend, and does not execute his office, as if one murders to whom the sword is not commanded. For if he can, and does not punish, whether by murder or bloodshed, he is guilty of all the murder and evil that such wicked men commit, as he who, by wilful neglect of his divine command, permits such wicked men to practice their wickedness, if he can and is guilty of it. Therefore there is no sleeping here. Nor is it the time for patience or mercy; it is the time for sword and wrath, and not the time for mercy.

010 Now therefore let the rulers go forth confidently, and smite with a good conscience, because they have a vein to stir up. For here the advantage is that the peasants have evil consciences and unrighteous things; and whichever peasant is slain for it is lost body and soul, and is eternally of the devil. But the rulers have good consciences and right things, and so can say to God with all certainty of heart, Behold, my God, thou hast made me ruler or lord, which I cannot doubt, and hast commanded me the sword against the workers of iniquity, Rom. 13:4. It is thy word, and may not lie; so I must perform this office, in case of loss of thy grace; so it is also public, that these peasants deserve death in many ways before thee and before the world, and have commanded me to punish them. If then thou wilt put me to death by them, and take away my dominion again, and cause it to perish, let thy will be done; yet I die, and perish in thy divine command and word, and am found in obedience to thy command and my office. Therefore I will punish and smite as long as I can stir up a vein; thou wilt judge and do it well.

011 Therefore it may come to pass, that whosoever is slain upon the ropes of the rulers shall be a right martyr before God, if he contend with such a conscience as is said. For he walks in the divine word and obedience.

Again, that which perishes on the side of the peasants is an everlasting fire of hell. For he wieldeth the sword against the word and obedience of God, and is a devil's member.

012 And though it be that the peasants fall (for God is for them), for all things are possible unto God, and we know not whether he will peradventure, for the fore-running of the last day, which is not far off, destroy all order and authority by the devil, and cast the world into a desolate house, yet surely they die, and go to destruction with a good conscience, who are found in their office of the sword, and leave the temporal kingdom to the devil, and take for it the eternal kingdom. Such are the wondrous times now, that a prince may earn heaven by bloodshed more than others may earn it by prayer.

013 In the end there is one thing more, which ought to move the authorities. For the peasants do not let them be satisfied that they are of the devil, but compel and force many pious people, who do it unwillingly, to join their devilish alliance, and thus make the same partakers of all their wickedness and damnation. For he who consents with them goes with them to the devil, and is guilty of all the evil they do, and yet must do it, because they are so weak in faith that they cannot resist. For a hundred deaths shall a devout Christian suffer, ere he consent to a hair's breadth in the peasant's matter. Oh, many martyrs could now be made by the bloodthirsty peasants and prophets of murder.

(14) Now, the authorities should have mercy on such prisoners among the peasants; and if they had no other cause to let the sword go confidently against the peasants, and to put body and goods on it themselves, this would still be great enough to save and help such souls, who are forced by the peasants into such a devilish alliance, and without their will have to sin and be condemned with them so horribly. For such souls are rightly in purgatory, yes, in hell and the devil's bonds.

(15) Wherefore, sirs, loosen hither, ride hither, help hither, have mercy on the poor, thrust, smite, strangle hither, whoever can. If thou stay thee dead, farewell, thou canst never more die a more blessed death... For thou diest...

in obedience to divine word and command, Rom. 13:4, and in the service of love, to save thy neighbor from hell and the devil's chains.

016 I pray thee therefore, let them that are able flee from the peasants, as from the devil himself. But those who do not flee, I pray that God would enlighten and convert them. But those who cannot be converted, God grant that they may have neither happiness nor success. Let every devout Christian say: Amen. For prayer is right and good, and I know that it pleases God. If anyone thinks this is too hard, let him think that there is no doubt that there is trouble, and that all the hours of the world are to be waited for.

770 D. Mart. Luthers Sendbrief von dem hatte" Büchlein wider die Bauern. June or July 1525.

This writing appeared under the title: "Eyn Sendebrieff von dem harten buchlin Widder die bauren, Martin Luther. Wittenberg. MDXX V." 4 quarto sheets. The Erlangen edition (2) lists six individual editions. In the collective editions: m the Wittenberg (1551), vol. II, p. 89b; in the Jena (1556), vol. III, p. 149b; in the Altenburg, B6, III, p. 141; in the Leipzig, vol. XIX, p. 267; in the Erlangen (I), vol. 24, p. 295, and in its second edition, vol. 24, p. 310. We give the text according to the latter, comparing the Wittenberg and the Jena.

To the honorable and prudent Caspar Müller, chancellor of Mansfeld, my good friend.

1. grace and peace in Christ. Honorable and prudent one! I have had to answer your writing by printing it, because the complaining and questioning about my little book, against the rebellious peasants, has gone out as much as if it were unchristian and too hard. Although I had resolved to stop up my ears, and to let the blind, ungrateful hearts, which only seek cause to be angry with me, get stuck in such annoyance that they would have to rot inside, since they have not improved so much from other little books of mine that they would also want to recognize such a coarse, bad, earthly judgment as right. For I thought of the word of Christ, John 3:12: "If ye believe not, when I speak of earthly things, how shall ye believe, when I speak of heavenly things?"

Things spake?" And when the disciples said, Matt. 15:12, Knowest thou also that the Pharisees were offended at the word?" he said, v. 14, Let them be offended; "they are blind, and leaders of the blind."

002 They cry out and boast: There is seen the spirit of Luther, that he sheddeth blood without mercy; the devil must speak out of him. Well, if I were not accustomed to be judged and condemned, this might move me. But I know no greater hope in myself, than that my doings and teachings should first be used, and be crucified. No one would be valid unless he could judge Luther; Luther is the mark and goal of contradiction, and everyone must try him out to see if he might become a knight and win the jewel. In such a case, everyone has a higher spirit than I; but I must be entirely carnal. And if God only wanted them to have a higher spirit, I would gladly be carnal, and as St. Paul also says to his Corinthians, "You have already been filled, you have already become rich, you reign without us." But I fear they have too truly a high spirit. For I do not yet see anything special that they accomplish, except that they finally become sins and disgraces. 3)

003 But they see not how they run by such judgment, and by such contradiction expose the thoughts of their hearts, as Luc. 2:34. saith of Christ Simeon 2c. They perceive well, they say, what spirit I have. Thus I perceive how finely they have grasped and learned the gospel. Yea, not a whit do they know 3) of it, and yet they prate much of it. For how shall they know what is heavenly righteousness in Christ according to the gospel, who know not yet what is earthly righteousness in the worldly government, according to the law?

004 Such men are worthy that they should not hear a word, neither see a work whereon they should be

1) In the editions: "I wanted to wait gladly carnal". It will be "zewarten" (zwarthen) indeed, freely, to read. Compare No. 1000, B 4 in this volume.

2) Erlanger: makes. Should this reading be correct, then "that" is to be read shortly before.

3) "they" is missing from the Erlanger.

But they shall have vain vexation, as it happened unto the Jews in Christ, because their heart is so full of wickedness, that they desire nothing better than to have vexation, that it may be done unto them according to the saying of Ps. 18:27, "With the wicked thou art wicked"; and Deut. 32:21, "I will provoke them in that which is not a nation, in a foolish nation will I provoke them to anger."

5. These were my reasons why I wanted to keep silent, and let them confidently run up and get angry, so that they would have to perish according to their merit, stubbornly 4) and blindly, who, with such ingratitude, have so abundantly resounded everywhere by such a great and bright light of the gospel, have learned nothing at all, and have put the fear of God so low, that they no longer regard anything as evangelical, but judge and despise others, and allow themselves to think that they are of great spirit and high understanding, and through the teaching of humility only grasp vain hope, as a spider sucks vain poison from a rose.

006 But because ye desire instruction, not for yourselves, but to shut up such useless men; though I consider that ye do a vain and impossible work, for who can shut up a fool, because the heart is full of foolishness, and the mouth overflows, because the heart is full? (Matth. 12, 34. Luc. 6, 45.) In this I will also do you another lost service.

007 And first of all, let them that reprove my book be warned to shut their mouths, and to beware: for surely they are also rebellious in heart; lest they be unwise, and go once behind the head, as Solomon saith, My child, fear the LORD, and the king, and mingle not with the rebellious. For their calamity will come suddenly, and who knows when both calamities will come?" Proverbs 24:21, 22: And we see that both the rebellious and those who mingle with them are condemned, and God will not make a jest of it, but the king and the ruler are to be feared. But they that mingle

4) Erlanger: hidden.

Among the rebels, who take care of them, lament, justify, and have mercy on those whom God does not have mercy on, but wants to punish and destroy. For he who thus takes care of the rebellious sufficiently shows that, if he had time and space, he would also do harm, as he had decided in his heart. Therefore the authorities should take hold of such people's heads, so that they shut their mouths and realize that they are in earnest.

008 If they think such an answer too hard, and say that it is spoken with violence, and that the mouth is shut, I say, That is right. For a rebel is not worthy to be answered with reason, for he will not accept it; one must answer such mouths with the fist, so that the sweat runs out of the nose. The peasants would not listen either, they would not let them say anything at all; then you have to poke their ears open with cans of stones, so that their heads jumped up in the air. To such disciples belongs such a rod. He who will not hear the word of God with kindness must hear the executioner with sharpness. If it is said that I am unkind and unmerciful in this, I answer, "Be merciful, be merciful; we are now talking about the word of God.

009 I will not here hear nor know of mercy, but take heed what God's word will. Therefore my little book shall be right and remain right, though all the world be angry with it. Why do I ask that it displease thee, if it please God? If he will have wrath, and not mercy, what dealest thou with mercy? Did not Saul sin against Amalek with mercy, that he did not execute God's wrath, as he was commanded? [Did not Ahab sin in mercy to the king of Syria, and let him live contrary to the word of God? [If thou wilt have mercy, mingle not with the rebellious, but fear the rulers, and do good. If thou do evil, fear (saith Paul, Rom. 13:3, 4): for she beareth not the sword in vain.

010 Such an answer would be enough to all who are vexed at my little book, and have useless make. Is it not fair to shut one's mouth when one hears that God says and wants it that way? Or is God guilty of giving such useless mouths a reason and an account of why he wants it that way? I cried, it would be enough to silence all creatures, if he waved but one eye, much less if he spoke. There stands his word [Proverbs 24:22.], "My child, fear the LORD and the King; if not, thy calamity shall come suddenly." 2c. Item, Rom. 13:2: "He that is contrary to God's order shall receive judgment against himself." Why is St. Paul not merciful here either? If we are to preach the word of God, we must also preach that which proclaims wrath, as well as that which proclaims mercy. We must also preach of hell as well as of heaven, and on both sides, over the pious and the wicked, God's word, judgment, and work must help to punish the wicked and protect the pious.

011 But that the pious God may remain before such judges, and that his judgment may be found right and pure, let us plead his word against such free mouths, and show the cause of his divine will, that we may also put two candles to the devil. They reproach me that Christ teaches [Luc. 6:36.], "Be merciful, as your Father is merciful"; item [Matth. 12:7.], "I will have mercy, and not sacrifice"; item [Luc. 9:56.], "The Son of man is not come to destroy souls, but to save them," and the like.

012 Here they think that they have done wrong: for if Luther had taught that the peasants should be pitied, he teaches that they should be put to death quickly. How thinkest thou? Let's see if Luther will jump over the little piece, I mean, he's caught. Well, I thank my masters... For if these high spirits had not taught me these things, how should I have known or known them? How would I know that God promotes mercy, when I have taught and written about mercy more than anyone else in a thousand years?

013 There is a devil in the skin, that would gladly do evil, if he could. Therefore he stirs up and fights even the good and pious hearts.

with such pieces, that they may not see how black he is, and will make himself beautiful under the glory of mercy; but it shall not help him. Now you who praise mercy so well because the peasants are beaten, why did you not praise it when the peasants were raging, beating, robbing, burning and plundering, so that it was terrible to see and hear? Why were they not also merciful to the princes and lords who wished to destroy them utterly? There was none that said of mercy, All things must be right; Mercy was silent, and nothing; Right, right, right, that prevailed, and went up. But now that they are beaten, and the stone falls on their heads, which they cast toward heaven, let no one speak of justice, but only of mercy.

014 And yet they are so rude, and think that the mischief is not to be seen. Nay, thou art seen, thou black and ugly devil. Thou praisest not mercy, that thou art in earnest, and lovest mercy, else thou wouldest have praised it against the peasants; thou fearest the skin, and wouldest gladly escape the rod and punishment of God with the appearance and name of mercy. Not so, my dear fellow, thou must be held out, and die without all mercy. St. Paul says [Rom. 13:4]: "If thou do evil, fear. For the power of the sword is not in vain, but for the punishment of him that doeth evil." Thou wilt do evil, and suffer not wrath nevertheless, but with boasting mercy cover thee. Come again tomorrow, and we'll bake thee a cake for it. Who could not?

015 And I would run into a man's house, and ravish his wife and his daughters, and break out his coffers, and take his money and his goods, and put the sword upon his breast, and say, If thou wilt not suffer this, I will slay thee: for thou art an ungodly man. But if the servants should run and strangle me, or if the judge should behead me, I would cry out: Christ teaches you to be merciful, and not to strangle me; what can you say to that? So do my peasants and peasant defenders now. Now they have exercised all courage against the masters, as the robbers, murderers, thieves, and

Let us first sing a little song of mercy, and say, Be ye merciful, as Christ teacheth, and let us rage, as the devil teacheth us; do ye good to us, and let us do evil to you; be well pleased, and be right in what we have done, and be wrong in what ye do.

016 Dear one, who would not? If this be called mercy, let us make a good thing, that there be no sword, no government, no judgment, no punishment, no executioner, no prison; but let every man do what he will; and if he be punished, let us sing: Be merciful, as Christ teaches. O, that should be a fine order! There thou seest what they have in mind who judge my little book to be the denial of all mercy. They are certainly good rascals, rebellious, and real bloodhounds, or are seduced by such people. For they would like to have all evil unpunished, and under the name of mercy they are the most ruthless and cruel destroyers of the whole world, if it were up to them.

017 Yea, they say, we do not justify the peasants, neither do we resist the punishment: but it seemeth unjust unto us, that thou teachest not to have mercy on the poor peasants, because thou sayest that they should be put to death without all mercy. I answer, If thou meanest that right, I am golden; it is all the cover of thy bloodthirsty will, that the peasants' nature pleaseth thee secretly. Where have I ever taught that mercy should not be practiced? Is it not also written in the same booklet that I ask the authorities to receive those who surrender into mercy? Why do you not open your eyes and read it? Then you would not have needed to condemn my booklet and get angry.

018 But because thou art so poisonous, that thou seest the one piece alone, when I write that they which will not yield nor hearken shall be swiftly cast down without all mercy, and leavest the other, when I write that they which yield shall be received with mercy, it is evident that thou art a spider sucking poison out of the rose; and it is not true that thou doest wrong to the peasants, or lovest mercy, but wouldest

And that the sword of the world might be made nought. But thou wilt not end it.

019 Let this be said unto the unchristian, unmerciful bloodhounds, which extol the sayings of mercy, that vainness and unmercifulness should reign in the world according to their will.

020 To the rest, which are deceived by these, or else are so weak, that they cannot compare my little book with the sayings of Christ, let this be said. There are two kingdoms: one is the kingdom of God, the other is the kingdom of the world, as I have often written, so that I am surprised how people do not yet know or perceive this. For he who knows how to distinguish between the two kingdoms will certainly not be offended by my little book, and will also hear the sayings about mercy. God's kingdom is a kingdom of grace and mercy, and not a kingdom of wrath or punishment. For there is only forgiveness, mercy, love, service, good deeds, peace, and joy 2c. But the worldly kingdom is a kingdom of wrath and severity. For there it is all punishment, defense, judgment, and sentence, to compel the wicked and protect the righteous. Therefore it also hath and wieldeth the sword, and a prince or lord is called the wrath of God, or the rod of God in the scriptures, Isa. 14:5.

021 Now these sayings which speak of mercy are of the kingdom of God, and of Christians, and not of the worldly kingdom. For a Christian shall not only be merciful, but shall also suffer all manner of things, robbery, burnings, murders, devils, and hells, except he should smite, slay, or requite any man. But the temporal kingdom, which is nothing but the servant of divine wrath upon the wicked, and a veritable forerunner of hell and eternal death, shall not be merciful, but stern, earnest, and wrathful in his office and work. For his handiwork is not a rosary or a flower of love, but a mere sword; but a sword is a sign of wrath, severity, and punishment, and is directed nowhere but at the wicked, on whom it looks to punish and keep them in check and peace, for the protection and salvation of the pious.

022 Wherefore God putteth in the law of Moses, and in Exodus 21:14, when he putteth in the sword, saying, Thou shalt take the murderer also from mine altar, and shalt not have mercy upon him." And the epistle to the Hebrews confesses that he that did contrary to the law must die without all mercy. This shows that the temporal authorities cannot be merciful in their own office, nor should they be merciful, even though they may celebrate the office by grace.

023 Whosoever then would mingle these two kingdoms together, as our false fools do, would put wrath in the kingdom of God, and mercy in the kingdom of the world: that would be to put the devil in heaven, and God in hell. These Burmese would gladly do both of these things. Before, they wanted to ride with the sword, and as Christian brothers fight for the gospel, and kill others, because they were supposed to be merciful and patient. Now that the worldly kingdom is upon them, they want to have mercy within, that is, they do not want to suffer a worldly kingdom, and yet they themselves do not want to grant God's kingdom to anyone; what would be devised for intercourse? Not so, dear friends; if a man has earned wrath in the worldly kingdom, let him give himself up, and suffer the punishment, or humbly beg it off. But let them that are in the kingdom of God have mercy on every man, and pray for them; but let them not hinder the right and work of the worldly kingdom, but help to promote it.

024 But though such severity and wrath of the temporal kingdom seem an unmerciful thing, yet, when rightly considered, it is not the least part of divine mercy. For let every man take himself, and hereupon tell me a judgment: If I have wife and child, house and servants, and goods, and a thief or murderer assaults me, strangles me in my house, violates my wife and child, and takes what I have, and he should go unpunished for it, that he does it more where he will: tell me, which here would be most worthy and needful of mercy? I, or the thief and murderer? Without doubt, it would be most needful for me that someone should have mercy on me. But where will such mercy be shown to me and to my poor, wretched wife and children?

keep me in the right; or, if he will not let him defend himself, and continue to do him his right, punish him, that he may leave it? What kind of mercy would it be to me to be merciful to a thief and a murderer, and to let him leave me murdered, violated, and robbed?

25. Such mercy, which rules and acts in the secular sword, is not looked upon by such peasant defenders, who only open their eyes and mouths at the wrath and seriousness; say, we pretend to the furious princes and lords, that we teach them to punish the wicked, when they are ten times worse hypocrites of the murderous knaves and wicked peasants, and are themselves also with bloodthirsty murderers with rebellious hearts, that they have no mercy at all on those who are overpowered by the peasants, robbed, violated, and forced to all kinds of injustice. For if the peasants had gone about their business, no honest man could have remained safe from them, but whoever had more than a penny would have had to take the blame, as they had already begun to do. And if this had not been enough, they would have had to put their wives and children to all shame, and strangled themselves among themselves, so that neither peace nor safety would ever have remained.

026 What is more wicked than the mad ruffraff and peasant, when he is full and filled, and hath violence? as Solomon saith, Proverbs 30:21, 22; that the earth cannot bear such men. And should we first have mercy on such men, and let them rage as they will, with every man's life, limb, wife, child, honor, and goods, without all punishment, and let the innocent perish so shamefully before our eyes, without all mercy, help, and comfort?

27 I hear constantly that the Bamberg peasants have been offered that they should be let off more, for they asked that they should only sit quietly; they still did not want to. And Margrave Casimir vowed to his own that what others had acquired by strife and rebellion, he would otherwise let them have, with mercy; that did not help either. Thus it is well known that the Frankish peasants hold nothing against them but robbery, burning, breaking, and destruction, out of sheer will of courage. The Thuringian peasants

I myself have experienced that the more they were admonished and taught, the more stubborn, proud, and foolish they became, and they have stood up so wilfully and defiantly everywhere, as if they wanted to be strangled without all grace and mercy, and have offered God's wrath the most magnificent defiance. And so it is with them, as the 109th Psalm, v. 17, says: "They did not want grace, so it is now far enough from them. "

028 Therefore the scripture hath fine and pure eyes, and looketh rightly upon the temporal sword, as that which out of great mercy must be merciless, and for the goodness of it exercise wrath and severity, as Paul [Romans 13:4] and Peter [1 Peter 2:14] say, that it is the servant of God for vengeance, wrath, and punishment upon the wicked, and for the protection, praise, and honour of the pious. It looks at the pious and has mercy on them, and so that no harm comes to them, it fights, bites, stabs, cuts, cuts, murders, as God has commanded it, whose servant is recognized in this.

029 Now that the wicked are thus punished without mercy, it is not because the punishment of the wicked alone is sought, and lust is expiated in their blood, but that the pious may be protected, and peace and safety preserved. Which are undoubtedly excellent works of great mercy, love, and kindness (for there is no more wretched thing on earth than strife, insecurity, oppression, violence, injustice, 2c.). For who could or would stay alive where it should be so? Therefore the sword's wrath and earnestness is so necessary among the people, as eating and drinking, even as life itself.

030 Yea, say they, we speak not of the stiff-necked peasants that will not yield, but of those that are overcome, or that are yielded; with such, indeed, one ought to exercise mercy, and not to deal so abominably with them. I answer, "Then you must not be pious to blaspheme my booklet as if I spoke of such overcome, devoted peasants, when I speak so plainly in it of those whom one first asks kindly, but they do not want. For all my words go against the stiff-necked, obstinate, blinded peasants, who

...neither to see nor to hear how you may lay hold of it. And thou sayest, I teach the wretched captive peasants to strangle without all mercy. If thou wilt read and interpret books according to thine own will, what book shall remain before thee?

31 Therefore, as I wrote then, so I write now. Let no one have mercy on the stiff-necked, obstinate, deluded peasants who do not let them be told, but let them cut, stab, choke, and strike as if they were mad dogs, whoever they can and however they can; and all this so that one may have mercy on those who are ruined, chased away, and seduced by such peasants, that one may have peace and safety. For it is better to cut off a limb without mercy, than for the whole body to perish by fire or some such pestilence. How do you like that? Am I still an evangelical preacher who teaches grace and mercy? If I be not, there is no power in thee. For thou art a bloodhound and a seditious murderer and corrupter of the land with thy mad peasants. For thou art a hypocrite in their rebellion.

Thirty-two, they say: The peasants haven't strangled anyone yet, the way they're strangled. Dear, what can one say? What a beautiful answer is this, they have not strangled anyone; that made it necessary to do what they wanted; but they nevertheless threatened to kill whoever did not want to go with them, and took the sword in their fist, which was not theirs, and attacked the goods, houses and possessions. So a thief and a murderer would not be a murderer, if he would do to me what he would with death. But if they had done what was kindly desired of them, they would not have been put to death. But since they would not, it was right to do to them as they would have done, and to do to those who would not do as they would.

033 Moreover they are publicly unfaithful, perjured, disobedient, rebellious, thieves, robbers, murderers, and blasphemers; that none of them be deserving of death tenfold, without all mercy. Let the eye of the devil be turned to the punishment alone, and not also to the guilt and merit, and to the unspeakable harm and destruction, which is there.

should have followed. If the punishment grieves thee, forbear wickedness; as Paul also answereth such, Rom. 13:3, 4: "If thou fear not the sword, do good; but if thou do evil, be afraid." 2c.

034 Thirdly, they say: The lords abuse their sword, and choke too horribly 2c. I answer, What is that to my book? Why layest thou strange guilt upon me? If they abuse their power, they have not learned it from me, they will find their share. For the supreme judge, who punishes the wanton peasants through them, has not forgotten them, nor will they escape him. My little book does not say what the lords deserve, but what the peasants deserve, and how they should be punished; with this I have hypocritized no one. If there is a time and a cause for me to do it, I will attack the princes and lords. For as far as my office of teaching is concerned, a prince is just as important to me as a peasant. I have already earned them so much that they are not too dear to me, but I do not care much about them. I have one who is greater than all of them, as St. John says [Cap. 10:29].

(35) But if my advice had been followed at the first, when the riot began, and one peasant or a hundred had dared to do it, and had been struck on the heads, so that the others would have bumped into them, and had not let them get so out of hand, many thousands would have been preserved, who would now have had to die, and would probably have remained at home. That would have been a necessary mercy with little anger, since one had to take so much seriousness to control so many.

(36) But it is God's will that we should be witty on both sides. First of all, the peasants, that they might learn how to be at ease and not suffer good days in peace, that they might learn to thank God when they have to give one cow, so that they might enjoy the other in peace. For it is always better to have half of the estate in peace and safety than to have the whole estate in danger all the time among thieves and murderers, and yet not to have it. The peasants did not know how precious it was to have peace and security, that one might have

They enjoyed his morsel and his drink cheerfully and safely, and did not thank God for it; now he had to teach them in this way, so that the tickle would go away from them.

(37) It was also useful for the lords to know what was behind the mob and how to trust them, so that they might learn to govern properly and to cultivate the land and the roads. There was no longer any regiment or order; everything stood open and idle. There was no longer any fear or timidity among the people; each one did what he wanted. No one wanted to give anything, and yet they splurged, drank, dressed, and walked idly, as if they were all masters. The ass wants to be beaten, and the mob wants to be ruled by force; God knew that well. That is why he did not give the authorities a fox's tail, but a sword in their hands.

038 Neither is this the least of the things which they put forward: that there were many pious men among the peasants, who came to this innocently, and were wronged in the sight of God, that they should be so put to death. I answer, "One speaks of such things as if one had never heard the word of God. Therefore I also must answer here, as to them that are yet young children or heathen. Nothing at all is directed among men with so many books and sermons.

039 First, I say that there is no injustice done to those who are compelled by the peasants; neither is there any Christian man left among them, nor do they come to it innocently, as they pretend. It may be thought that they are wronged, but it is not so. Tell me, my dear friend, what excuse is there if someone strangles your father and mother, violates your wife and child, burns your house, and takes your money and possessions, and then says that he had to do it, that he was forced to do it?

040 Who hath ever heard that any man should be compelled to do good or to do evil? Who can force a man's will? O, there is no such thing, neither is it said, I must do wrong, and I shall do wrong.

1) Erlanger: she.

forced to do so. To deny Christ and the word of God is a great sin and wrong, and many are forced to do it; but do you think they are excused by it? So, "to make sedition, to disobey the authorities, to be unfaithful and perjurious, to rob and burn" is great wrong, and some peasants are forced to do it; what does it help them? Why do they let themselves be forced?

041 Yea, they say, I am threatened to take my body and my goods. O my beloved, that thou mightest keep my body and my goods, thou wilt transgress the commandment of God, and slay me, and ravish my wife and my child: how would God and I do it? Wouldst thou suffer it so from me? If then thou hadst been compelled, and the peasants had bound thee hand and foot, and had brought thee among them by force, and thou hadst resisted with thy mouth, and had punished them for it, and thus thy heart had confessed and testified that it would not gladly do it, nor consent to it, then thou wouldst have stood with honour, and wouldst indeed have been compelled with the body, but yet with the will unconquered. But if thou holdest thy peace, and punisheth them not, and followest with the multitude, and confessest not thine indignation, it profiteth thee not; and thou hast tarried too long, that thou wilt first confess thine indignation. For thou oughtest to fear and respect the commandment of God more than men, even if thou hadst to go and die over it: for he would not have left thee, but would have faithfully stood by thee, saved thee, and helped thee. Therefore, just as those who deny God are condemned, even if they are forced to do so, so the peasants are not excused for allowing themselves to be forced.

042 If this excuse were true, neither sin nor vice should be punished. For where is there a sin that the devil, the flesh, and the world do not impel and compel at the same time? Do you not think that at times an evil desire drives to adultery with such fervour and rage that it might be called a greater urge and compulsion than to urge a peasant to riot? For who is mighty in his heart? Who can resist the devil and the flesh? Is it not possible that we should resist the least sin, seeing that the scripture saith, that we shall not be able to resist the

Are the prisoners of the devil, [2 Tim. 2:26] as of our Prince and God, that we must do what he wills and directs us to do; as is sometimes proved by some horrible stories; should it therefore be unpunished and lawful?

043 Not so; it is to call upon God for help, and to resist sin and wrongdoing. If thou die, or if thou suffer for it, good be to thee, and thy soul shall be blessed in the sight of God and in the sight of the world. But if thou dost not follow, thou shalt die ashamed in the sight of God and the world, because thou hast been forced to do wrong. It would be better for you to die with honor and blessedness in praise of God, than to die in disgrace as a punishment and torment.

44. Yea, saith thou, O LORD God, who would have known such things? I also say: O Lord God, what can I do about it? Ignorance will not excuse either. Should a Christian not know what he needs to know? Why don't they learn it? Why don't they have good preachers? One wants to be ignorant with will. The gospel has come to Germany, many pursue it, few desire it, far fewer accept it, and those who do accept it are so lukewarm and lazy about it, they let schools perish, parishes and preachers' chairs fall, no one thinks to preserve it and raise up people; and they make us look everywhere as if we were sorry that we were learning something, and would gladly know nothing. What wonder then, if God also visit us, and let us again see a piece, to punish his gospel contempt, wherein we are all guilty, though we are innocent of some of the sedition, which we have well deserved; that he may admonish us, and send us to school, that we may one day also be witty and knowledgeable?

(45) How must we do in wars, when even the innocent must go away with the guilty, yea, most of all the innocent, as we think, since widows and orphans also are made. These are plagues, sent to us by God, and otherwise well deserved, which indeed one must suffer with another, if we would dwell otherwise with one another. For as it is said, One neighbor owes another a fire.

046 He that would be in the congregation must be

He will also help to bear and suffer the burden, journey, and damage of the community, even though he has not forfeited it, but his neighbor, just like him, is entitled to the peace, benefit, protection, property, freedom, and community chamber, even though he has not acquired or brought about the same, and will learn to sing and comfort himself with Job: "If we have received good things from the Lord, why should we not also bear evil things? So many good days are worth an evil hour, and so many good years are worth an evil day or year. We have had peace and good days for a long time, until we have become too horny and too angry, not knowing what peace and good days were, and not even thanking God for them; this we must now learn.

(47) Yes, we may well refrain from such lamentation and grumbling, I advise, and thank God that through His grace and mercy no greater calamity has come upon us than the devil intended to inflict through the peasants, just as Jeremiah did: when the Jews were driven out, captured and murdered, he consoled himself and said, "It is God's grace and goodness that we have not been utterly and completely destroyed. And we Germans, who are much worse than the Jews, and yet not so driven out and strangled, want first of all to grumble and be impatient and justify ourselves, and not let a part of us be strangled, so that God may be still more enraged, and let us go to the ground, take off our hand, and give us entirely to the devil. We do as the mad Germans do, who know nothing of God, and speak of such things as if there were no God to do and have such things, and think that we suffer nothing at all, but are vain noblemen who sit on cushions, and would do according to all their will.

048 For thou shouldest have seen that, if the devil's thing had gone on in the peasants, and God had not so fed them with the sword by the prayers of devout Christians, it would have been and gone throughout all the German lands, as it is now with them that are stabbed and slain, and much worse. There would be no one before the other

1) "his" is missing in the Erlanger.

Each of them would have strangled the other, burned his house and farm, and violated his wife and child. For God had not begun and there was no order, and they were already in such a state that no one trusted or believed the others; they deposed one captain after another, and had to leave, not as honest people did, but as the most wicked boys said and wanted. For the devil had it in mind, he wanted to devastate Germany completely, because otherwise he could not defend the gospel.

49. And who knows what else will happen if we grumble and are ungrateful? God can let the peasants become mad once again, or let another one happen, so that it will be worse afterwards than it is now. Methinks it was a good strong admonition and warning. If we take care of it, and do not turn back, and do not fear God, we may see what comes to us, that this is not a joke, and that seriousness follows.

50 Lastly, one would say, You yourself teach sedition, because you say that one should quickly strike and stab the seditious whoever can, each one being the chief judge and executioner in this case. Here I answer: My booklet is not written against evil doers, but against the rebellious; but you must distinguish a rebel far, far from a murderer or robber, or any other evil doer. For a murderer or other evil-doer leaves the head and the authority, and attacks only his members or goods; indeed, he is afraid of the authority. Because the head remains, no one should attack such a murderer, because the head can punish him, but wait for the judgment and command of the head, to whom God has commanded the sword and the office to punish.

051 But a rebel assaileth the head himself, and falleth upon his sword, and his office, that his iniquity is not like unto the murderer. Here we cannot wait for the head to command and judge. For the head cannot, and is taken and beaten; but he shall run to him that is able, uncalled and uncommanded, and as a faithful member shall save his head by piercing, by cutting, by choking, and shall set body and soul at the head.

022 This I must imagine with a rough similitude. If I were a master's servant, and saw that his enemy was running at him with a naked sword, and I could ward it off, but stood still, and let my master be so shamefully slain: tell me, what would both God and the world say of me? would they not justly say that I was a desperate villain and traitor, and must certainly have my head and part with the enemy? But if I were to go to the enemy, and interpose between the enemy and my lord, and lay down my body for my lord, and slay the enemy, would not that be an honourable and upright thing, praised and glorified in the sight of God and the world? Or, if I were stabbed to death over it, how could I die more Christianly? for I would die in the right service of God, as much as it is in the work itself; and if there were faith in it, I would be a right holy martyr of God.

053 But if I should excuse myself, and say, I will therefore hold my peace, until my lord shall call me: what would that excuse do, but to accuse me two times more, and to make me worthy to be cursed of all men, as one that jesteth in such wickedness? Did not Christ himself vow all these things in the Gospel, and declare it to be right, that servants should fight for their masters, when he stood before Pilate, and said [John 18:36], "If my kingdom were of this world, my servants would fight for me, that I should not be delivered to the Jews." There thou seest that it is right in the sight of GOD and the world for servants to contend for their masters; otherwise what would be the worldly government?

054 Now, behold, such a man is the stirring up, that he runneth upon the head, and upon the LORD with the naked sword: and there shall no man tarry till the LORD be called to resist; but he goeth forth, and stabbeth the wicked man, unnamed, he that is first able: and he shall not take care that he commit murder, but he shall resist an assassin, that seeketh to murder the whole land. If he does not stab and kill, but lets the lord stab him, he is also an assassin. For then he must and should think, because his lord suffers and lies, that he is lord, judge, and executioner in the case. For rebellion is not a joke, and

No evil on earth is like it. Other wickednesses are a few pieces; sedition is a deluge of all wickednesses.

055 I am called a spiritual man, and have the office of the ministry. But yet, if I were a servant of a Turkish lord, and saw my lord in the way, I would forget my spiritual office, and stab and slash freshly, because I could stir up a vein; if I were stabbed over it, I would go up to heaven in the work of the mouth. For rebellion is not worthy of any judgment or mercy, whether it be among the Gentiles, Jews, Turks, Christians, or wherever it may be; but it has already been interrogated, judged, and condemned, and delivered to death in the hand of every one. Therefore, there is nothing more to be done here than to quickly strangle the rebel and do him justice.

056 No murderer does or deserves such evil. For a murderer does a wickedly wicked thing, and lets the punishment remain. A rebel wants to have a free, unpunishable wickedness, and attacks the punishment himself. Moreover, at this time the enemies of the gospel, who blame such sedition on the gospel, make an evil noise to the gospel, and open their mouths wide enough to blaspheme, though they are not excused thereby, and know it well otherwise; Christ also will meet them well in his time.

57 See now whether I have rightly and justly written in my little book that one should stab the rebellious without all mercy. But I have not taught that mercy should not be shown to the captives and the devoted, as I am blamed, and my booklet shows otherwise.

058 Neither will I herewith strengthen the fierce tyrants, nor praise their raging. For I hear that some of my disciples are cruel beyond measure to the poor people, and are almost bold and defiant, as if they had won and were firmly established. Well, they do not seek punishment and correction of the rebellion, but atone for their fierce will, and cool their troubles, which they may have borne for a long time; they think that they have now gained space and reason to do so.

059 But especially they now confidently set themselves against the gospel, and will restore monasteries and convents, and give the pope the ...and they will mingle our cause with the rebels... But they shall soon reap what they sow. For he that sitteth on high seeth them, and will come before they look. They shall lack what they will, that I know, as they have lacked hitherto.

(60) I have also written in the same booklet that now is such a strange time that one may earn heaven with murder and bloodshed. Help God, how Luther has forgotten himself, who until now has taught that one must attain grace and be saved without works, by faith alone. But here he does not give salvation to works alone, but also to the horrible work of shedding blood. There, the Rhine has been set on fire.

61 Dear God, how closely I am sought, how they lie in wait for me, and yet they do not help me. For I hope that they will let me keep the custom of words and the manner of speech, which not only the common man has, but also the Scriptures keep. Saith not Christ Matt. 5:3, 10, 12: Blessed are the poor, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven: and blessed are ye when ye suffer persecution. For your reward is great in heaven"; and Matt. 25:34. where he rewards works of mercy 2c., and the like much more. And yet it is true that works do nothing in the sight of God, but faith alone. But how this is done I have written so many times, and especially in the sermon on unrighteous mammon. He who does not want to be satisfied with this, let him always go and be angry for the rest of his life.

022 But that I have made the work of shedding blood so dear, my booklet in the same place shall abundantly bear witness, that I have spoken of temporal rulers who are Christian, and who conduct their office in a Christian manner, especially when they fight against the rebellious mobs. If they do not do well by shedding blood and carrying out their office, neither did Samson, Samuel, and David, when they punished the wicked and shed blood. If it is not good nor right to shed blood in this way, let the sword be put to the sword, and let us be free brothers and do as we please.

033 For this I beseech you, and every man with diligence, that they may have my little book.

and do not go so far, they will see that I alone, as befits a Christian preacher, have instructed the Christian, pious authorities. I say again, and the third time, that I alone have written to the rulers who want to be Christian or otherwise righteous, that they may instruct their consciences in such a case, namely, that they should immediately strike into the pile of the rebels, regardless of whether they strike the guilty or the innocent. And even if they strike the innocent, they are not to make a conscience of it, but to confess to God that they are guilty of his service. But afterward, when they have won, to show mercy, not only to the innocent (as they hold), but also to the guilty.

(64) But the furious, raging, and senseless tyrants, who, even after the battle, may not be satisfied with blood, and in their whole life do not ask much about Christ, I have not taken upon myself to teach. For it is all the same to such bloodhounds whether they strangle the guilty or the innocent, whether it pleases God or the devil; they have the sword only to atone for their lust and willfulness; I will let their master, the devil, lead them as he leads them.

65] When I heard that at Mühlhausen, among some great merchants, one of them brought to him the poor wife of Thomas Münzer, who is now a widow and pregnant, and fell on his knees before her and said: Dear wife, let me call you N. O, a chivalrous, noble deed, committed on a miserable, abandoned, pregnant woman; that is a bold hero, who would be worth three knights. 1) What should I write to such rangers and sows? The Scriptures call such men beasts, that is, wild beasts, as there are wolves, sows, bears, and lions, so I will not make them men either; yet they must be suffered, if God will afflict us by them.

(66) I have provided both: if the peasants were lords, the devil would become abbot; but if such tyrants were lords, his mother would become abbess. Therefore I would gladly have satisfied both, the peasants.

1) "would be" only in the Jena.

...and pious superiors taught. But since the peasants did not want to listen, they have received their wages. But these will not listen either; well, they will have their wages also. It is no pity that they should be murdered by the peasants, for that would be a fox's tail. If they do not repent, their reward will be eternal fire, trembling and gnashing of teeth in hell.

67 These things, my lord and friend, have I answered your writing; I hope I have done more than enough. But if anyone has not done enough, let him be wise and prudent, pious and holy in God's name, and let me remain a fool and a sinner. Even though I would like to be left in peace, nothing will be said against me, and what I teach and write should remain right, even if the whole world should burst at it. If one wants to be strange, then I will also be strange, and see who will be right in the end. Hereby God commands, and tells Conrad to watch, hit it, and lie down in the right bed. The printer shall also avoid it henceforth, and no longer call you chancellor, amen.

771 Spalatin's misgivings about old and new levies, put to a friend who presumably had been a nobleman and had wanted to act in conscience against his subjects.

From Cyprian's "Useful Documents," vol. II, p. 348.

After diligently considering and contemplating the facts, I believe that the previous comforting report should be taken into account. Considering that it is not only clothed in the Word of God, but that it is derived not only from me, but also from the venerable, highly respected Doctor Martin Luther. And one cannot do otherwise than follow the report that comes from others rather than one's own thoughts. Therefore I rely, as before, on the previous report, both my own, and highly esteemed Doctor Martin Luther's opinion. If they are old debts, about people's memory, and have arisen before your arrival and housekeeping, I want to let them go, in God's name, and otherwise show my subjects honest and favorable will, in which I always want. But if there were of you, in and by of your household, the old taxes, also interest of woods, more hunting service 2c., and how it would have more and more names, from new over the old taxes, burden and burden raised, set and imposed on the people, then it would be called fair, as God in Isaiah 58, 6. says: Solve collAutori68 sto. Likewise with the feudal

Some of the lords of the fiefs are now so high that they are lamenting in heaven about it; God will surely hear such a prayer, and many of the lords of the fiefs will only be hurt, and they will be very hard pressed. For it is ever too much to raise the fief so high that many widows and orphans are made heirless. Some of them are so clever that they put the fine only on the money and do not want a farmer to come to food or to stay there. Some of them force their subjects to hunt as often as they want, because of the old custom they brought with them, although it was rarely done in former times. Some of them take timber and chicken rents from the subjects, because they have been allowed to graze in the woods. But now they are finished, give the interest another name, do not let the people graze 2c. in the woods, but still take the interest most strictly 2c. Who will and can tell all such new burdens, levies, and burdens? Where such new burdens have recently been laid on the people, a relief has been made before the conscience does not want to let up with its bite. But in the old troubles and the troubles imposed by others, I satisfied my heart with God's help. In addition, I am moved tremendously by the divine scripture mentioned above, the example of the great archfather Joseph, who, as it says in the first book of Moses, 47, v. 24, 26, decreed to give the fifth part of the Egyptian field to Pharaoh, except for the priestly field, which was not Pharaoh's own. On the other hand, such ordinances are police ordinances, which God allows to pass at any time. So also St. Peter says in his first epistle in the other chapter [v. 13: "Be subject to all human ordinances." Thirdly, The common rabble is bridle-less, insolent, and rough, and must be kept hard; otherwise it is likely to do all mischief. For thus says King Solomon in the 26th chapter of his Proverbs [v. 3.], that to the horse belongs a whip, to the ass a bridle, to the fool a rod on the back, or else none do ye good. Fourth, if you were to do away with the old customs, it would not help the cause, but would cause more disruption, suspicion, and disobedience, as well as a burdensome introduction for others.

For not everyone would follow this example. If only God wanted that the new taxes could be alleviated and solved smoothly and unnoticeably. I would also not object to your bequeathing something annually to the poor people in your will and last will, which would be to their benefit for the payment of the taxes due; but in all cases now unannounced. For it might make the people wanton, and you suspicious. Secondly, if such thoughts occur to you, take the Holy Scriptures before you, and compose a psalm, or something else. For this is the only true book of consolation, as Paul tells us in Romans 15:4. Thirdly, God's mercy is greater than the life of all men, as it is written in the 63rd Psalm, v. 4. And as St. John says in his first epistle in the third chapter, v. 20: "If our heart punishes us, God is much greater than our heart. Fourth, in such afflictions of conscience, you have recourse to God, to dear prayer, and to the reception of the Holy Sacrament, and to the absolution of your pastor, and also to the diligent hearing of God's Word, without doubt, God will, through these Christian divine means, give your conscience and heart, if not complete rest and peace, at least good, blessed relief. For it is true, as it is written in Job, chapter 7, v. 1, that man must always be in conflict. Therefore God is also called the Lord of hosts, that he and his poor little band must always be in the field. But praise God! and as Paul says in 1 Cor. 15, 57, that God has given us the victory through Christ. Above this, as St. Paul says in 2 Cor. 2:14, we thank God that He always gives us victory in Christ. Last of all, be ye also with your sons concerning this, and faithfully instruct them to be content with the old customary taxes, and not to afflict the subjects with some innovation, but to follow the laudable and praiseworthy example of the Roman emperor Tiberius, of whom Suetonius writes, that, when some of his counsellors had been bent upon laying and enforcing taxes and duties upon the people, he gave them this answer: He will not do it. For it behooves a faithful and pious shepherd not to shear the sheep, but to shear them.

That would be just enough. God grant you blessed relief in your conscience. For Satan will never let us find complete peace in this troubled world, nor in our troubled blood and flesh.

772 The treaty made with the peasants at Lake Constance and in Algau on April 22, 1525, with Luther's preface and admonition to the peasants.

This writing appeared under the title: "Vertrag zwischen dem löblichen Bund zu Schwaben, vnd den zweyen Haussen vnd versamlung der Bawrn am Bodensee und Algaw. M.D.XXV. Wittenberg." At the end, "Printed at Wittenberg by Joseph Klug." 1^ Bogen in 4. In the "Gesammtausgabe"; in the Wittenberger (1569), vol. IX, p. 219, in the Jenaer (1556), vol. III, p. 102; in the Altenburger, vol. III, p. 106; in the Leipziger, vol. XIX, p. 246, and in the Erlanger, vol. 65, p. 2.

Preface by Martin Luther.

(1) I have received with great joy this treaty between the praiseworthy Union of Swabia and the peasantry at Lake Constance and in the Algäu, as a special grace of God in these desolate, horrible times, which the devil is wreaking through his red spirits and murderous prophets.

(2) And I have again sent for the same to be printed, whether perhaps God would also give His grace in our lands, that the same example might be met according to the work of the devil, and his bloodthirsty activity might be resisted, and also our peasants would desist from their dangerous, damned activity, and go to peace and friendly agreement, before God Himself comes, and their atrocious raving, both undertaken against divine and human right, is brought home with merciless earnestness.

003 For he himself hath said [Matt. 26:52], Whosoever taketh the sword shall perish by the sword. And also by St. Paul he hath said [Rom. 13:2], "He that resisteth the authorities resisteth the ordinance of God; but he that resisteth the same shall receive judgment." Such are his sayings that he wills and wills to have kept, and will not regard whether we are peasants or lords, whether we call ourselves Christian brethren, or what pretence we make; each one may judge himself according to them, God will not be mocked.

I. It is only to be known that the subjects at Lake Constance, also in the Algäu, over and against the golden bull of the Roman and imperial, Hispanic royal majesty, princes, princes and other estates of the holy empire, reformation and established land peace, swore together an alliance by a conspiracy, and thereupon threw themselves off their lords, nobles and sovereigns, in addition to which some of them have violently seized their castles, villages, towns and houses, partly burned them, also plundered some of them, urged their servants and others of their own to swear and do homage to them, and thus aroused warlike indignation in the Holy Empire: The Roman Imperial and Hispanic Royal Majesty, Princes, Princes and other estates of the laudable Confederation of Swabia, to show due aid, protection and protection to the conquered and damaged, their Confederation's relatives, and also to make physical resistance, and deaths, fires and captures, devastation of land and people have resulted from this: that the benevolent Lord, Lord Hug, Count of Montfort and Rottenfels, Lord Wolf Gremlich von Jüngingen, Knight, also the prudent, honourable and wise mayors and councillors of Ravenspurgh, through their appointed councillor friends and embassies, Gwer Schellang and Johannes. Kriegling, to put an end to such deaths, fires, seizures, devastation of land and people, and to prevent as much as possible, the well-born Lord, Mr. Georgen Truchsessen, Baron of Waltburg, the chief field commander of the reported confederation, together with Count Wilhelm of Fürstenberg, and Mr. Frowein von Hütten, and Mr. Frowein von Hütten, 1) chief of the footmen and the men-at-arms, also of other princes, lords and councillors of the confederation, requesting with the greatest diligence to grant them amicable negotiations in this matter. And after the granted amicable discussion, of unnecessary to indicate the length, and reported war disturbance, between Roman, imperial and Hispanic royal majesty, princes, princes, also other states of the reported confederation, and predetermined subjects, be settled amicably, as follows:

(2) First, the two tribes of Algäu and Lake Constance shall hand over their treaties and covenants, which they have drawn up with each other and handed over to each other, to a common assembly.

003 Secondly, they shall also do their duty, so as they have joined together for the sake of their alliance and union, count each other finally and completely free, and neither of them attracts the other further for that reason.

1) This name is spelled in all editions soon "Hütten", soon "huts"; but the former is predominant.

(4) Thirdly, after these have committed their insurrection and rebellion, as well as the deprivation of their sovereigns and dominions, against the Roman Imperial Majesty and the Holy Roman Empire's peace, the Golden Bull and common law, the peasants shall vow and swear to avoid such alliances, contracts and rebellions from now on.

5. Fourth, they shall swear and take an oath that they will be faithful, obedient, and faithful to their lords, sovereigns, from whom they have seceded, and that they will do and render their interest, taxes, tithes, and other righteousnesses, as they have done and rendered them before this rebellion, until they have justly repudiated all or part of it, by one of the following resignations or by ordinary law.

(6) Fifthly, they shall also return and deliver all monasteries, castles, cities, towns, houses, and estates, as many as they have conquered and taken in this rebellion and outrage, together with the stolen 1) property, as much as may be found or reported in their possession, to those who have stolen it 2) as soon as possible.

(7) Sixthly, whether in this outrage they have compelled any person to duties or to vouched or unvouched assessment, 3) to give prescription therefore, they shall be dead and gone.

(8) Seventhly, if all and any of the foregoing has been fully done and executed, whether one or more, common or special, of the above-mentioned two groups should think that they have been adversely affected by their sovereigns and rulers, in whatever way that may be, so that they may be duly turned around and dealt with, as common estates are most inclined to promote.

That they may be punished for their disobedience and transgression, as is fitting.

16. Fourteenth, if it should happen that the lords, nobles and sovereigns of the above-mentioned subjects do not live up to and comply with this (i) treaty, including the articles therein, in so far as they concern them, nor do they complain to the subjects, together or separately, against the law, and urge them further than the said treaty contains, and report the complaints of such to the chiefs of the league and the councillors, the common estates shall, as far as they are able, with the help of the complainants, bring them to obey the treaty of its contents in all respects, so that every complainant who desires justice may, as is due, prosper and be granted it.

(17) Finally, all ill-will that has occurred between the sovereigns and the many subjects under this outrage is hereby put away and ended, nor shall any part inflict anything unfriendly or harmful on the other outside of the law, and further than this treaty admits. Hereupon, the said subjects of Lake Constance and Algau, a committee, councillors, and attorneys with full power, have delivered to Mr. Jörgen Truchsefsen, chief captain of the army, a sealed, frugal power: namely, Ditterich Hurlenwagen of Lindau, and Thomam Maierhofer of Raitnau, on account of the subjects of the place Ober-Raitnau; Eitelhans Zigmüller of Unterthüringen, Otmar Kelk and Hans Aggenbach of Riethain, on account of Bermatinger Platz. In addition, all that this contract, also all and every article, therein conceived, contained, have fully reimbursed and executed.

Martin Luther's admonition.

1. No one can deny that our people have no right cause at all, but burden themselves with grievous and grievous sins and arouse God's terrible and unmistakable wrath against them, so that they break their loyalty, oaths, oaths, and duties, which they have done and sworn to their sovereignty, and fall into disobedience, and fall into disobedience, and set themselves against the authority ordered and commanded by God, and take vengeance upon themselves, and take the sword with their own iniquity and thirst, when God would have the authority feared and honored, though it were heathen, and did vile wrong, as Christ himself honored it in Pilate, his unjust judge and crucifier. But the peasants do not have enough of it, that they rage so faithlessly, perjuredly, disobediently and sacrilegiously against God's order, but also plunder-

They rob, steal, and take wherever they please, as public highwaymen and murderers, who disturb the peace of the land and the peace of the home. And, worst of all, they carry on such rages and atrocious vices under the Christian name and pretense of the Gospel, so that they profane and blaspheme God's name in the highest way, just as if God were pleased with the unfaithful and perjurers (who are otherwise also called traitors and evil-doers) and with public robbers and murderers and blasphemers.

002 O woe, and woe unto you damned false prophets, which deceive the poor simple folk to such destruction of their souls, and peradventure of their loss of body and substance! For whichever peasant in such a pretence shall be made whole, or be put to death, he shall be as a faithless man, a perjurer, a robber, a murderer, a blasphemer, and an enemy of Christ slain. Where he shall go, let the children tell you. They are Christian brethren. Yes, as Judas kisses and greets Christ, the devils reign there.

Therefore, dear peasants, let go, listen, and let me say to you: You are already condemned before God according to your soul; who knows how your body and your goods will fare? Finally, if you win or lose, it must be over you, for your injustice is too great and too high; God cannot suffer it for long. Give yourselves over to peace and agreement, even if it has to happen with bodily harm, so that the sin and destruction of souls may cease, where one no longer wants to gain; then God will grant His grace, amen.

The third section of the tenth chapter.

Of the revolt of the peasants in Thuringia, of which Münzer was the author.

773 A letter from the Elector of Saxony to Duke John, advising him to settle the trade of the peasants amicably. Friday, April 14, 1525.

This and the next letter are found in the Wittenberg edition (1569), vol. IX, p. 216; in the Jena edition (1585), vol. II, p. 510 f.; in the Altenburg edition, vol. II, p. 876 and in the Leipzig edition, vol. XIX, p. 241. Incomplete in all these editions. From the original written by the Elector Frederick himself, printed in Förstemann's "Neues Urkundenbuch", p. 259. We have subsequently corrected and supplemented this document.

1st Highborn Prince, friendly dear brother and godfather! Today and yesterday I received two letters from E. L., which I read and understood in a friendly manner, and I am sending the paintings back to E. L. and thanking him kindly, as I did not want to have them taken down so that they would not come to the people from me. It is God's sending and work, God grant, to a blessed end. With my weakness it is in the old essence, it cannot go at all. The next day I had such a day of pain in my right knee that I could not rest day or night.

Praise be to God, the day of sorrow has been partially alleviated. For God's sake I deserve this and other things with my sins. May He grant me to bear such His gracious visitation with patience.

2nd To my lord I heartily wished to give notice of my misgivings, which should be given to the princes for answer, but my lord knows my weakness. So this is a great bargain, that one should act by force. Perhaps the poor people have been given cause for such an uproar, and especially by forbidding the word of God; so the poor are burdened in many ways by us temporal and spiritual rulers. God turn his wrath away from us. If God wills it so, it will come to pass that the common man shall rule; but if it is not his will, and if it is not done for his praise, it will soon be otherwise. Let us pray to God for forgiveness of our sins, and let him take it home; he will make all things fine according to his will and praise. I take care that E. L. and I, as much as possible, remain idle in these matters, and do not mix with the clergy, who, as I am concerned, grant E. L. and me little good.

1) "not" is missing in the original, but is rightly added in all editions.

For God's sake, I ask E. L. to be kind to my thoughtless writing; God knows that I mean it faithfully. The Union of Swabia will probably bring the peasants to obedience. Otherwise they will force the whole world to obey them. God send them to create, so that they may also see that God is the right covenant prince, and nothing else is constant. For God is opposed to all hope.

Where the falconer E. L. made a lot of Lusts, I liked to hear.

To-day a writing has come to me from the Netherlands, in which it is written that the Vice-Reyhe [King] of Naples is supposed to have captured the King of France, and the King is supposed to have said that he would rather be captured honestly than to have fled disgracefully. But whether it is true, I do not know.

4 I did not want to restrain all this in E. L.'s friendly opinion, for I am quite willing to serve E. L. with divine bestowal. Almost hurrying to the Lochau on Char Friday [April 14]. In 1525.

774 Another letter of the Elector, the 4th of May 1525, the day before his blessed end, written to Duke John.

See the previous number. From a simultaneous copy whose variants Förstemann I. 6. p. 280 gives, added by us.

Highborn Prince, friendly dear brother and godfather! E. L.'s letter, which you have now sent to me with your own hand, in which you inform me of all the occasions of the terrible 2) riots and uprisings in E. L. and my Principality of Thuringia, and of the fact that the common peasants are turning back and forth to the monasteries. L. and my principality of Thuringia, and that the common peasants have subjected themselves to the monasteries, the houses of the nobility, and otherwise, by force 2c., I have read out together with a skilful copy in which Burkhard Hund and others have had to commit themselves; and that the things in E. L. and my poverty have changed with the times. L. and my poverty are proceeding at a rapid pace, for which E. L. undoubtedly received no small amount of discomfort, for which I bear E. L., as my dear brother, heartfelt and friendly sympathy.

1) Duke Johann noted this on the address.

2) Förstemann: "unseemly".

(2) And because the Almighty God has decreed it this way for the sake of our sin, let us give this and other things to His divine will, which, without a doubt, will know how to do it for our good. At the present time, because I am in God's power and will, I can help E. L. little or not at all, although I would like to do so with all my will.

(3) If the Lutherans in Franconia could use the tenth penny that they have paid to make the people quiet and obedient, it would not be a bad thing in this and other places. Our Lord God will undoubtedly repay E. L. and me again abundantly and graciously in other ways. And as your beloved ask that I have this market with your beloved patience, and that your beloved can give me nothing in the tithe, I will gladly do so, although it is somewhat inconvenient for me, because I am to give money to Hansen von Berlebsch, Ern Hansen von Minkwitz 3) and others in the present market. But I will do as I can, and thus tie one to the other, so that I may please your love in this.

(4) I will well believe that E. L. could easily be led into a game by the advisors' statements and suggestions, which would be noticeably disadvantageous and insurmountable for E. L.. Let E. L. put her trust in God, as I, if God wills, as much as I am granted grace, will also do, who will not leave E. L. and me here temporally and there eternally. With the Turkish money deposited at Nuremberg, your beloved knows on what condition it was deposited; since it has not been used so far to resist the Turk, I consider it that, if your beloved applies to those of Nuremberg for it, they will not hold it against your beloved. I hope that your Lords will kindly excuse me for not writing to your Lords with my own hand, for it remains solely due to my weakness. I did not want to do this in E. L.'s friendly opinion, and I am very grateful to E. L. as my friendly dear friend. L., as my friendly dear brother, willing to serve him. Date Lochau, Thursday after Misericordia Domini [May 4] Anno 1525.

Our friendly services and what we dear and good are able before. Worthy, highly esteemed and respectable, favourable, dear lords! There have arisen errors and afflictions among our citizens and country folk, whereupon some have handed over articles to us to grant and establish. Since we, out of divine commandment and love of our neighbor, recognize ourselves guilty, we are also willing and inclined to do as much as possible to ensure that among our subjects and other Christian people no rebellion or discord arises, but to prevent it, or at least to avert and calm it, and the articles handed over are nevertheless of such a nature that they require Christian consideration and counsel, and your dignities, as highly esteemed lords, are determined by ours for this purpose: ...it is our friendly and officious request that E.W. will, out of Christian love and for the preservation of the divine word, peace and unity, join us here in Erfurt, and move and discuss such articles with us and others, so that we may not violate the commandments of God in establishing them and act to abort our authority, freedom and privileges, and not deny us this request. Of this we wish to be fully provided for your dignity, and kindly again to merit it. Given under our Secret, Wednesday after the Sunday Jubilate [May 10] Anno Domini 1525. The Council of Erfurt.

776 A letter of escort which Count Albrecht of Mansfeld received from the rebellious peasants on May 11, 1525, to come to them and make a settlement with them.

This number, together with the four that follow and No. 793, constitutes the writing that Luther published in 1525 under the title: "Ein Schrecklich geschicht vnnd gericht Gottes über Thomas Müntzer, darin Gott offentlich desselbigen gehst lügen strafft vnd verdammet. Martin Luther." iz Bogen in 4. Several individual editions followed. In the collective editions: in the Wittenberg (1551s, vol. II, p. 1061); in the Jena (1556s, vol. III, p. 138d; in the Altenburg, vol. III, p. 132; in the Leipzig, vol. XIX, p. 287; and in the Erlangen, vol. 65, Walch has changed the original order of the pieces. In the original and in the other editions, they follow one after the other as follows: No. 793. 779. 780. 777. 776 and 778. Because there is no internal connection between the individual pieces, we have been able to leave them in Walch's order.

1. grace and peace in Christ our Saviour. Noble Count and Lord! We have read your letter and thank you for your Christian congregation and your faithful service, which you have done for us, even though in sending it we have alienated the poor people of Odersleuben and Pfliffe from theirs. However, we order you and yours to have a Christian day with thirty horses safely, to appear tomorrow Friday at twelve o'clock at Mertens Rita before the bridge.

(2) For this purpose, we give you our safe and harmless escort with our seal attached, and we secure you to and from your custody, without any danger, also to such an extent that you will keep yourselves peaceful with your followers against poverty and Christian assembly in the meantime, and send us escort again, to the extent that we do to you, according to which we will act. We are pleased to show you Christian loyalty and ask for a written reply. Date Thursday after Jubilate [11 May] Anno 1525.

ing be to everyone who does evil, Rom. 2, 9.

001 That thou shouldest thus misuse the epistle of Paul, pity me. Thou wilt confirm the wicked rulers in all measure, as the pope hath made Peter and Paul masters of the stocks. Thinkest thou that God the Lord cannot stir up his foolish people to put away tyrants in his wrath? Hosea on the 13th, v. 11., and Cap. 8, 4. Did not the Mother of Christ speak from the Holy Spirit, of thee and of thy like weiffagende, Luc. I, 52. "The mighty hath he thrust from the throne, and the lowly (whom thou despisest) exalted?"

(2) Hast thou not found in thy Lutheran brew, and in thy Wittenberg soups, what Ezekiel saith in his 37th chapter, v. 4? Nor did you not like to taste in your Martinic building dirt, as the same prophet further says in the 39th chapter, v. 4, the difference, how God demands of all the birds of the sky that they should eat the flesh of the princes, and the unreasonable animals should drink the blood of the "great" Hanses, as described in the secret revelation in the 18th and 19th chapter, 18. Do you think that God does not care more for His people than for you tyrants? You want to be a heathen under the name of Christ, and cover yourself with Paulo. But you will be led astray, and know how to keep yourself in line.

(3) If thou wilt acknowledge Daniel 7:27, how God hath given authority to the church, and appear before us, and break thy faith, we will gladly confess it unto thee, and have it for a common brother; but if not, we will not turn to thy lame, stale faces, and fight against thee, as against an arch-enemy of the Christian faith; then know thou to abide. Brother Albrechten von Mansfeld for conversion...

778 Luther's epilogue to the writing: "Ein schrecklich Geschicht" 2c., which primarily serves to explain the two preceding letters to Count Albrecht of Mansfeld.

See No. 776.

Martinus Luther.

(1) These two letters to Count Albrecht, Lord of Mansfeld, come from the fact that the same count, out of Christian good opinion, had offered in writing against the peasants of Frankenhausen to seek a friendly treaty with their overlords, and to act so that bloodshed would be avoided. Thereupon, as their letter reads, they named Friday for him, on their escort. But because there was business on the same Friday, the same earl and lord again sent a letter, and agreed the next Sunday after. However, God has sent Thomas Muenzer from Mulhouse to Frankenhausen; the same perhaps thought that Count Albrecht was doing this out of fear and despondency, and managed so much that the peasants gave the count no answer, and so the treaty remained, but Münzer himself wrote this Brie, as you see.

(2) The poor people have relied on these glorious words of Muenzer, and thought that the Holy Spirit spoke through Muenzer. So they have been deceived, and unfortunately more than five thousand have lost body and soul at once. Oh, the wretched wretch! That's what the devil would have, that's what he seeks of all the other rebellious peasants. And all would be sued, if only their souls were saved. But because they persist in public disobedience, unfaithfulness, perjury and blasphemy to the end, they are doomed forever.

(3) O LORD God, you wretched brutes, where are your words now, that you have stirred up and incited the poor people, saying that they are God's people, that God fights for them, that one would slay a hundred, that with a felt hat they would throw five to death, and that the cannon stones would return shooting and strike the enemies? Where then is Muenzer's sleeve, wherein he would cast all the stones that were shot against his people? Who then is the God that cried out such promises by the mouth of Muenzer almost a year?

004 Whosoever therefore shall not turn from this public judgment of God, which he hath proved in the wrath of God before all the world, nor learn how these seditionists have been against God, and have led vain lies, shall ever be wilfully and knowingly deceived and damned. What should preaching and exhortation help, if such tangible deeds and experience do not help?

005 All these things write I, and let them go forth, not that I should rejoice in the good, and in the evil of them. For what good is this to me? I do not know what God has decided about me, but I would like to warn all other rebels, and prevent them from falling into the same judgment and wrath of God, and to renounce the harmful false prophets, recognized by such judgment of God, and to give themselves to peace and obedience, as God has commanded and wills.

006 For though I am well sorry that the poor people have been so miserably deceived, and have perished in body and soul, yet I must rejoice that God hath pronounced a judgment, and judged the matter, that we may know and confess with certainty, how the revolting spirits have taught unjustly and falsely, that their doctrine and preaching are contrary to God, and are condemned of him. This is so that we may henceforth beware of them, and keep our bodies and souls safe through the right word of God.

(7) In the end, I ask all pious Christians to help us pray to God with earnestness that His divine mercy will ward off the devil and turn his wrath away from us. For the peasants have become so deeply and severely hardened and senseless that they neither see nor hear, and no preaching, no writing helps, God alone must help, otherwise there will be no end to the misery through our doings and counsel. It is no longer time to preach, but time to ask, the wrath has begun; we must defend ourselves with prayer, as Aaron defended the fire with the censer. Numbers 16:47.

(8) I also ask two things of the lords and rulers. The first, where they win and are obliged not to exalt themselves, but to fear God, before whom they are also almost criminal. For God does not give them victory because they are so righteous and pious, but, as Moses also said to the children of Israel about his wicked, because God punishes the peasants' disobedience and blasphemy along with all their iniquities.

(9) The other thing, that they would be merciful to the captives and to those who surrender, as God is merciful to everyone who surrenders and humbles himself before Him, lest the weather change and God again give victory to the peasants. May God help us soon to blessed peace, Amen. Anno 1525.

The pure fear of GOD before.

1 Dear brethren, how long do you sleep? How long have you not confessed to God his will, because he has forsaken you according to your own reputation? Oh, how much have I told you, how it must be. God can no longer reveal Himself; you must stand. If you do not, then the sacrifice, a heart-broken heartache, is in vain; you must then come again into suffering, I tell you; if you do not want to suffer for God's sake, then you must be the devil's martyrs).

2) Therefore beware, do not be despondent, be careless, no longer flatter the perverse fantasists, the ungodly wicked; look at and fight the Lord's battle, it is high time; hold all your brothers to it, that they do not mock the divine testimony, otherwise they must all perish. The whole of German, French, and Welsh land is awake; 2) the master wants to make a game, the evil-doers must take their turn.

In Fulda, four collegiate churches were devastated during Easter week; the peasants of Klegen in Hegau and the Black Forest are up to three times a hundred thousand strong, and the longer it goes on, the greater the accumulation. But this is my worry, that the foolish people consent to a false agreement, because they do not yet recognize the damage. Where there are only three of you, who, left in God, seek His name and honor alone, will you not fear a hundred thousand?)

004 Now, now, now, it is time, the wicked are free as dogs; stir up the brethren, that they may come to peace, and fetch their moved testimony; it is exceeding great, exceeding needful; now, now, now! Let not Esau have mercy on you, if he proposes good words to you, Gen. 33, 4. Do not look at the mourning of the wicked, they will ask you so kindly, cry, plead, like children; let it not have mercy on you, as God commanded through Moses, Deut. 7, 16, and he has also revealed the same to us.

1) Marginal gloss in the Wittenberg and the Jena: Notice, dear reader, how the spirit of vice and murder promises to the poor people and seduces them so miserably. Fear God and hear His word with earnestness and thanksgiving. But if you despise it, you will have to listen to such prophets of the devil, to your eternal damnation. Protect, dear God.

2) Thus Walch. Erlanger: wag; Wittenberger and Jenaer: erreget.

3) Marginal gloss in the Jena edition: "What great misfortune and misery you have already caused with this false promise.

4) Fringe gloss in the Jena: Yes, in the smoke hole.

Towns, and especially the miners with other good fellows, which will be good for it; we must sleep no longer.

005 Behold, as I wrote these words, there came unto me tidings from Salza, how the people would have put away Duke George's officer from the castle, because he had sought to slay three in secret. The peasants of Eisfeld have become merry over their squires; in short, they will have no mercy on them, it is much in their nature, in your image, you must have at it, at it, it is time! Baltzar 1) and Bartel Krump, Valten and Bishop are his.

6th Let this letter be to the journeyman; my printer will come in a little while; I have received the message, I cannot do otherwise now. I myself wanted to give the brethren complete instruction, so that their hearts would be much bigger than all the castles and armor of the wicked wicked on earth. Get at it, get at it, get at it, because the fire is hot!

007 Let not your sword wax cold with blood, forge Pinkepank upon the anvil of Nimrod, cast them 2) the tower to the ground: it is not possible, because they live, that ye should be loosed from the fear of man. You cannot be told of GOD, because they rule over you. On, on, on, because it is your day! God goes before you, follow. The story is described in Matthew 24. Therefore do not be deterred, God is with you, as written in 2 Chron. 20, 15: 3) "This is what God says: You shall not be afraid, you shall not shun this great multitude; it is not your war, but the LORD's; it is not you who war." Stand up manfully, for ye shall see the help of the LORD upon you. When Jehoshaphat heard these words, he fell down: so do ye also by God, who strengtheneth you in the right faith without fear of man, Amen. Date Mulhouse, Anno 1525.

Thomas Muenzer, a servant of God against the ungodly.

780. Münzer's very impertinent letter to Count Ernst of Mansfeld, a fierce Catholic. 12 May 1525.

See No. 776.

1) That is: Balthasar Stübener, as can be seen from No. 781, § 6. - Bishop" will probably be "Bishop of Welffenröd", cf. Idiä § 21.

2) Wittenberger and Jenaer: "jn", that is: "him" or "them"; we have chosen the latter. The Erlanger offers: "on the anvil; Nimrod werfet in den Thorm zu Boden".

3) In all editions: "2 Para. 2."

The steadfast strength, firm fear of God and the constant ground of His righteous will be with you, Brother Ernst.

(1) I, Thomas Muenzer, now pastor of Allstädt, urge you, for the sake of the living name of God, to cease your tyrannical rages and to no longer incur the wrath of God upon yourself. You have begun to torture the Christians, you have accused the holy Christian faith of being an insult, you have subjected the Christians to extermination.

002 Behold, thou wretched, scanty maggot, who hast made thee ruler of the people whom God hath purchased with his precious blood? You must and shall prove whether you are a Christian, you shall and must calculate your faith, as commanded in 1 Petr. 3, 15; you shall have safe conduct in true truth to bring your faith to light, as a whole congregation has promised you in the ring, and you shall also excuse yourself from your apparent tyranny, also declare who made you so thirsty that you want to be such a heathen villain under a Christian name to the detriment of all Christians.

003 If thou wilt remain without, and wilt not discharge the matter that is laid before thee, then will I cry out before all the world, that all the brethren may boldly venture their blood, as they did against the Turks, and thou shalt be persecuted and cut off. For every man shall be more diligent to obtain indulgences of thee, than the pope did in time past. We know nothing else about thee, there is no shame in thee: God hath hardened thee, as Pharaoh the king, Exodus 7:3, and as the kings whom God would destroy, Joshua 5 and 11.

(4) Be it ever more grievous to God that the world has not known thy rude tyranny of the buffaloes beforehand; how hast thou done such noticeable and irreparable harm, how can anyone have mercy on thee but God Himself? In short, you have been delivered to corruption by God's mighty power. If you will not humble yourself before the little ones, an eternal disgrace will fall on your neck before all of Christendom; you will become the devil's martyr.

(5) That thou also knowest that we have a command, I say, the eternal living God hath commanded that thou be forcibly thrust from the throne, which is given unto us. For you are of no use to Christianity, you are a harmful stumbling block 5).

4) Marginal gloss in the Wittenberg and in the Jena: Yes, the tiresome devil in hell.

5) Erlanger:

(6) We want to have your answer this very day, or we want to visit you in the name of God of hosts, so know how to direct yourself; we will immediately do what God has commanded us, do you also your best? Given at Frankenhausen, Friday after Jubilate [12 May] Anno 1525.

Thomas Münzer with the sword Gedeonis.

Letter for the conversion of Brother Ernst of Heldrungen.

781 Thomas Muenzer's confession, when he was questioned in kindness, Tuesday after Cantate, May 16, 1525.

This writing is in the Wittenberg edition (1551), vol. II, p. 4796; in the Jena (1556), vol. III, p. 1426; in the Altenburg, vol. III, p. 136, and in the Leipzig, vol. XIX, p. 291.

001 He is not willing that the holy reverend sacrament should be worshipped otherwise than in the spirit, but that it should be at the discretion of every one.

2. confesses that he administered the sacrament to the sick after noon, also at night, after each occasion, even if he ate at once, took wine and bread and consecrated.

3rd In Clegkau and Hegau near Basel he has given some articles, how one should rule, from the Gospel, made other articles from it; would have gladly taken him to himself, but have thanked them. Have not made indignation, but have been up ready before. Oecolampadius and Hugfeldus directed him to preach to the people, since he preached that where there were unbelieving rulers, there would also be unbelieving people, so that there should be justification. His wife had the letters written to him in a sack.

4th Says that the castles are quite burdensome and overloaded with services and other burdens against the subjects.

005 Say that a prince shall ride with eight horses, and an earl with four, and a nobleman with two; and above them not.

1) Randglosse in the Wittenberger and in the Jenaer: I drive therefore, yes, on a gag into the Thmrm to Heldrungen, and am a beschissen prophet become.

(6) Bartel Krump, a tanner from Allstadt, and Balthasar Stübener were in his alliance; there they started the riot. Item, the locksmith 2) is also in it, although he made himself difficult at first. The alliance was against those who persecuted the gospel, and the two had a register in which the allies were inscribed.

7th He Thilo Ganse, preacher at Sangerhausen, exhorted him to write a letter to the church there, to stand by the gospel, and to persecute those who oppose him; which was done by him.

8) Says that Doctor Strauss 3) has suggested to Weimar. When he disputed with the Barefooters there, he appeared at the request of the Prince Duke John, and let himself be heard by the brethren: If the Lutherans did not want to do anything else, except to vex monks and priests, they would have left it all the more alone. At that time he wrote against him in an epistle to Johann's friars at Mühlhausen: if he did not mind the way, he might well come to Mühlhausen and expel him; perhaps this was because he would have liked to be there himself.

9th Cause that he damaged and scolded my lord, the sovereign prince and count Ersten of Mansfeld, had happened because the subjects complained that the word of God was not preached to them, he had ordered them to report to each of his superiors where it was not preached and forbidden them to go to the word of God, that they then come to him, if he wanted to preach it to them, they should not let themselves be prevented from doing so or be mistaken.

10 The people of Mühlhausen let him in, and Johann Röder, a furrier, and the wine-grower at St. Blasius accepted him.

(11) He was in Mallerbach near Allstädt, and saw that they carried some images out of the church, and afterwards burned the church. I preached that it was a spelunk and an idolatry with the signs that one enters with wax; it was not commanded by God. Thereupon I warned the man from Kleusen there to go away; this was done, and afterwards the church was burned.

012 He Apel Ellenwentz's house is plundered and broken up by the brethren of Mühlhausen, that it is a burdensome house, out of several articles.

2) Hans Zeis.

none, so the brothers moved, which him 1) not mißlich, had gewest the twelve articles of the Black Forest peasants and others.

The council of Mühlhausen did not want to enter into the alliance, but left the alliance to the common man. Claus Storch and Marx Stübener of Zwickau had been with Luther in Wittenberg in a small room, and he had also been there. Luther had let himself be heard that he had beaten the All-City Spirit over the muzzle; he had not personally been there this time.

14th He Gangloff, the preacher of the sick at Frankenhausen, has accepted an ensign, if those of Heringen and Greussen were among them.

Embarrassedly asked, he replied:

15th Heinrich Gebhart at Zwickau, in the Hundsgassen, together with Hans Gebhart their appendix, are weavers, are also in his alliance.

16th He Heinrich Pfeifer has stated that it is enough that in every ward there is one castle, the others are to be destroyed.

17th Has pronounced the sentence on Matern von Sehofen, from the mouth of the community, and has consented to it. He was afraid of Count Ersten and of the community.

18. has had his refuge and reliance on Mühlhausen, that it pleases him all there. His principals there are two, as above, Kürßner and Weinbörner.

19th Confesses, where he conquered the castle Heldrungen, that he wanted to have cut off Count Ersten's head.

020 This rebellion he had made, that Christendom should be made equal, and that the princes and lords, who would not stand by the gospel, and accept their confederacy, if they were remembered as brothers, should be driven out, or put to death.

21st Bartel Krump, Bartel Zimmermann, Peter Warmut, Niclaus Rucker, Andreas Krumpe of Allstädt; Bischof zu Welffenröd, Hans Rodeman, Peter Schütte, Peter Peher in the valley of Mansfeld; Thilo Fischer zu Wimmelburg, Thilo Panse, Peter Rotoman of Sangerhausen have been in the Allstädt alliance.

22) Their article is: Omnia simul communia, that is, all things shall be common, and shall be distributed to each according to need, according to opportunity. And which prince, earl, or lord would not do this, and of that first of all he-

1) "him" put by us instead of: "you" in the Wittenberg and in the Jena. We assume that "jme" should be read == him. they shall have their heads cut off or be hanged.

23. the register has Bartel Krump to Allstädt.

(24) In his youth, when he was a collaborator there, he also made a covenant with Aschersleben and Hall.

Inside are:

25th Peter Blinte at Aschersleben, Peter Engel, is a churchman, Hans Büttener, Cuntz Sander at Halle.

26. is against the bishop duke Ersten, high noble memory, gewest.

027 If it had pleased him according to his mind, he would have taken the land ten miles round about Mulhouse, and the land of Hesse, and have proceeded with princes, counts, and lords, who would not have entered into their confederacy, as he had heard.

The people of Mulhouse lent him eight carts of rifles.

782 Münzer's farewell letter to the von Mühlhausen, written after the verdict already received, in which no sign of true repentance is expressed about his terrible vices. May 17, 1525.

This Brie is found printed from the manuscript in Seidemann's "Münzer", p. 146. After that we have given the text. Further in the editions mentioned in the previous number, immediately thereafter, only in the Jena one separated from it, vol. III, p. 145.

Salvation and bliss through fear, death and hell beforehand.

(1) Dear brethren! Since it pleases God that I will depart from here in true knowledge of the divine name, and that I will repay some abuses that were accepted by the people, who did not understand me correctly, only in view of their own selfishness, which leads to the downfall of divine truth, I am also heartily satisfied that God has decreed this with all His works, which must not be judged by outward appearance, but in truth, John 7:24. 7, 24. Therefore you should not be angry with my death, which was done for the benefit of the good and the unwise.

002 Therefore my friendly request to you is, that you let my wife have the goods which I had, as books and clothes, whatsoever they are, and let her have nothing for God's sake.

(3) Dear brethren, it is highly necessary for you, that ye receive no such slaps as those of Frankenhausen. For such without Doubt has arisen that each one seeks his own benefit rather than the justification of Christianity. Therefore, make a good distinction and take care of your cause so that you do not cause further harm. This is what I write to you about the Frankish-Haemen case, which was carried out with great bloodshed, namely over four thousand; come forward with the clear, steadfast justice of God, so that this will not happen to you.

004 I have often warned you that the punishment of God cannot be avoided, inflicted by the authorities, unless one knows the harm, which can always, if known, avoid the harm. Therefore be kind to one another, and do not provoke the rulers any more, as many have done through selfishness. So that to the grace of Christ and his Spirit we obey. With this manuscript, by Christoff Lauen, 1) I commend my spirit into the hands of God, and wish you the blessing of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit.

(5) Help my wife with diligence, and in the end flee the bloodshed, for which I will now warn you faithfully. For I know that the greater part of you in Mulhouse have never been subject to this rebellious and selfish uprising, but would gladly increase it and make it happen, so that you, these same innocent people, may not also come into trouble, as happened to some in Frankenhausen, so do not make yourselves subject to the assembly and uprising now, and ask for mercy from the princes, whom I hope you will find of the princely mind to show you mercy.

(6) This I will now declare in my farewell, so that I may remove the burden and burden from my soul; I will not allow any further outrage, so that the innocent blood may not be spilled any further. Given at Helderungen in my prison and farewell, Wednesday after Cantate [May 17] Anno 2c. 1525 Thomas Münzer.

783. D. Martin Luther's three letters to D. Rühel, Thomas Münzer and the rebellious peasants concerning.

First letter, May 4, 1525.

This letter is found in the Eisleben edition, vol. I, p. 215; in the Altenburg, vol. II, p. 886; in the Leipzig, vol. XIX, p. 243; in the Erlangen vol. 53, p. 291, and in De Wette, vol. II, p. 652.

1) This letter was dictated to Christof Lauen (Lawen).

1. grace and peace in Christ! Respectable, dear doctor and brother-in-law! I have always thought of your new newspaper, which was shown to me last time, so that I must also write about it from here. And first of all, I ask that you do not help my lord, Count Albrecht, to soften in this matter, but let it go as your lord has begun, although the devil becomes angrier and angrier about it through his possessed members; for here is God's word that does not lie, which says Rom. 13:4: "He does not bear the sword in vain," 2c. so that there is never any doubt that his rank is decreed and commanded by God. Therefore his grace shall use the same for the punishment of the wicked, as long as a vein stirs in the body. If it is forcibly taken from the hand of his grace, it shall be suffered and given back to God, who gave it before, and may take it again when and with what he wills.

002 That therefore with a good conscience the state may be followed and adhered to unto death, for the sake of the word of God, which hath ordained the same so long as it endureth; even as from no other good work shall any man desist, except it be violently beaten down; and in strife no man shall depart from his advantage, or desist from contending, except he be overcome.

003 For though there were yet a thousand more of the peasants, yet they are all robbers and murderers, which take the sword of their own thirst and iniquity, and would drive out princes, lords, and all things, and make new order in the world, that they have of God neither commandment, nor power, nor right, nor commandment, as lords have now. For this they are unfaithful and perjured to their lords. Above this they bring shame and dishonor to their great sins, to the name of the divine word and gospel, so that if God, out of wrath, were to impose upon them to do their deeds without all the right and command of God, they would have to suffer it, just as if someone else were wronged, or had to suffer it, and yet did not agree that they should do right.

004 But I still firmly hope it shall have no continuance, or ever have no continuance, though God, through the most desperate people

Sometimes the world is afflicted, as he has done with the Turks and is still doing. But that they pretend to harm no one, nor to do harm, is the devil's mockery. Does it not mean harming, chasing away masters, and beating them to death? If they want to harm no one, why do they gather together and command people to yield to their authority? If they harm no one and yet take everything, the devil would do well if they let him do as he pleases, and he would harm no one.

005 Neither is this a cause that they desire to drive out masters, because it is a will of goodness. Why do they not mend what is evil in it? Look at the (1) regiment, which has also begun in this way, and is worse than it has ever been, and still has neither fear nor discipline, but is full of warriors. Summa, if God will bring his wrath upon us, and make Germany desolate, then the enemies of God and blasphemers, robbers and murderers, as these faithless and perjured peasants, are good for it; so we suffer it, and call them lords, as the Scriptures call the devil prince and lord, John 14:30. 14, 30. Eph. 6, 12. But God keep all pious Christians, that they neither consent to him nor worship him, as he tempted Christ, Matth. 4, 1. but resist with mouth and hands as long as one always can, and die over it in the name of God.

(6) If they offer to harm no one, but we yield to them, we again offer to yield to them, and if need be, confess that they rule over us as unfaithful, perjured blasphemers and robbers, that they have no right from God, but vainly give in from the prince of the world, as he boasts in Matt. 4, that he has authority and honor over all the world, and gives it to whom he wills. This is both true, where God decrees and does not defend.

007 And I (to whom it is also true, for the devil would have me badly dead) perceive that he is angry, that he hath not hitherto been able to do any thing either by cunning or by might, and thinketh that he would be rid of me, and that he should try his utmost, and mix the whole world together; that I almost believe, and think to myself that I am the devil's cause, that

1) Seidemann in De Wette, Vol. VI, p. 695 conjicir: Schweizer.

2) In the editions: "it".

He hath made these things in the world, that God should afflict the world.

008 Well then, when I come home, I will send myself to death with the help of God, and wait for my new masters, the murderers and robbers, who tell me that they will not harm anyone. Just as that highwayman did when he said to the good wagoner: I will not hurt thee, but give me what thou hast, and go as I will; if not, thou shalt die. O a fair innocence, how fair the devil adorns himself and his murderers! But before I would approve and speak rightly of what they do, I would rather lose a hundred necks, that God would help me with mercy.

009 And if I can, in spite of him, I will marry my daughter before I die, when I hear that they continue. I hope they shall not take from me my joy and my courage. But that they should not be miserable, believe their own God, and no one else. These things I write to you, that you may be of good cheer, and comfort others, and especially my gracious lord, Count Albrechten.

(10) Stop, that God only continues fresh, (4) return the things to God, and do his divine command to wield the sword enough, as long as he always can; the conscience is safe here, even if one has to go down over it. And again, even if they punish the princes and destroy them, and in this they serve God's wrath, he will give them the infernal fire as a reward. It is a short time before the right judge comes, who will find both them and us: us with mercy, if we suffer their violence and iniquity; them with wrath, so that they take the sword themselves, by which they will also perish, as Christ has already passed such judgment, Matt. 26:52. Their deeds and their victory cannot remain for long. Give my regards to your dear Riebecke?) Given at Seeburg, on Thursday after Niserieoräias Domini [May 4] Anno 1525. D. Martinus Luther.

3) This is Luther's first statement of his intention to marry.

4) Already the next day Albrecht von Mansfeld delivered the peasants a meeting near Osterhausen.

5) Rühel's wife was a relative of Luther. At the end of the third letter he calls her his "sister-in-law". Therefore, the term "brother-in-law" is used in a broader sense in Rühel. Seeburg is located in Mansfeld, between Eisleben and Halle.

Second letter, 23 May 1525.

This letter is found in the Wittenberg (1569), vol. IX, p. 218; in the Jena (1585), vol. II, p. 523; in the Altenburg, vol. II, p. 903; in the Leipzig, vol. XIX, p. 245; in the Erlangen, vol. 53, p. 303, and in De Wette, vol. II, p. 666. The original of this letter is, as the Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. V, p. 178, states, in the archives of Count von Alvensleben at Schloss Erxleben. We have used the variants given there.

To the respectable, highly respected Mr. Johann Rühel, the Right Doctor, my favorable gentleman and friendly dear brother-in-law.

God's grace and peace! I thank you, respectable, dear sir and brother-in-law, for your new newspapers, which I would always have liked to know, especially how Thomas Münzer is doing. Please let me know how he was found and captured, and how he has fared; for it is useful to know how the arrogant spirit has fared.

002 It is a wretched thing that poor people should be treated so cruelly. But how shall one do it? It is necessary, and God also wills it, that fear and timidity be brought into the people. If not, Satan would do much evil. One misfortune is better than another. It is God's judgment [Matt. 26:52]: Hui ueeipit Zluäiuw, Zluäio peribit. This is comforting, that the Spirit has come to light, so that henceforth the peasants may know how wrong they are, and perhaps leave off their rioting or become few. Let it not grieve you so much; for it will benefit many souls, who will be deterred and preserved thereby.

My most gracious lord, the Elector, passed away on the day I left you [May 5], 1) between five and six, almost at the time Osterhausen 2) was destroyed, with gentle courage, fresh reason and understanding, has taken the sacrament of both forms, and no oaths. Is also without masses and vigils from us, and yet finely and wonderfully buried. There are several stones in

1) Luther had written the previous letter to him from Seeburg on May 4, but met with him afterwards on the return journey. Lingke, Reisesgeschichte, p. 157.

2) In the original: Osterhüsen.

He found three stones in his lungs, and especially three in the gall bladder (which is strange), almost like the quintuplets of a penny, and as thick as half a little finger is thick. He also died of the stone, but none was found in the bladder.

He did not yet know much about the uprising, but wrote to his brother that he should first seek all ways with kindness before he let it come to battle; he therefore died a Christian and blessed death. The sign of his death was a rainbow, which we, Philips and I, saw in the night of the next winter, over the Lochau, and a child born here in Wittenberg without a head, and another with upturned feet.

5) Hiemit Gott befiehlt, und grüßet mir eure Hausrebe sammt ihren Trauben. Also comfort Christoffel Meinhart, 4) that he may let God have His will, which cannot be good, even if we do not feel it. It has now become serious, what we have joked about before, about the disenchantment, boredom, and amazement. Now it's time to keep still, and let God rule, so we will see peace, Amen. To the [Archbishop of Mainz] 5) I am not unwilling to write, as you indicate. At Wittenberg, on the Tuesday after Voëem 3ueunäitatis [23 May] 1525.

Martinus Luther.

Third letter, the 30th of May, 1525.

This letter is found in the Wittenberger (1569), vol. IX, p. 557; in the Jena (1556), vol. III, p. 144; in the Altenburger, vol. III, p. 138; in the Leipziger, vol. XIX, p. 247; in the Erlanger, vol. 53, p. 305, and in De Wette, vol. II, p. 669.

To the eightable and highly respected Mr. Johann Rühel, Doctori, my favorable gentleman and friendly brother-in-law.

Grace and peace in Christ! I thank you, my dear doctor and brother-in-law, of your service in the new newspapers, God grant an end to the misery with grace, as we shall pray and hope. It is good that men call me a hypocrite, and I am glad to hear it: neither be ye astonished, since ye have heard for some years past how I have been reproached, and how I have been spoken of in many things, all of which in time have been destroyed and put to shame by yourselves. I should have much leather, if I were to shut every man's mouth. It is enough that my conscience is safe before God; he will judge what I speak and write; it shall and will be as I have written; there is no help for it.

2. to wish mercy on the peasants: if there are innocent among them, God will save and preserve them, as He did Lot [Gen. 19:15 ff.] and Jeremiah [chap. 38,13. ff. 39,14. ff.] that. If he does not, they are certainly not innocent, but have kept silent and consented to the least: though they do this because of stupidity and fear, it is nevertheless unjust, and in the sight of God, as much as he who denies Christ out of fear. For I also write the harder against the peasants, because they force and compel such fearful ones to their will of courage and God's punishment, and do not stop.

003 The wise man saith, Oibus, onus et virZa asino, into a peasant belongeth hauberk. They hear not the word, and are senseless; then they must hear the virgam, the tins, and it serveth them right. Let us pray for them, that they may obey; if not, there is not much mercy here; only let the guns go among them, or they will make it a thousand times worse.

I will write to the bishop 1) and send you a copy. One has not given Thomas Muenzer the right iuterroZutoriu; I would have let him ask much differently. Thus his confession is nothing other than a devilish, hardened obduracy in his conduct. Yet he confesses that he has done no evil, that I am astonished at it, and do not think it possible that a human heart should be so deeply hardened.

005 Well, he that hath seen the mint may say that he hath the devil in the flesh.

seen in his highest fury. O Lord God, wherever such a spirit is in the peasants, how high the time is that they should be strangled like mad dogs! For the devil perhaps feels the last day, therefore he thinks to stir the Grnndfuppe and to prove all infernal power at once. Hare sunt tewporu, I mean. Well, God still lives and reigns, but will not leave us; his goodness is more, mightier, and wiser than Satan's raging and raging.

Martinus Luther.

784 Two letters of Luther to Nicolaus Amsdorf, in which he complains about the accusations of some preachers in Thuringia and Franconia, and reports that some princes had already taken up arms again against the rebellious peasants.

First letter, May 30, 1525.

This letter is found handwritten in the 606th N. 24 n. k. 166; printed in Aurifaber, vol. II, p. 289; in De Wette, vol. II, p. 671 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. V, p. 182.

Newly translated from the Latin.

Mr. Nicolaus Amsdorf, his beloved in the Lord.

Mercy and peace! You report to me a new honor, my dear Amsdorf, that I am called a flatterer of princes; such titles of honor Satan has brought me in great numbers in these years. But I have not so much sympathy with our clever-

2) These rumors about Zeis the locksmith and D. Strauß were unfounded. Compare numbers 785-787; likewise St. Louis edition, vol. XIX* Introduction, p. 47 f. and vol. XX, Introduction, p. 39.

3) Walch, St. Louis Edition, vol. X, 2032-2071.

(1) I rejoice that Satan is so indignant and blasphemous as often as he is touched by me. For what are those voices but Satan's voices, with which he endeavours to revile me and the gospel? But he that hath hitherto so often trodden him under my feet, and crushed the lion and the dragon, will not suffer the basilisk to tread upon me [Ps. 91:13.]; let them bark therefore. Our conscience is sure that what has gone out of my mouth in this matter is right before GOD. Therefore let it be crucified and displeased to those who are exalted by our efforts and the name (titulo) of the Gospel, so that they may disgrace us by paying us this thanks, as the adulterous generation is wont to do. But they have been exalted, that they might be cast down, and that their end might be shame. The time may come when I too may say, "This night ye shall all be offended in me." Whereas we have soon forgotten the good things we have received. And how hopeful and ready are we to judge even those from whom we have learned! But Christ, who began without our counsel, will accomplish his work even against our counsel. Remind the brethren, therefore, since they have so often heard from the Gospel that we are nothing, and that the carnal mind must be put to death, that they not be hasty in their wisdom and in awakening the carnal mind. It is God who works above and against, under and apart from what we can grasp.

I cannot come to you at all, because I am so busy and called to do many things, otherwise I would like nothing better.

I am of the opinion: it is more certain that all peasants are slain than the princes and authorities, because the peasants, without having power from God, take the sword. On this wickedness of Satan, nothing can be done.

1) Instead of tzuars, with which in all editions a new sentence begins here, we have adopted quaru as a correlative to turn. Huars gives no proper sense. The kingdom of God will be devastated by satanic destruction, and even if the princes of the world go too far, they will still wield the sword of God's power. There both kingdoms can exist; therefore no mercy, no patience is due to the peasants, but the wrath and the displeasure of God and of men are due to those who do not give room to the warnings, who do not accept even the most reasonable conditions that are offered to them, but who, solely through the raging of Satan, continue to bring everything into confusion, as these Thuringians and Franks are. Now to justify them, to have mercy on them, to show them favor, that is, to deny God, to blaspheme, and to want to cast them out of heaven. This is what I say to your preachers, 2) that they should dare and try, but that I will not consent to it, but rather curse their presumption in the name of the Lord. After this the Lord will judge which of the two spirits is of the devil, mine or theirs. But I am sorry that these blasphemous people have also been given the ministry and the knowledge of the Word through us. May God convert and instruct them, or again cast them from the throne, amen. Fare well in the Lord. Wittenberg, Tuesday after Exaudi [May 30] 1525. Martin Luther.

Second letter, June 12, 1525.

This letter is found in Aurifaber, vol. II, p. 290; in De Wette, vol. II, p. 680; and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. V, p. 192.

Newly translated from the Latin.

Grace and peace in the Lord! I believe, my dear Amsdorf, that you know everything that Satan is doing through the peasants in Franconia. Then this, your Henry, as a living letter, will tell all the best things that he has heard here. I do wish that the peasants be given a sound mind, but I fear that they will become obdurate and blinded, and that the wrath of God will bring a heavy defeat upon them. They fight with a very bad conscience, then also because many of their confederates are forced by force and are there against their will. Our prince has indeed gone out strongly armed, for the sake of peace and reconciliation, as they say. Margrave Casimir is laying strong siege to Neuenstadt, where six thousand peasants are said to be assembled. The Swabian alliance attacks them from one side, from the other.

I hope that your preachers will either go into themselves, or that they will finally be resisted). You pray for me and be well. Wittenberg, on Monday in the Whitsun Octave [June 12, 1525] Martin Luther.

2) William VI of Henneberg had been forced to accept the peasants' articles on May 3. When nevertheless the peasants devastated his villages and castles, he united with the princes.

Writings and news, which belong to the history of Thomas Münzer and the peasant revolt, and explain the same.

785: Letter of Hans Zeis, Schösser of Allstädt, to Georg Spalatin, concerning the examination of the teachings of Thomas Muenzer. July 20, 1524.

From Kapp's Nachlese nützlicher Reformation-Urkunden, Theil II, p. 612.

Salutem, my dear sir, special friend! As I asked you next to the Lochau, as I also asked our most gracious lord in writing at that time, and reported that it was very necessary that Magister Thomas be interrogated, you promised to do so, and, as soon as my most gracious lord would come from the hunt this time, to bring it faithfully. Now it is of great necessity that it be done speedily and speedily, as Doctor Bridges has also reported here, that he complains that he is not to be heard, nor is he to be questioned; and his doctrine is therefore spread among the common people, so that they are also gathered together, and urge it with the sermon. It is high time to make this matter with the interrogation; for if it is not done, then there is oouteinptus prinoipum, it is to be feared that the people will throw themselves together with heaps, as he then publicly provokes; that will afflict and rob, and become such a displeasure in this manner, of which never heard. Therefore let diligence be made to set a day for a public hearing, to know whether his doctrine be true; if it be found to be true, let it be held.

If not, to abolish it; for to make a change unheard is not to be done. The people are firmly attached to him; he did a sermon here before my gracious lords, both princes, which I send you here; he has promised the chancellor, by our gracious lord's order, not to have a thing printed, his princely graces or my gracious lord, Duke Hans, have then inspected it; Take care that it is sent to Weimar, Erfurt, or any other place; he wants to have all kinds of people with him, as you may have heard. I have sent the letter to Sittichbach to Mr. Volkmarn. With this I commend you and myself to God Almighty. Date urgent, Wednesday after Alexii s20. Julis Anno 1524. 4) I ask for your friendly answer. Hans Zeis, Schösser zu Allstädt.

786: Hans Zei's report to Spalatin about Münzer's and the citizens of Muehlhausen's election. February 22 and March 5, 1525.

From Cyprian's Charters, vol. II, p. 339.

My undaunted kind service before. My dear lord and friend! Because these forgiven message fell to me in a hurry, I have not omitted to visit you with this instruction, and add you to know that ErH Jobst . . . went to Nuremberg 6 days ago, wants to fetch his wife and send himself to Allstädt. The town council gives him one guilder a week, plus he has so much grain from the fief of the castle that he has enough bread for the three of him, also so much money that he can have shoes and a shirt, that I reckon he can get along well, except for his known piety and honesty. For if I see that he will be in need, I will give him my help and assistance with everything I can to help him, and I hope that God will graciously preserve the man. God thanks you for your care and support for the poor people, shown here in this case. And let it be known to you that Thomas Münzer has been in Fulda, there he has lain in the tower for some time, and the Abbot has said at Arnstedt, on the estate of von Schwarzburg: if he had known that it was Thomas Münzer, he would not have released him. And the rumor is that he is again at Mühlhausen; then I would have a whole day to report to you of the cruel dissension and upheaval which a preacher called Pfeiffer and he are causing there; and in sum, Mr. Omnes has taken the rule away from the council, who may not punish, govern, write or act anything against their will. And after Pfeiffer and Münzern, as you may have heard, had been driven out by the council, and since they had been in Nuremberg and expelled, Pfeiffer returned and applied and complained in the villages of Mühlhausen how he had been driven out violently, but for the truth and for the sake that he had wanted to preach and make them free from the council and the authorities and from all encumbrances 2c., and the same peasants gathered with their guns and went to the suburbs of Mulhouse, stood there and preached with violence. When the council of Mühlhausen became aware that Pfeiffer was intruding on them by force, they made their order and groups in the city and marched out of the city to Pfeiffer to drive him away again. And when it should have happened, the commoners, who were supposed to be loyal to the council, went to the council and acted in such a disloyal manner, not to mention that. And their captain saw that the common people had fallen from the council, and with great trouble and labor he put an end to the game and the noise, but not otherwise than that these

1) In the old edition: "Ern."; in Cyprian: "Ern".

The preachers remain, and the council, as is evident, has been forced to do nothing, nor to create anything, without the knowledge and will of the congregation. Thus their sword is taken from them, and things are going strangely; they are gathering together, and the same group is secretly going out at times, subjecting themselves to storming the priests at night in the countryside of Duke George's land, as has now happened in Hermesleben, where Philipp Reybisch is a magistrate; and since they have been found out, Duke George has had some of them denounced in Mühlhausen. But they do not want to allow him any punitive rights. I hope it shall come to pass. It will not get any better, because they attack those of Mühlhausen, move their roads and streets, otherwise such a huge mob of boys will gather there and cause trouble for the whole country, and all the enthusiasts will perhaps get involved there with Doctor Karlstat and others, where they will find a naughty, simple-minded people. This I have not wished you to do in haste, as my good lord and friend. For you have me willingly to serve you, and hereby command me into your intercession against God, who will mercifully ... and keep you always. Datum Petri Cathedra [22 Feb] Anno 1525.

Your willing servant Hans Zeis, Schösser zu Allstädt.

I have also been told that Thomas Muenzer, who has returned to Mulhouse, wants to be a preacher, and he has insisted that he wants to be the town clerk and a member of the town council. The devil is doing all this because he wants to help cause an uprising. I wrote this first letter on the day of Cathedra Petri, but the messenger did not take it with him, and it has been lost until now. But today, Invocavit [March 5], I sent this messenger. I read your letter the next day, and I will do my utmost to please you by contacting the Domina of Nauendorf 2) with her pensions, and I will be helpful, constant, and helpful to them wherever they desire it, but there is unpleasantness at times; I truly wish that they would follow your gentle instruction. If they will, it shall not be lacking in me; they have brought in the greater part of this year's interest. Mr. Jobst is not yet come from Nuremberg. With this I entrust myself to your intercession against God 2c. Date 2c.

To the respectable and honourable Magister Georgio Spalatin, my favourable dear lord and friend.

787 Hans Zei's letter to Spalatin about the peasants' revolt in Thuringia. May 7, 1525.

From Kapp's Nachlese, Theil II, p. 664.

My willing service always before, my dear lord and friend! I have read your letter, but I bring you to know that things are bad and miserable here; all the monasteries around here have been devastated. The Domina of Naucndors is at Halle. No dominion is respected here any more, but a great contempt is poured out. Muenzer and Pfeiffer of Mulhouse are themselves captains and captains in their army, storming and plundering wherever they can; they hold 15,000 strong, some say over 50,000. The legend does not come to pass. But to him fei, so it is a miserable thing that so many princes should be in this country, and no one twitches his sword against it; they have plundered and burned Mr. Apel's castle of Ebleben, called Ebleben, one of them, called Schlothein; a castle on the Eyfelt, called Harenburg, is the one of Boltzungsleben. But from Rosenberg he has had to withdraw. Thus 6000 men lie here two miles from Allstädt, also belong to him, they increase every day, move out every day, tear down the noble farms, because they have no more monasteries. Item, take cows and feed themselves thus. But they are much more honest than Münzer's band; they are not as bloodthirsty as Münzer. With this, God is always at your command, and I will do to you what is dear to you. Date Jubilate [May 7] Anno 1525.

Hans Zeis, Schösser zu Allstädt.

have been answered, and inform you in haste thereupon that M. G. Lord, Duke George 2c., Duke Henry of Brunswick, and the Landgrave with their warband, on Monday after Cantate [May 15], before and in Frankenhausen, have slain up to 7000 citizens and peasants, and our most gracious Lord Elector of the Unfern has also had a part of it. On the Tuesday after Voesrn ckueunäitntis [May 23] the princes all moved into the field before Schlatheim, up to 5000 well-equipped horses and 7000 about on foot, with a considerable cannon. The princes who lay in the field are our most gracious lord, the Elector, together with his F. G. son, Duke George of Saxony, the Landgrave, Duke Henry of Brunswick, as supreme field captain, Duke Philip, Duke Otto of Brunswick and Lüneburg, that of Anhalt, and many other counts and lords, also honest people. On Wednesday after the Sunday of Voeein lueimäitatis, as many as 1200 virgins and women came into the camp to the warlords, fell on their knees, with open hands, with pitiful display, begging for mercy for the sake of Christ's suffering; but no final answer was given them. The following Thursday we advanced with the whole army before Mühlhausen; there the people of Mühlhaufen together with their villages came into the field to the warlords, begged for mercy on their knees for the sake of God, handed over the keys of all the fortresses, and surrendered to mercy and disgrace. Then our 300 soldiers took the city, and the princes camped half a mile away.

Thomas Muenzer and Pfeiffer, as seducers of the Christian people, were captured and beheaded [May 30]; but subsequently put on the spit. Many of Frankenhausen's and Mühlhausen's heads were cut off. They are deprived of all their weapons.

This day there are over 3000 men grinding the rampart on the city and filling the ditches.

It is said that those of Mühlhaufen must give good money to the princes of war. They have done unchristian deeds and will be severely punished.

One makes up one's mind to set out tomorrow; but where one will turn one's head out is not yet actually in the day.

New news have come that the Confederation has again slain 4000 peasants before Tübingen; and the Duke of Lorraine has slain 18,000 peasants in the city of Olsthabern, which he won by storm.

The confederation moves to Witzberg [with] 3000 horses-

10,000 good servants, in opinion to beat the peasants there too.

It is said that the peasants there broke, burned and devastated as many as 60 castles and monasteries, and committed many miserable wrongs against those of Abel and the clergy.

May the merciful God grant grace that the divine will may be done everywhere.

This is what we wanted to tell you in response to your letter, because we know that we owe it to you, our dear friends, to serve you with faithful diligence. Date in haste, Friday after Exaudi 22. Junius Anno 1525.

9 New newspaper from the rebellious peasants back and forth. The 18th of June 1525.

From Cyprian's Urkunden, Vol. II, p. 357. The superscription is by Spalatin.

My gracious lord moved with the camp before Meiningen on Wednesday in Whitsun [June 7] and arrived at Coburg on Friday, and has remained there until Wednesday after Trinity [June 14]. Where his C. G. did not come over the forest, the place would have fallen down.

The city of Meiningen has granted my most gracious lord.

Has insured the peasants at 3000 before Mellerstadt, 16 pieces of rifles, and handed over the nobility's horses. His C. G. gave them to Duke Philippo and Count Albrecht.

112 castles were broken into, plundered and burned by the peasants in the monasteries of Bamberg and Würzburg.

The Swabian League has reinstated the bishop of Wuerzburg, and stabbed many peasants; but many are lost.

The Confederation burns almost all the rebellious villages.

They also want to reinstate the Bishop of Bamberg. His towns and peasants surrender in grace and in disgrace.

Both bishops of Bressanone and Trent are even expelled from their territories.

The Tyrolean and Austrian provinces did not want to suffer Salamanka any longer with the archduke. Then he fled to the Fugger in Augsburg. There they did not want to tolerate him either. So he must be hidden.

The bishop of Salzburg had a Lutheran preacher seen; two of the townspeople had him released. He had their heads cut off. For this reason the city and the whole countryside rose up against him and paid him 20,000 euros.

strongly besieged in the castle, to have the trustworthy priest out. He should offer to resign his clerical status and become secular, and to do everything the countryside wants. But they will not. They say they will cut him into pieces, cook him and eat him, so that it may be said of them that they have eaten their unfaithful lord, who acted against the word of God.

The duke of Lorraine has stabbed the peasants in Alsace in 30,000, also Zabern, of the bishop of Strasbourg, completely plundered.

It is said that the duke has since been harmed by the peasants on the Rhine.

Strasbourg and Constance are said to have fallen to Switzerland.

The peasants have taken Freiburg in Breisgau; and advanced before Breisach, are said to be in 30,000 strong.

The people of Erfurt are very afraid of the covenant, because the bishop of Mainz has been plundered by the peasants in Erfurt.

The covenant shall have in 1800 horses, some want 1200 horses, and 6000 servants.

Today my most gracious lord has come to Weimar, not to stay there for three or four days, and then to turn to the Vogtland.

Duke Ott will pass away.

His C. G. want 3 or 400 righteous horses.

The abbot of Salfeld has been robbed of everything he had. And Mr. Friedrich Thunn feeds him.

Date Sunday after Corporis Christi [the 18th of June Anno Domini 1525.

90th newspaper, how to deal with the rebellious peasants. July 12, 1525.

From Cyprian's Documents, Vol. II, p. 360. The superscription is in Spalatin's hand.

Head chopping has yet to stop in these lands.

Doctor Teutsche, 1) the blind monk and a nobleman, Stephan Mentzinger, were beheaded in Rothenburg on the same day 25.

In these lands many poor people, widows and orphans are made out of the measure.

The Franconian princes have made a day's performance at Forchheim, there those of Nuremberg have also dispatched theirs.

Marx Sitich von Embs has the farmers in Hegau beaten.

The confederates think to make peace in the same places in a short time and to save the Cardinal of Salzburg, who has lost the whole monastery and is besieged in his castle above the city.

A few days ago, the peasants of the same place, twelve miles from Salzburg, at a place called Rastadt, laid down an excellent summa of warriors, Bohemians and Steyrians, on horseback and on foot, and wounded and captured Mr. Siegmund von Dittrichstein, governor.

So there is also toil and labour on the Rhine: the princes urge the imperial cities to restore the old customs, and to put an end to what they have done in accordance with the Gospel.

The King of France has been led to Barcelona in Hispania.

791 Beginning and end of the pernicious Peasants' War, as it happened at Rothenburg an der Tauber in 1525.

From Kapp's Nachlese, Theil IV, p. 561. Kapp took this from a manuscript in the Kraft Library in Ulm.

After the preachers of Rothenburg, Mr. Caspar Christian, Commenthur and priest here at the German House, also brothers Melchior, both of the German Order, who took the blind monk's sister in marriage (married into Leonhard Schmerzen's house), especially through Johann Drechsler, preacher, Mr. Hansen Rothfux, blind monk of the Order of the Barefoot, together with one who pretended to be a farmer, who also preached here, outside the city on the Pruel and in Kupferzell, and some citizens here in Rothenburg, the Jewish and Carolstadt sect took over, by special permission of the authorities; and D. Andreas Carolstad went to Rothenburg in his own person to preach here, and also desired to become a citizen here: it happened on a Tuesday after Oculi (21. March^, that in the town of Rothenburg 30 or 40 peasants gathered together, and bought a kettledrum in the house of Prueglin, and with the same proudly, wantonly and wantonly went to and fro in the town, over and above all the prohibitions of the magistrate and of an honorable council; afterwards they went out of the town partly to Pretta into the village, partly to Ohrenbach, and there they assembled on Wednesday and Thursday, and are now in the town.

on Friday; after that was the Annunciation of the Virgin Mary?) On the 24th of March the inner and outer council met and the 5 guards were present, all citizens were asked to come to the town hall; whoever wanted to stand with an honorable council should now stand openly; out of the whole community no more than 26 remained with an honorable council; the rest of them have from that time on sought the council against a council; Stephan Metzger 2) with Lorenz .. jumped on the bench, let themselves be heard against the municipality, with a wrong shape and opinion, they want to take it under their hands, where they surrender with a vow, want to perform their duties for them and request 36 men to the committee; which then soon took a course, with obligation in the place of an oath. In this way the congregation ran to the gates, slammed them shut, and demanded the keys from the gatekeepers by force to prevent disloyalty and malice according to the council and commonwealth. Knowing that Contz Eberhard and Georg Bremter of the inner council, Gabriel Langenberger and Benedict Malsch of the outer council had been sent to the peasants to inquire about their intentions, they could not get an answer from the peasants; for they let themselves be heard that they were not all together yet; In the meantime letters have come from Margrave Casimir, which have been read out by a whole community, which wants to indicate to a respectable council and common city help and assistance, also, where need would be, to appear in their own person, to make peace and unity, with other friendly offers. However, some of the congregation and the committee wilfully despised it and did not want to accept it at all. And this evening between 5 and 6 o'clock the Lord God was beheaded on the cross and his arms were cut off in the churchyard. On the day but with such a condition the inner council has counted them free of their duty and oath, they have become quite common; Stephan Metzger has requested the oath from them, to which Jeremias Ofner answered: Not to thee, Metzger, do we pledge, but to a whole community; So one after the other took the oath, and just as the outer council was counted by the inner council, so also the inner council was counted by the outer council free of their oath and vow, and on Monday after that they also had to owe the community, in such fears and worries that they would have lost part of their lives, for one after the other they were called out of the council chamber, each thinking that he would have to die, which two of the committee went before and two after. After having taken an oath and done his duty, each of them, unaware of the other, was brought home. On Sunday Lätare [March 26] Christianus, the beck, threw the missal from the altar to the priest in the old chapel, and thus chased the priest from the altar. On this day the peasants let themselves be seen in order, in the field before the gallows gate. On the following Monday, Ehrenfried Knuff defiantly told the priest in the parish church while he was singing: if he wanted to be safe, he should leave the altar; he threw down the missal and the masses were suspended. This night, some people from Swabian Hall were let in, namely Herman Buschlein and Dietrich Blanckenfried, in order to make time for things; however, nothing was done. On Tuesday, 700 peasants were assembled, and those who did not want to join their army were taken from them and forced to do so, as happened to a peasant in Wetterich. On Wednesday Christoph von Rosenberg, peasant, and also many from the Schipfergrund came to them. On Friday [March 31], the peasants in the army all came together, joined them in 2000, and went to Neuseß the same day; Lorenz Knobloch went out to them and promised to become their captain. On the same day some of the peasants were sent to the city to give a report of their request. In the meantime, the imperial and confederate councillors came to make peace and rode off again without being carried off, as did those from Nuremberg. On this day, all craftsmen are to present their complaints and concerns to a committee.

In Narias the inner and outer council remained with each other, in great danger, fear and worry, and the community and 36 of the committee demanded the inner and outer council, which was very difficult for them to do; 3)

Umgeld. At night the farmers went to the sand yard. On Friday after Ambrosii [April 7], the Knieberlein threw the lamps from the Sacramenthäuslein with light and oil into the church during the sermon, in the presence of some of the council. On the same day the peasants departed, and Fritz Wölkner, their ensign, came with some peasants to Rothenburg; the rest redoubled and went before Stetten, from there to Margenthal and Bischofsheim, and stormed the cellars and cellars everywhere. On Char Friday [April 14] all services in the church at Rothenburg were suspended, so that there was neither singing nor reading, only D. Johann 2) Drechsel preached, Emperor, King, Princes and Lords, ecclesiastical and secular, reviled; said, they want to hinder the word of God. On Sunday in viAÜia lioAat" 3) the blind monk, Mr. Hans Rothfuchs, called the sacrament idolatry. On the holy day of Easter there was neither singing nor reading. On Monday after [April 17], D. Andreas Carlstadt preached against the Sacrament. And in that night Kupferzell was stormed by some millers, who threw the tablets and pictures into the Tauber. On Tuesday after Easter, the articles of the exodus were announced and proclaimed, that the young priests should and may take wives, and that they should be allowed to continue their benefices for 11 years, after which they should be deprived of them, but that the old departed should be allowed to remain for the rest of their lives. While this was being proclaimed, the little servants 5) and the Dipendapß approached our women's altar and wanted to throw the images out; the others resisted this, and several bare knives were drawn. On this day it was also decided that the inner council should be changed. On Wednesday, the boards in Kupferzell were broken; some millers carried some of the paintings home with them and caused a great commotion. On this day Carolstad again preached against the sacrament and other ceremonies; the priest of Scheckenbach was drunk 4 buckets of wine by peasants. On that day, the women took 11 mills of grain from Mr. Conrad Volckhamer in front of his house, and once again

Michael Eisenhart together with the sisters 1) house. On that date Georg Berneder was elected mayor; and from the council old Hans Zagsthammer, Lorenz Eberhard, Enders Stellwag, Seisried Schmid were appointed; and Stephan Mensinger and Hieronymus Hassel were placed in the tax offices; 12 of them were also appointed from the committee, to whom all the interrogation matters are to lie. On Thursday after Easter [April 20] the women with halberds, forks, and sticks went around in Hafengasse and made a great ruckus, saying that they wanted to storm and plunder all the priests' houses. On Friday all the priests had to become citizens for safety's sake, otherwise everything would have been taken from them, as they were then all ready to submit; they gave their possessions to the town hall and had to swear to Stephan Mensinger, together with the committee, as follows. . . Article that they have neither forced nor urged to do so; each citizen has to give 1 guilder to watch over the gate and work on the moat. On Monday [after] 2) Georgii at the first hour the council together with the committee appeared in the parish church, there announced to the congregation how the peasants wanted 200 men with 100 long spears, a snake, a main gun and 2 tents; the quartermasters answered that they would give nothing to the peasants, neither vowed nor swore to give them anything or to send anything over; Pfaf Holenbach, their envoy, has said how some of them, while they were in the Sandhof, let themselves be heard in the presence of Leonhard Dener, their chancellor, and many others from the city, that they want to be helpful and constant in their undertaking, to leave life and limb with them; therefore they are now desiring the same, but have neither named nor indicated anyone. On the 5th day after St. George's Hans Balbierer had the small one enveloped and proclaimed to give the unpaid wages; while Holenbach and his family left the city again, they were told to answer the peasants to their request in writing. On this day the Margravia 15 came and promised help and assistance. On the day of Vitalis [April 28] grain was distributed, but not everyone took it. On Wednesday 3) Lorenz Knobloch of Oeten was killed by peasants.

1) "Sisters" put by us instead of: "Sister". From the following it is clear that the "sister house" is meant.

2) "After" put by us, because Georgius (April 23) was a Sunday in 1525.

3) This is probably where the report picks up again, because Vitalis was a Friday.

They were cut in pieces and threw the pieces at each other. At last they cut off his head and split it in two. On the day of Vitalis the peasants marched before Jpphofen, then before Meinbruch, and let themselves be heard, they wanted to see soon what the people of Rothenburg were doing. On the day of Philippi Jacobi [May 1] in the night the monastery of Eichenhausen was burned; the same night the people of Dünkelspiel plundered Münchsroth, likewise the peasants the monastery of Schwartzach. Thus the castle at Cleversperg was burned; wine and grain were plundered by the von Ayb. On Thursday after Orneis [May 4] the peasants, called Schwaetzhauf, went from Heibronn to Bishesheim, desired the bullet that was in Boxberg. The night before they lay at Bütenheim. On the day Iodurmis ante xortur" lutinam [May 6], early in the morning, they rang with the great bell of the community into the parish church, was held up to them by Mr. Carlen von Hobspersg, Friedrich von Tödwang, Count Manderscheid, the margrave's friendly request, how his grace with his wife, also all his jewels to Rothenburg to go, body and property with them leave, 86a major x>ur8. 5). . . Also the question is, whether one should send to the peasants or not? therefore in the afternoon the community requires to the town hall. On the day of Lpimaolr [May 10] one has received news through writings that 3 cities, namely Heilbrunnen, Dünckelspiel, Wimpfen, have united with the peasants, and held to them, and how not less Rothenburg would be more and higher compelled: the of Rothenburg should leave wife and child, and go to them, for the order of the word of God. After such, at 6 o'clock, all citizens are again called to give their vote, whether one should send men or bullets to the peasants? has been the council of the more part, one should send them bullets and spears, has been sent to them before night, and the night one has wanted to attack the Heisterhof, Deutschhof and Frauenkloster; on the day i^rsri and Uurieratii [12. May^ at 8 o'clock they made a noise, and demanded and summoned all jurors and pledges to the market in front of the town hall, where they were proclaimed by Erasmum Nißle that all priests who have property should hand it over to the committee.

Town hall, with penance and loss of their property; it has also been shouted out in some streets. Afterwards, clergy and seculars entered the order, stepped in front of the Henserhof at first, some of the council and committee went in, and took the house. Mr. Caspar von Stein was told not to drink anything, except for a time, after which the monastery, sister house, women's monastery, German house, were accepted in the same way with vows. After that they came before Master Augustin Gumppelein's house, at the pure Mary's, took the same, and with 12 buckets of wine at the Gemein verbeut and drank up. On Monday the envoys came to the farmers, Eberhard and Kretzer were killed. On Sunday Cantate [May 14] some of the peasants appeared at the town hall, some articles were held up to them, and they were ordered to accompany the cannon. After that, on Monday, May 15, early after the striking, the bells were rung in a common way, and everyone ran to them. So Florian Geyer held up several articles to the congregation in the parish church, concerning the peasants of their brotherhood, which was to last a hundred and one years, that nothing else was to be done, except what was evangelical, for the special salvation of God's word, and that neither rent nor validity was to be given until the matter was settled, except what old known debts were. And thereupon requests a council, committee and municipality to commit themselves to the peasants with an oath and vow and to bind themselves that [it] be done immediately; although many of them did not like it, they still had to obey in part. So also on this day Rothenburg passed from the kingdom to the peasants. In the meantime a gallows was erected on the market to punish the evil in the opinion and according to their brotherhood. After that, at 5 o'clock, 2 tents, 3 wagons with powder and stone 1) were led to the pile, Ehrenfried Kunst, Georg Spelter the Younger, went out through the city with some others in great pomp and splendor, accompanied the bullet into the camp with the peasants, in the opinion of conquering the castle of Wuerzburg, and Hans Böstlein, a bowler, was accepted by the peasants as a gun master. On the Monday after Cantate, more than 300 peasants ran up the mountain to storm the castle of Wuerzburg, all of whom perished: some were thrown, some were shot, some were slain and caught like birds. In the meantime the Peasants, who made a plot in the city and also by heart, to take the city by ambush, requested that they should be slept in at the hospital gate, and those in the city outside, thus want to run down the gate and take possession of it. When they became aware of this, they prepared to defend themselves. So they let them in at the Kupferzellerthor, and they thought they would beat them all to death; but they were resisted by the old lords. On May 12, the peasants of Hohenlohe, Entrieb Wütig von Adelshofen, Hans Biebra von Dierbach, their own lord, ravaged the castle of Schillingsfürst through Heinrich Zeitgrafen. On Monday after that Margrave Casimir went out with power to castigate his peasants by burning. On Friday after that burned Sundheim, Westheim, Wundelsbach, Hegen. Dom. Lxxuüäi [May 28] Mr. Hans Koein, the noble, pastor of Werinch, was beheaded with 4 peasants at Lentershausen, and 7 had their fingers cut off; at Neustadt an der Aisch 18 citizens and peasants were beheaded. On the Friday before Pentecost [June 2], 4000 peasants were slain by the Bündische at Königshöfen in the Tauber Valley, including 22 from Mergentheim, among them also 7 priests; Weickersheim 42 were burned down there for 800 fl. and 7 were beheaded. On the day of Pentecost, more peasants were slain by the Bündische at Bithard and Sulzdorf, namely 8000; 300 escaped to a castle called Ingolstadt, located near Giebelstadt, before which the Bund suffered the greatest damage; for in such battles more than 200 Bündische on horseback and on foot did not perish. On the day of Pentecost, Conrad Eberhard, Erasmus von Mihle, and Thomä Zweifel were sent to Margrave Casimir in Rothenburg. They led red crosses and tried hard to obtain mercy; they were told that they would not be accepted in any other way than by grace or by disgrace. for blood and fire plunder, or banned from the city 30 miles behind; in addition the city had to give several tons of powder. On Thursday [June 8], when the confederation retook the city of Wuerzburg, 26 men were beheaded there, namely captains, Fähndrich, Waibel and 6 of the council. On Friday after Corporis Etiristi [June 16], Mass was held again here in Rothenburg at the Holy Blood. On Friday after Whitsun [June 9] Florian Geyer was baptized at the Holy Blood.

was stabbed to death in the field; later the alliance moved and came to Bamberg, where 21 were beheaded, and at Kitzing 58 had their eyes gouged out. On the day of Corporis Christi [June 15] they began to give the 7 fl. On Tuesday Spielbach and Schwarzenbronn were burned. At the Rothenburg church consecration one began again to sing Vespers. On the day of the church consecration, Stephan Mensingen, as he left the church after the sermon, was caught in a black lot, and as he was led across the market, he cried out: Help, you dear Christians, help, but no help was forthcoming. On the evening of St. John the Baptist [June 23], D. Johann Drechsel was caught and put in with the blind monk. Caspar Commenthör and the priest escaped secretly with D. Andreas Carolstad, brother Melchior, who had the blind monk's sister.

On the feast of St. John the Baptist, the German gentlemen began again to sing our Lady's Mass and the Daily Mass; it has not been sung for 13 weeks. On the days of Petri and Pauli [29. June] Margrave Casimir rode in here in Rothenburg, with 800 on horseback, 1000 on foot, 200 wagons quite well equipped, with his best bullets, which were led to the market, and here in Rothenburg on that date 500 Margravia and canine footmen were drawn up, divided into 2 groups: the first on Ahrenbach, thatelbige plundered, afterwards together with the church in reason burned; the second bunch to Breda moved, a beautiful village, have it also plundered, some stabbed, namely Regryß behind the table, Brandhans in the stable, and Hans Schmid on the lane, Hans Element and Marx Hans were stabbed from the Holzzlein; The 12 of them were bound together, and thus led into custody until Bühn, where they were released, after the church and the village had been burned down, and 600 head of cattle and 30 wagons of plunder had been taken. On Friday after Petri and Pauli [30. June] the herald in the town of Rothenburg blew up the drommete, and all citizens and residents were required to go to the market in a circle, which the lansquenets had decided on and made with spears, together with the soldiers; Hans von Seckendorf, the burghers of Rothenburg, denounced their resignation from the kingdom and their fall to the peasants, as well as the great and severe misfortune into which they had fallen and forfeited their bodies, honors and goods; in addition, the entire city was sealed off, with many other frightening words, which frightened the men; however, in view of some honorable and respectable people, they graciously agreed to pardon them, but they did not want to be punished.

of measure and form, that they should all now pledge allegiance to the realm, and swear to the covenant, with many other words; which was done immediately with fingers stretched out. In attendance was Margrave Casimir of Pappenheim, on account of the covenant, and many of the nobility. Afterwards some citizens were read out, who had been beheaded from hour one, namely Peter Reichel, furrier, Engelhard Goppel, Georg Stull, Georg Pflüger, Hans Conrad, der Prüglin Mann, Thome Heichtel, Burkhard Weidner, Hans Böhm, Wilhelm Besamair, N. Hans Rumpf, Vicarius in the parish church; the bodies were left lying on the market all day. Some of the ring, Lorenz the furrier, Job Schat, Fritz Dalck, Melchior Mader, Hans Marck, would otherwise also have been judged. On Saturday [July 1] at night in the marketplace the following were beheaded: Stephan Mensing, D. Johann Preding, 1) the innkeeper of Ohrenbach, Kilian Schmid of Spielbach, Leonhard Leuter of Ohrenbach, Hans Kretzer, innkeeper, Burkhard Müller, the shoemaker. The blind monk was executed standing up, but failed. Sebald, butcher, piece, Peter Lenck of Detewang, the peasant of Enzerweil. Otherwise two farmers, a lansquenet, lay the whole day on the market, buried later on the churchyard to the pure Margareth. On the Sunday after [July 2] Margrave Casimir went away with all the people to Blofelden, captured some peasants there, namely 10, then came to Hildesheim, had 4 of the peasants beheaded. On Sunday, Catharina Greuser and Regina Schusterin were put in the stocks, and the city was subsequently banned because they had taken grain from Mr. Volkheimer. On the following Saturday, Mr. Stöcklen, pastor, was imprisoned in Neuseß.

On Monday after that all the women of Detwang were put into the madhouse, there were 10 of them, because they mowed down the German lord's meadows and burned the hay 2c. On Wednesday after that, Mr. Hans Hertzog, pastor of Steinsfeld, was caught and released. On Friday after Ascension Day [August 18] Georg Renich, vicar of the hospital, was captured, and on the evening of Bartholomew [August 23] he was banned from the city.

On Tuesday after Nativitatis Narius [September 12], Mr. Hans Stückerlein, pastor of Neuseß, was put in the stocks, a cross was burned on his forehead, and then he and a farmer of Ohrenbach with rods, because he said he knew how to bring 300 peasants into the city, also to make a fog. On the same day, the funeral of Margrave Hansen of Brandenburg, who is in Hispania, was held; and here Fritz Mölckner von Warthenberg, Kilian Tückischerer, Michel Leinweber, Kilian Weitner were beheaded. On Wednesday after that Adam von Dungen with 80 on horseback and some on foot burned down Schweinsdorf together with the church, also Nerthenberg, Weiler, Harterzhofen, Gottenhofen, Reutsagen, Adelshofen, die Hart, Hückelhausen, Steinsfeld; partly Grumpelshofen, Helmshofen; and while doing so, he wrote a letter to the city, complaining how his mother, also a fine housewife in his dwelling at Wuerzburg, had been robbed of some jewels, household goods and other things by the peasants of Rothenburg, also by some citizens, and how in other weaknesses it had been proven that he had often been required to give in, and that no sacrifice had been made to him. Therefore he and his helper wanted to be their enemy and thus wanted to preserve his honor; they took more than 2000 head of cattle, also plundered several wagons full, later he took 100 lansquenets, the previous ones bravely besieged.

On Tuesday before Michaelmas [Sept. 26] Hans Lachinger, a nobleman of Welkershofen, was captured and delivered here to Rothenburg, put in a tower, then let out again. On Burckardi [Oct. 14], Leonhard von Schwarzbrunn, the peasant captain, was stabbed to death by one of our mercenaries in the inn behind the table in Teidsiedel. [Adam von Dungen and his helpers also laid down 8 wagons with wine between Neubrunnen and Kerndorf, more than 3 unloaded wagons, some of the carters were stabbed, 4 loaded wagons belonged to Georgen Bremeters, 2 to Hieronymus Hesels, and more than 800 fl. were hit. Thereupon the market or fair was suspended and cancelled, and on St. Andrew's Eve [Nov. 29] no bell was rung, as in former times, nor was any stuff knocked out, to prevent other infidelities. Also on Sunday the house, called Catharina, was set on fire, and the woman's house immediately by the guards, the woman was put in the tower, and expelled from the city. On Sunday after St. Andrew's [Dec. 3], in the evening after vespers, Cressanii, the German lord, has provided Adam Hübner's wife with the sacrament, six boys have run to meet him, have spit on him, and beaten him with sticks, along with many other mocking words. As they walked back and forth they shouted, "Will you carry the idol again?"

home! In the morning they were seized and put into the tower, painted with whips and left out again the next day. On Niclaus evening [Dec. 5] Paulus Wacker's house was set on fire. The same day Peter Keßler of Kelberbach had his eyes gouged out at the market, because he had betrayed the wine. Anno 26 on Wednesday after Judica s<sup>21</sup>. Marches 2 Scheuren burned down to the Lindla, afterwards on Thursday to Herbach the land tower, and in the village 10 Scheuren burned down. On Monday after the Palm Day ^26. Marches one has cut off the fingers of the Wegerer of Breda on the market, offered from the country, has been the farmer Fähndrich. On the same day letters came from Speyer, from the minster and chapter, St?) Johann Ordens, to a council, have requested that one should retribute to them again what one has taken from them to the rich red and court here in the city. After that the Commenthur, Caspar von Stein, has been given 60 Fl. and has again been counted free of his oath and duty. But after Adam von Dungen, with the responsibility of an honorable councilor, could neither be quieted nor calmed, but rather provoked and moved to tyranny out of anger and reluctance, he dared to enter the city before Exaudi, which was the day of St. John [anto portuni lutinum], 2) ... gathered together with his helpers and assistants, Wölffen von Velberg and Georg von Reich, Dieterich and Georg von Dungen, Philippus von Berling, Hans von Berling, Valtin von Grumbach, Wilhelm von Crailsheim, Eberhard von Stetten, Georg Fuchs, Philipp von Rosenberg, Caspar of Landstorf, Hans of Cubspach, Count of Hesse, and others more of Fellers in the city and castle, about 500 in horse and 500 on foot, in measure and shape, as if they were dogs, and wanted to join the league, with red raised crosses. On Monday after Exaudi [May 14] they lay at Blabach and marched across the hunt. At night they came before Oberstetten. They captured, plundered and burned it for 2000 fl. and 100 fl.; they captured some peasants; they also undertook to capture Thierbach, although it could not have been the same day, but on Tuesday after that they captured it, plundered it, and burned out several parts of it. On Wednesday they plundered Hemberg, there-

Johanniswerth, by the grace of God no one was harmed; while clergymen and seculars ran to the market, walls and tower, with armour and defence, ours, together with the Nuremberg gunsmiths, bravely shot out with our bullets at the old castle and elsewhere. In the meantime our mercenaries have plundered and burned Georg von Rein's Weden Geilingdorf, situated near Ohrbach, and have captured several peasants. On the same evening 200 soldiers came here from Nuremberg, on Saturday before Pentecost in the morning our enemies started again and burned Vorbach, Düenhof, Weder, Leutzenbrunn, Halkenbrunn, Heuendorf, Behmweiler, Schmerbach together with the church, Reinbach together with the tower; and so they left the army and returned home with great plunder and looting. On the day of Pentecost, D. Georg von N. was sent here from Anspach with a credentials, excusing the Margrave and his own. On the same day 60 lansquenets came from Frankfurt, were in the pay, although more of them were on leave again. On the evening of Praxedis [July 20] Georg vom Rein fell with 45 on horseback into the army, estimated the host at Ellmerzhofen, burned Northenberg. At that time there was a clamor, in the city everyone, clergy and secular, with armor and armor ran to the market, stood there until vespers. Then the servants and some of the townspeople went out with five rifles, and so captured the New Castle, but did not burn it. They came back around the time of the beating. Later, at the Diet of Speyer, all wars and enmities were judged, agreed upon, and abolished, so that all prisoners on both sides were left alone and without money, and whoever lost was forfeited.

792 Aurifaber's account of these peasant wars and their most unfortunate outcome for the peasants, in which he also remembers Luther's and Melanchthon's zealous efforts to control this evil.

This document is found in the Eisleben Collection, vol. I, p. 277; in the Altenburg, vol. III, p. 303 ' and in the Leipzig, vol. XIX, p. 302.

(1) In this twenty-fifth year a new fire has been kindled, and a great noise has arisen, which the devil has stirred up against the doctrine of the Lord, namely, the revolt of the peasants. For in Alsace and Swabia, also in Franconia and Thuringia, the peasants rose up, stormed the monasteries, burned and destroyed the castles and residences of many nobles, wanted to withdraw obedience from princes, counts and other authorities, and even pretended to abolish them and strike them dead. And especially in Thuringia there was such an uproar and such a game as Thomas Münzer, priest of Allstädt, who camped with the peasants in Frankenhäusen.

(2) Against this murderous spirit, Doctor Martin Luther wrote earnestly, and warned the city of Mulhouse against the Muenzer, and also wrote to other estates to beware of outrages and riots. In the same way, Philippus Melanchthon also had several splendid writings go out in print to quench this fire. But God, as a founder and protector of the sovereignty, soon controlled this murderous spirit. For on the Rhine River, many thousands of the rebellious peasants were slain by Duke Anthoni of Lorraine at Alsace-Zabern; but the Swabian peasants were put down by the Swabian League. Thus Prince John, Duke George of Saxony, Landgrave Philip of Hesse, and Duke Henry of Brunswick also defeated the rebellious peasants at Frankenhäusen, and had Thomas Muenzer captured and beheaded before Muehlhausen, along with one of his companions, called Pfeiffer.

(3) On Easter Day [April 16], when Luther had preached early in Wittenberg, he departed from there after noon to Mansfeld and visited Eisleben, Stollberg, Nordhausen, Erfurt, Weimar, Orlamünde, Kahla, and Jena, there to control the rebellion with sermons and exhortations; but in his absence Duke Frederick, Elector, departed with death to Lochau, buried Wednesday after Jubilate [May 10] at Wittenberg, therefore M. Luther hurriedly arrived again the Saturday after Nisorioorāias Domini [May 6] at Wittenberg, and preached the Sunday Jubilate there.

793. D. Martin Luther's Preface to the Scripture: "Terrible History and Judgment of God on Thomas Muenzer."

See No. 776.

To all the dear Germans Martinus Luther.

Grace and peace! This manifest judgment of the eternal God, and terrible history, which he has let pass over and against the doctrine and Scripture and mobs of Thomas Muenzer, the murderous and bloodthirsty prophet, I have sent forth to warn, to frighten, to admonish all those who are now engaged in sedition and discord, and to comfort and strengthen all those who see and suffer such misery, so that they may understand and feel how God condemns the spirits of the mob and the seditionists, and is willing to punish them with wrath.

002 For here thou seest how this spirit of murder boasteth that God speaketh and worketh through him, and is his divine will, and doeth as if all things had been won with him; and before he looketh round, he lieth in the mire with some thousands. But if God had spoken through him, this would not have happened. For God does not deny, but holds fast to His word [Deut. 23:19, Heb. 6:18]. But now Thomas Muenzer is missing, it is in the day that he spoke and drove under God's name through the devil.

003 But that it may be seen the more clearly how he hath been made a liar by the judgment of God, I will let pass beforehand some of his epistles, wherein he thus defieth God, and blasphemeth his name, that it must be confounded, as God hath not suffered it any longer. May the grace of God be with us, amen.

794. Philipp Melanchthon's History of Thomas Muenzer.

This writing is found in the Wittenberg edition (1881), vol.II, p.473d; in the Jena (1686), vol.III, p.131 b; in the Altenburg, vol. III, p. 126, and the Leipziger, vol. XIX, p. 293. von der Hardt, antogr. I'ntti., tom. I, p. 210, gives the following title: "Die Historia Thomä Müntzers, des Anfängers der Thüringischen Aufruhr, sehr nützlich zu lesen"; this title is also in the old Gesamtausgaben. We give the text according to the Wittenberg.

001 After Martin Luther had preached for some years, and taught the gospel purely and clearly, the devil sowed his seed, and raised up many false and injurious preachers, whereby the gospel was again blinded and suppressed, and great bloodshed was caused. For Christ hath given the devil the title, and hath thus confuted him, that he hath been a slayer from the beginning, and until the end of the world he maketh murder [John 8:44].

002 Wherefore he possessed one, whose name was Thomas Muenzer, who was well learned in the holy scriptures, but abode not in the way of the holy scriptures; but the devil deceived him, and drove him from the scriptures, that he began no more to preach of the gospel, and how men should become godly, but devised him out of a false understanding of the holy scriptures a false and seditious doctrine, that all authority should be put to death, and that henceforth all goods should be common, that there should be no more ruler, no more king.

(3) This he drove into the foolish mob very violently, reviling and reproaching the princes, how they oppressed, afflicted, abused, and scraped the poor man, that they might keep their useless pomp and cost. Item, they afflicted the poor man with harm, when Christian love demands that no one set himself above the other, that everyone be free, and that he have the commonwealth of all goods.

(4) He also made a pretense of such devilish teaching, pretending that he had revelation from heaven, and did not teach otherwise, nor did he offer anything, if God had told him so. It is not to be measured how hard the devil has possessed man, that he has been allowed to boast of heavenly revelation, and to attract God's name so brazenly with lies. Neither can it be believed, even among the descendants, that a man could fall into such presumption, that he could boast of such great things when there is nothing in it.

005 And there were more such things before. For there was one called Manes, who pretended that he was the true Christ and the Son of God, and made disciples of him.

1) So the Jena; Wittenberg: den.

2) Wittenberg and Jena: not.

He had many people attached to him, whom the devil thus drove into error, that he might destroy them of body and soul.

006 And so it is, and the devil hath used such cunning, which cannot be understood by reason, and may not be well believed by unlearned men. But one has driven with this Thomae in such a way that one has recognized him well. I will also recite the histories most diligently, and tell how he behaved.

007 There is a place called Allstädt, in the place of Thuringia, in the Harz, toward Saxony, belonging to the Elector of Saxony; thither Thomas went. For though he boasted that he had the Holy Spirit, and was not afraid, and had a divine command to preach in all the world, yet he sought a nest there, that he might be safe under the protection of the pious prince, Duke Frederick, Elector of Saxony, under whom the priests, who preached against old unprofitable customs, were safer than elsewhere.

8th Now that he was in residence at Allstädt, he first preached that he had made a great rumor against the pope and Luther alike, how the papal and Lutheran doctrines were unfit. The pope had bound the consciences too hard with unreasonable burdens and ceremonies, but Luther made the consciences free from papal burdens, but let them remain in carnal freedom, did not lead them further in spirit and to God. With such talk he opened the mouths of the simple-minded rabble, and they ran to hear something new, as Homerus says, that the new song is best for the rabble.

(9) Now what the pope and Luther taught is too long to relate here. But what Muenzer taught, and how he fell from one error into another, is useful to know and to remember, so that we may take an example from such history, and watch, and pray to God to keep us from falling into error, and being blinded, so that we come out of the Christian way altogether. For as when a man travels overland, if he misses the way once, it often happens that the farther he goes from the right way, so it is also in these matters: as soon as one misses the truth once, and one has let the devil deceive him, the longer one goes on the farther one errs, and the devil leads the wretched people by the nose, as one leads a buffalo.

(10) Let us now lately consider what Thomas preached. He taught that it was true that piety was not in the papal orders, therefore it should be left alone. And he taught that one must therefore come to right and Christian piety. In the beginning, one must refrain from public

The body should be chastened and martyred with fasting, with bad clothing, with little speech, with no anger, with no cutting of the beard. And the body must be chastened and martyred with fasting, with bad clothing, with little speech, with sour eyes, and with no cutting of the beard. He calls such childish discipline the death of the flesh and the cross, which is written in the Gospel. This is the origin of all his sermons.

011 Further, when one had thus adorned himself and dyed himself, he taught that he should go into secret places, and often think of God, what he is, and whether he would also take care of us; then the heart would find that it doubted it, not knowing whether God greatly inquired of us, nor whether it was true that Christ had suffered for our sakes, and had redeemed us, because we were yet in such great distress and misery; it would also want to know whether our faith or that of the Turks was right. Hitherto such a sermon would have been suffered, but he hath taught great blasphemy.

(12) Then one should demand a sign from God, so that God may testify how He cares for us and that our faith is right and true. If God does not soon give such signs, one should not desist, but continue to boldly demand them with great earnestness, to be angry with God, to curse him, and to reproach him for his righteousness, that if it is written of him that he wants to make everyone blessed [1 Tim. 2:4] and to teach the truth, and to give why he is asked, he is doing wrong if he does not show a sign to such a heart that desires from him true knowledge of God.

013 In such wrath, saith Thomas, God is well pleased. For from this he would feel how much they desired him, and he would act like a father, and give signs, and quench this thirst of souls, because it is written of him that he will give drink to the thirsty [Isa. 55:1, Rev. 21:6], and he says that God would then come and speak to them verbally, as he did to Abraham, Jacob, and others.

014 Yea, he saith openly, which is a fearful thing to hear, that he would shit in God, if he spake not unto him, as unto Abraham and other patriarchs. This he called the certain way to heaven, and drew on the fable much scripture forged, cried out and scolded horribly. Those who spoke against it he called Pharisees, who did not know God rightly and truly, but looked into the Scriptures like the blind, and yet did not find God there.

015 All these things pleased the people well, that they should talk to God, see signs. For human nature is inquisitive, and desires to know great and secret things. And the fame would be good for the rude people, so that they would think they were more holy and more learned than all the students.

1) Wittenberger: "not alone". The Jenaer has erased "alone".

16 But it is useful to say what signs Thomas dealt with. He says that God reveals His will through dreams, and bases the whole construction on dreams. Whoever had dreamed something of God, considered himself pious, or whoever had a dream that could be interpreted as a story, considered them to be Christians and prophets, praised them in open sermons, so that he might draw them to himself, and with such praise he also inflamed them to defend him more fiercely.

017 By this he made him an accident to the mad mob, and for the love of it he changed also the ceremonies of the churches, the singing, the dress, and the like. For such novelty was well loved by the reckless rabble.

018 Thinking therefore that he had enough renown, and that the common man would follow him, he broke forth further, and purposed to make a noise under the appearance of the gospel, that he might cast out the rulers, and that he might sit in the nest, and be mighty and rich; and began at Allstädt, and made a register, and wrote therein all that joined themselves to him, and pledged themselves to punish the unchristian princes, and to establish Christian government. For he pretended that God had commanded him to change the worldly government.

019 Hitherto he had not yet spoken openly against the authorities, but only the dream, which we have told, how men should become godly, and know God, he had driven into the people, and preached against Luther and the pope at the same time.

020 But because he taught no sedition, Duke Frederick, Elector of Saxony, suffered him, and drove him not out. Luther also wrote to Duke Frederick that he should not be chased away.

021 But when he began, and thought he had help enough to make a noise, he began, and taught sedition, that they should not be obedient to worldly authority, and should cast them out of the government; for such (he said) God had chosen him, by whom the whole world would be helped.

22 So Thomas taught two errors in sum. One was about spiritual things, that one should demand signs from God, not take comfort in the Scriptures, or that dreams were a sure sign that one had received the Holy Spirit. The other error has been about worldly government, that one should not follow it.

should be obedient, yet the Scriptures very earnestly command such obedience.

023 Then Duke Frederick thrust him out of the country. Thomas then forgot his great spirit, and went away, and hid himself half a year. After that he arose. For the devil did not let him rest, and went to Nuremberg. But God took special care of that city so that Thomas would not be imprisoned there. For if Thomas had succeeded there, it is to be feared that a much more terrible noise would have arisen than in Thuringia.

024 The council of Nuremberg chased him out of the city. Then he turned and went back to Thuringia to Mühlhausen. For while he had been in Allstädt, he had attracted to himself a number of wicked boys from Mühlhausen, and they made room for him in the city and made him a customer, so that the congregation accepted him as a preacher.

025 But the council opposed it. But in order that he might continue in his office, he, Thomas, encouraged the mob to dismiss the council as unchristian and to elect a new Christian council, which would allow him to preach. This was done, and the honorable people were deposed from the council, and some were also driven out of the city.

026 This was the beginning of the new Christian reign. After this they expelled the monks, and took the goods of the monasteries and convents; and the Knights of St. John had a court, and great rent, and Thomas took the same court.

027 And that he might be in all the games, he also went with them unto counsel, and pretended: To speak rightly must be done by revelation from God and by the Bible. So what pleased him was judged, and it was considered to be the special command of God.

028 He also taught that all men should be common, as it is written in po8tolorurri [Cap. 4:32], that they should have goods in common. By this he made the rabble so wanton that they no longer wanted to work, but where one needed grain or cloth, he went to a rich man, where he wanted, demands it out of Christian right, for Christ wanted one to share with the poor [Matth. 19, 21.]. Where a rich man did not willingly give what was demanded, it was taken from him by force. This happened to many, even to those who lived with Thomas in the court of St. John. Thomas did this, and every day he did more and more, and he threatened all the princes in the neighborhood that he would humiliate them.

29. this he did for nearly a year, until in the

The year 1525, when the peasants of Swabia and Franconia were stirred up, for Thomas was not so bold as to make a noise, although he said that God had commanded him to do so, until he hoped that he would have his back against the foreign peasants. For in Franconia more than 40,000 men lay in the field in three heaps, had chased away the nobles, had burned and plundered almost all the castles.

030 Then Thomas thought that he wanted to meet the hour, the princes would be frightened, the nobility would be driven out, the peasants would keep the field, and he also wanted to be in the game, and to begin his reformation; and he let himself be heard in sermons, the time would come, he wanted to go almost to the field, he poured out rifles in the Barfüßer choir, the peasants also ran with heaps of Mühlhausen, they all wanted to become rich.

(31) He had a preacher with him, whose name was Pfeiffer, a monk who had run away, very good at games, wicked and wanton, who wanted to make the first attack, and pretended that he had had a vision from which he realized that God was asking him to continue. He had a dream in which he was in a stable and saw many mice, all of which he chased away; thus, he thought, God had indicated to him that he should go forth and chase away all nobility.

Thirty-two: And Thomas, being afraid and unwilling to go, was very angry with Thoma, and was very angry with him, and would have driven him out, if he had not let him go, and had frightened off the people. For Thomas did not want to make the attack, because he was strong enough, and would not come out of the city, because the peasants had stirred up all over the neighborhood before. Thereupon he wrote to the mountain people of Mansfeld 1) a very devilish letter, that they should strike at the princes as at the anvil Nimrod pinkepank; 2) he also hoped that the Frankish peasants would move closer against Thuringia.

33 Pfeiffer went out into the ice field, plundered castles and churches, chased away and caught the nobles, came home, brought much robbery. The common rabble became angry because he had succeeded. The peasants of Frankenhausen, not far from Mulhouse, were aroused. They also fell into the counties of Mansfeld and Stollberg, broke and plundered the castles.

034 Then Thomas departed. For he thought that the whole land of the princes was fallen away, and went to Frankenhausen with three hundred boys.

1) No. 779 in this volume. L, of Mulhouse, and the rabble was dispersed in all the cities. And although the Saxon princes prepared themselves to defend the peasants, and the Landgrave of Hesse, and the Dukes of Brunswick were up to quiet the noise, yet they would almost have missed the game, if the peasants had not soon been frightened, that they also delayed and did not go away to take the cities.

035 But the peasants were terrified for this cause: when the county of Mansfeld had risen up, and therefore all the counties that bordered upon it, Albrecht arose with sixty horses, and slew two hundred: and the peasants were afraid, and departed not, but ran all to Frankenhausen, to wait there until the troop were greater; and there they departed, until the princes also were gathered together.

036 So the princes, Duke John of Saxony, Duke George of Saxony, Landgrave Philip of Hesse, and Duke Henry of Brunswick, went against the peasants with fifteen hundred horses and not many footmen. But the peasants had built their fortress on a mountain near Frankenhausen, so that it was not easy to get to them with the soldiers; but they did not have much cannon and armour, and were quite clumsy and unarmed.

037 When the princes saw these things, they took pity on the foolish and wretched people, and made arrangements to admonish them, and sent to them to depart, and delivered up the captains and the rioters to the noise. The poor people were frightened, and would have been well rebuked; but the devil willed his will to be done by Thomae, who drove Thomae to admonish them to stay, and to resist. Therefore he arose and spake thus:

038 Dear brethren, you see that the tyrants, our enemies, are there, and they are so fearful that they may not attack us, and they demand that you depart, that you deliver up the beginners of this matter. Now, brethren, you know that I have begun such a thing by God's command, and not by my own presumption or boldness. For I have never been a warrior my day. But since God has verbally commanded me to go forth, I am obliged, and all of you, to stay there and wait for the end.

039 God commanded Abraham to sacrifice his son; now Abraham did not know how to do it, yet he followed God and went on, wanting to sacrifice and kill the godly child. Then God saved Isaac and kept him alive. So also we, having command from God, shall expect the end, and let God take care of us.

040 But I have no doubt that it will be well, and that we will see God's help this day, and that we will destroy all our enemies. For God often speaks in the Scriptures that He wants to help the poor and the pious, and to exterminate the wicked [Ps. 37:38-40]. Now we are ever the poor and those who desire to receive God's word. Therefore we should not doubt, there will be happiness on our side.

041 But what are the princes? They are nothing but tyrants, they oppress the people, they waste our blood and sweat with courting, with useless splendor, with harlots and knaves. God commanded in the fifth book of Moses [chapter 17:16]: The king shall not have many horses with him, neither shall he have great pomp; neither shall a king have the book of the law in his hands daily.

042 But what do our princes do? They do not take care of the government, do not hear the poor people, do not administer justice, do not keep the streets clean, do not prevent murder and robbery, do not punish outrages and wantonness, do not defend widows and orphans, do not help the poor to justice, do not educate the youth to good manners, do not promote worship, but only spoil the poor more and more with new complaints, do not use their power to keep the peace, but for their own defiance, so that one might be strong enough for his neighbor, spoil the country and the people with unnecessary wars, rob, burn, murder. These are the virtues of the princes, that they may now deal with them. Think not that God will suffer these things any longer. For as he hath destroyed the Canaanites, so will he also destroy these princes [Exodus 33:2, 34:11].

(43) And though such things should be suffered, God cannot suffer them to defend the false worship of the priests and monks. Who does not know what abominable idolatry happens with the buying and selling in the mass! As Christ drove the merchants out of the temple [Matth. 21, 12], so he will destroy these priests and what is attached to them. And as God vowed to Phinehas that He would punish fornication with Casbi [Deut. 25:7, 8 ff], so God will give us luck to punish the fornicators.

044 Therefore be of good cheer, and do the service of God, and destroy these unprofitable rulers. For what shall it profit, if we make peace with them? For they will continue not to set us free.

...drive us to idolatry. Now we are guilty of dying rather than consenting to their idolatry. It were ever better that we should become martyrs, than that we should suffer the gospel to be taken from us, and be driven to the abuses of the priests.

(45) I know for certain that God will help us and give us victory. For He has promised me this verbally and commanded me to reform all the estates. It is no wonder that God gives victory to a few and unarmed people against many thousands. For Gideon with a few men [Judges 7:23 ff.], Jonathan with a few fine boys defeated many thousands [1 Sam. 14:14], David with no armor slew the great Goliath [1 Sam. 17:49].

046 Therefore I have no doubt that now and then such things shall come to pass, that we, though unarmed, shall be overthrown; for heaven and earth shall be changed before we are left, as the nature of the sea was changed, that help might be given to the children of Israel, when Pharaoh pursued after them [Exodus 14:16]. Let not the weak flesh be afraid, and attack the enemy boldly, fear not the cannon. For ye shall see that I will take in my sleeve all the cannon stones which they shoot against us. Yea, ye see that God is on our side. For He now gives us a sign. Do you not see the rainbow in the sky? It means that God wants to help us, who carry the rainbow in our banner, and that He threatens the murderous princes with judgment and punishment. Therefore be undaunted, and take comfort in divine help, and stand in defense; God does not want you to make peace with the godless princes.

047 When Thomas had spoken, the more part were afraid, and would gladly have been so, and saw that the water was about to go over the baskets. But there was no order and regiment, that one could have held council, what one should do. There were also some boys who had a mind to fight and to do them harm, and because they were of the same mind, they fell to Thomas, and were not only enraged by Thomas's speech, but they were moved by the rainbow that appeared while Thomas was speaking. For because they carried a rainbow in their ensign, they thought that God had given them a sign 4> of victory. Also the heap was quite large, and was probably because they thought they would be strong enough for the princes. For the peasants numbered about eight thousand, and some of the boys cried out that they should stand in defense, and began to sing the song, Vnsi Sanets Spiritus [Come, Holy Spirit].

Forty-eight: so the princes had no answer to their solicitation. Thomas also had a young nobleman, a certain son of an old man, sent with others into the camp to do some wooing, and had him stabbed, against all the world's ways of war. This angered the princes and the nobility so much that they got angry with the peasants. And the landgrave of Hefsen, who was the youngest of the princes there, rode about the stuff, and exhorted them to save the common peace, and spake thus:

49. Dear friends, you see the poor people before you, against whom you have been led to resist their disobedience and evil. Now the princes have had mercy on their affliction, and we have dealt with them, that they depart, surrender, and deliver up the captains. They give no answer to this, and prepare to strike: so great necessity demands that we defend ourselves. Therefore I exhort you to attack them chivalrously, and to defend the unfaithful wicked men and murderers.

050 The devil hath so blinded the people, that they will not counsel or help them. For though they complain greatly about the rulers, yet there is no cause on earth sufficient to stir up rebellion, and to do violence against the sovereign. For it is a very serious commandment of God to honor and fear the rulers, for which God has thus kept that sedition has never gone unpunished. For Paul says [Rom. 13:2], "He who resists authority is punished." For authority is ordered by God. Therefore God keeps it so that no creature can tear it apart. As God's order is that day and night shall be, and no man may snatch the sun from heaven and take away day and night: so neither the devil nor the devil's apostle, the peasants of Munch, will have any happiness against ordered authority.

011 I speak not these things to make myself a prince, and to make the cause of the peasants bad; but it is the whole truth. I know well that we are often wicked, because we are men, and often do wrong; nevertheless we ought not to make a fuss about it. It is God's command to honor authority, but then one should honor it especially when it is in greatest need of honor. Now, the most needful honor is when it is reviled, perhaps even when it has been lacking; so the subjects should help to bear, honor, and cover such dishonor of the rulers, as Shem covered the mere Noah [Gen. 9:23], so that they may remain and live with one another in peace and unity.

022 But what do these faithless wicked men do? They do not cover up our faults, but make them more reprehensible, even adding many lies. For it is a lie and a fabrication that we do not keep the peace of the land, that we do not keep the courts, that we do not prevent murder and robbery in the countries. For to the best of our ability we are bound to keep the peace. Now the burden that the subjects bear in money or interest is small compared to the care and toil that we bear.

(Fifty-three) But every man esteemeth his own affliction the greatest: but what other men suffer, no man will measure. The peasants give little interest, therefore they sit secure, may feed wife and child, may educate children to discipline and honor. To maintain such security their interest is invested; tell me, to whom does the greatest benefit come from it? The subjects; therefore their complaints are void. But it is true that not all things can be sufficiently arranged in the regiment. For this is the misfortune of the world. The grain in the field does not grow every year. Therefore God demands that we honor the rulers. For if the ruler were not absent, his honor would not be in danger; but because it is in danger, God wants to protect it and has commanded that it be honored.

054 But they complain that they are not permitted to hear the gospel: nevertheless let no man stir up sedition for this cause. For as Christ forbade Petro to fight, so let every man answer for himself what he believeth. If the authorities want to kill him, he should suffer it, and should not take up the sword and provoke other people to save him by force. Christ passed a terrible sentence on Petro, when he was about to fight, that he was guilty of death: "He that taketh the sword shall perish with the sword," saith Christ, Matt. 26:52], and hanged himself on the cross. Thus is rebellion against the commandment and example of Christ.

055 Further, it is in the day that this coiner and his followers teach not the gospel, but murder and robbery; no man blasphemeth the gospel more than these men, who, under the appearance of the holy name, do all that they can. This is their gospel, to take from the rich what is theirs, to disgrace others' wives and children, to take from the rulers so that no one can defend them. God does not let such great dishonor of the holy name of the gospel go unnoticed. For He speaks in the other commandment that he who takes God's name in vain shall not go unpunished [Exodus 20:7].

056 Therefore, because the peasants are so wicked, blaspheming God, reviling their rulers, and have no just cause for rebellion, you should confidently attack them as murderers, and help save the common peace, help pious, honorable people, protect your wife and child against these murderers; in this you do God a great favor. And though we are strong enough to judge the wretched people (in the human way), yet I would not attack them if I did not know that I was doing right. For God has given us the sword, not to commit murder, but to prevent murder. But if I know that I am doing right, I will help to punish them, and I have no doubt that God will help us to be victorious. For he saith, Whosoever resisteth against authority, let him be punished" [Rom. 13:2].

57 When the landgrave had finished speaking, they approached the peasants and shot them down. The poor people, however, stood there and sang: "Now we pray to the Holy Spirit," as if they were insane, and did neither defend themselves nor flee, many also consoled themselves with the great promise of Thomas that God would show help from heaven, because Thomas had said that he would take all the shots in his arms.

058 And when they were broken in unto them in the castle of the chariots, and began to stab them, the wretched people turned to flee; the greater company towards the town of Frankenhausen, and some also to the other side of the mountain; and there was no resistance of the peasants, for a company that was gathered together in the valley of the mountain defended themselves for a while against a few horsemen. For even the rustic stuff, when he saw that there was no ride and no resistance, did not keep order, and so they were scattered from one another. In that place they wounded some, and cut down two or three horsemen. Then the soldiers were more enraged, and not only did they strangle this group, but they also strangled whatever they might encounter in flight, and five thousand men were left dead.

59) After the battle they came into the town, 1) took it, and caught three hundred men, whom they beheaded there. But Thomas had escaped into the village of Frankenhausen, into a house near the gate. Now he might have gotten away in the meantime, or he might have hidden himself very well, if God had not particularly willed that he should have been caught; no one had any particular respect for him, and no one sought him.

60) But a nobleman of Lüneburg had entered into the same house by the gate, whose

1)	The	"spot"	will	mean	Frankenhausen.
----	-----	--------	------	------	----------------

The servant goes up to the floor of the house, wants to see what they have for lodging, so he finds one lying in bed, as if he were sick, speaks to him, and asks who he is, whether he is also a rebel? Now Thomas had lain down in bed, as if he were weak, and thought that he wanted to hide himself and escape, and Thomas answered the Reuter that he was a sick man, lying there and having febres, and was very weak, and that he had never come to the riot.

61 The Reuter found a bag lying by the bed, takes it, and thinks perhaps to get a prey, there he finds letters in it, which Count Albrecht of Mansfeld had written to Thomä, to admonish him to desist from his courage. Then the Reuter asks: Where do the letters come from? Whether he was Thomas? Thomas was frightened, and at first denied, not wanting to be the man, but at last he confessed, since the reuter threatened him. So the magistrate took him prisoner. The princes were informed of this. Then Duke George and the landgrave sent to Thomae.

022 When he was come before the princes, they asked what he had reproached the poor people with, that he had thus deceived them? And he answered defiantly, that he had done right, that he had purposed to punish the princes, because they were contrary to the gospel.

033 But the landgrave sat upon him, and proved unto him out of the scriptures, that one ought to honour authority, that God had forbidden sedition, that especially Christians ought not to revenge themselves, though they were wronged; out of which the wretched coiner knew not how to speak.

044 And it came to pass, that they tightened the thumbsticks upon him, and he cried out. Duke George said, "Thomas, this hurts you, but it hurt the poor people today that they were stabbed, whom you had brought into such misery. Thomas answered, laughing like a man possessed, "They wouldn't have it any other way. From these outrageous words, everyone could sense that the devil had made man completely insane, that he had no mercy at all on the misery of the slain people.

65 Thereupon he was led to Heldrunen in Thurm, and there examined. But it was because of this that he was sent to Heldrunen: for he had written to Count Ernsten of Mansfeld in Heldrunen a letter of urgency, in which were written these words: I am going. But so that Thomas would be inside for his crime, he was tied to a wagon and drove there.

66After some days Thomas was badly martyred at Heldrung in the question in which he confessed that he had formerly been a disciple at Halle.

and began at that time to make a union to reform Christendom. After that, he began such a covenant at Allstädt, and finally at Mulhouse; he hoped that, since the peasants in Swabia had revolted, he would have room to make a noise. He also went to Swabia to find out their intentions. But he said that he did not like their company and that they did not want to hear him. He also pointed out the names of his confederates in Allstädt and Mühlhausen.

(67) Further, he has not been asked about his revelations, or what moved him to make such a noise. It is also unwise, because he has boasted of divine revelation, that one has not asked whether he has invented such things, or whether the devil has seduced him with visions; such would be useful to know.

068 After some days the princes went before Mühlhausen, which city surrendered unto them. There the princes beheaded a bunch of rebels, and among them also the piper; there Thomam was also led into the camp, and there he was beheaded. But he was very fainthearted in this last trouble, and so lost with himself that he could not pray the faith alone, but Duke Henry of Brunswick recited it to him; he also publicly confessed that he had done wrong, and yet in the ring admonished the princes that they should not be so hard on the poor people, so they should not wait for such a ride, and said that they should read lidros UeAnnn. After this speech he was beheaded, and his head was put on a spike in the field as a memorial.

(69) This end of Thomas Muenzer is well to be considered, that every one may learn thereby that one ought not to believe those who boast of divine revelation, if they intend anything contrary to the Scriptures. For God leaves nothing unspotted, as it is written in the other commandment: !Aori liudsdit Osus inLontern etc.

70. We shall also learn how severely God punishes disobedience and rebellion against authority. For God has commanded that we honor and obey the authorities. Therefore, whoever acts contrary to it, God will not let him go unpunished, as Paul says in Romans 13:2: "He who resists authority will be punished."

In other places this year, as in Thuringia, rebellion was punished, and the authorities were miraculously preserved by God against the great power of the rebels. Such examples, as a special history of God, should remain in the memory of the descendants and be written out with great diligence.

The fifth section of the tenth chapter.

Of the blessed death of Prince Frederick the Wise during the Peasants' Revolt, and of his burial.

795 U. Georg Spalatin's consolation to the Elector Frederick of Saxony at his end. May 5, 1525.

This writing is found in the Wittenberg edition (1569), vol. IX, p. 217; in the Jena edition (1585), vol. II, p. 5116; in the Altenburg, vol. II, p. 887; and in the Leipzig, vol. XXII, p. 496.

(1) God's grace and peace beforehand, most gracious Lord, E. churfl. G. do not allow anything on earth to challenge them, but only hold fast to Christ, and remember his comforting word, grasping it and holding it in strong faith, trust and hope, as especially Christ says Matth. 9, 12. 13.: "The strong have no need of a physician, but the sick; I have come to call sinners to repentance, and not the pious."

002 The same also he so kindly beckoneth unto him, Matt. ii. 28, saying thus, Come unto me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will refresh you."

(3) Now we come to Christ by faith alone, when we believe that God is gracious to us, that He means us faithfully and well, that He has forgiven us all our sins, that Christ has been sufficient for all our sins, that we are God's children and heirs, whether in life or death. Thus Christ Himself says John 6:35: "He that cometh to Me shall never hunger, and he that believeth on Me shall never thirst."

(4) Neither sin, death, hell, nor the devil can harm such a person, nor can he be condemned, but through faith and heartfelt trust in God's true word and unfathomable grace, goodness, and mercy he will be eternally saved. Thus Christ Himself says John 5:24: "Verily, verily, I say unto you, He that heareth my word, and believeth on him that sent me, hath everlasting life, and shall not come into condemnation; but is passed from death unto life."

5 It is very comforting that a Christian man passes through temporal death into eternal life. Yes, a Christian man will not feel or taste death, as Christ Himself says John 8:51: "Verily, verily, I say unto you, if any man taste my Word will keep," that is, abide in it, not doubting it, but firmly believing that through me and for my sake he has a gracious, kind, and merciful Father in heaven, "he shall never see death forever."

(6) This is the kind will of God the Father and God the Son, that such a person who continues in faith and trust in God's grace and Word may be preserved and saved eternally, and that the world, sin, hell, death and the devil may no more harm him than they have not harmed Christ Himself. Thus saith Christ himself, Joh. 6:37-40, All that my Father giveth me cometh to me; and him that cometh to me I will not cast out: for I am come down from heaven, not to do my will, but that of him that sent me. And this is the will of the Father which hath sent me, that I should lose nothing of all that he hath given me; but that I should raise it up at the last day. Now this is the will of him that sent me, that whosoever seeth the Son, and believeth on him, shall have eternal life; and I will raise him up at the last day."

007 This also was the command of Christ, our dear Lord and Saviour, here on earth, to preserve forever all them that believe on him. Thus He Himself says John 3:16-18: "God so loved the world that He gave His only Son, that whoever believes in Him should not perish but have eternal life. For God did not send His Son into the world to judge the world, but that the world through Him might be saved; he who believes in Him will not be judged."

(8) Whosoever therefore believeth in Christ, that he was saved by him, hath obtained all things by faith, which the eternal Son of the eternal God himself is, hath, is able, and is able to do. Thus St. Paul says Rom. 8, 31-34: "What shall we say further? If God is for us, who can be against us? Who also did not spare His own Son, but gave Him up for us all; how shall He not with Him give us all things? Who will accuse the elect of God? God is here, who justifies. Who will condemn? Christ is here, who died, who is at the right hand of God, and represents us."

009 As Christ therefore hath victoriously overcome death, sin, the devil, and hell; so shall a Christian man overcome all these things, and they shall hurt him no more than they hurt the Lord Christ. Thus saith Christ himself, Joh. 16, 33: "These things have I spoken unto you, that in me ye might have peace. In the world ye are afraid, but be of good cheer; I have overcome the world."

(10) Whosoever therefore liveth and dieth by faith overcometh sin, and death, and the devil. Thus saith St. John 1 John 5:4, "Our faith is the victory that overcame the world." And the victory Christ, our pious Beatificator, hath purchased for us by his death. Thus saith St. Paul, 1 Cor. 15:57: "Thanks be to God, which hath given us the victory, through our Lord Jesus Christ."

(11) Neither sin, nor death, nor hell, nor the devil, can take away such a man. Thus Christ Himself says John 10:27-29: "My sheep hear My voice, and I know them, and they follow Me; and I give unto them eternal life, and they shall never perish; neither shall any man pluck them out of My hand. The Father who gave them to me is greater than all, and no one can snatch them out of my Father's hand."

(12) Therefore a man cannot do better than commit his spirit into the almighty hand of God the Father, and say with Christ Luc. 23:46, "Father, into thy hands I commit my spirit," for in the hand of God no soul can ever be lost. For as Christ himself saith Jn. 15:9, "As my Father loveth me, even so do I love you"; and as Christ there further saith Jn. 17:21-23, "I have given them the glory which thou gavest me, that they may be one, even as we are one: that I in them, and thou in me, may be perfect in one; and that the world may know that thou hast sent me, and hast loved them, even as thou hast loved me."

013 And it is impossible for a Christian to be lost who has such faith. St. Paul says Romans 5:8-11: "Therefore praise God for His love toward us, that while we were still sinners Christ died for us, so much more shall we be saved from wrath through Him, having been justified by His blood. For if we have been reconciled to God through the death of his Son, while we were still enemies, much more shall we be saved through his life, if we have now been reconciled. also of God" (that is), that God is ours, and we are his, "through our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom we have now received the atonement." "Whether we live or die, we are the Lord's," as St. Paul writes Rom. 14:8. Therefore a man cannot do wrong, but with God's help surrender himself into God's will amicably and willingly, who departs from this false, wretched world and from sins through death to his Lord and Savior JESUS CHRIST into eternal life, from which neither sin, hell, death, nor the devil can or can prevent him for eternity; since the Lamb of God, Christ, who took upon Himself all the sin of the whole world, is good enough for us, to whom be thanksgiving and praise for ever and ever.

(14) Only abide in faith, which will sustain us forever, for God is the eternal truth, who will not lie to us, nor fail nor deceive us, all his ways are faithfulness and goodness, grace and mercy; only speak with David Ps. 31:6: "Into your hands I commend my spirit, you have redeemed me, faithful God," Amen. Georgius Spalatinus.

797 Gabriel Gemini's Concerns of the Burial of Frederick the Wise.

From Cyprian's Charters, vol. II, p. 328.

Because our most gracious Lord has fallen asleep in Christ, it is good that his body should be buried in Christ in a lowly, simple manner, without all ostentation, as the ancient fathers did.

I. That the common people, together with their servants, should go to the grave is right and proper.

II. whether to ring the bells also does no harm.

III. one may well cover a shroud over the coffin.

IV. Whether to ring the bells, through which city the corpse is carried, there is nothing in it.

V. Vigil and light are to be left outside, especially the vigil; there is not much in the way of light, if it is to burn. But that one preaches in the evening to remind the people of death, and to ask that God give his spirit to their future lord, and rule according to God's will, is well done. And if he remains unburied through the night, it is of no consequence.

VI Poor men's clothing is good, though they stand about with lights.

VII. neither bishop nor prelate hold mass; let all masses stand, if one does not want to anger God, and God shall give his grace to our most gracious lord to rule in the future, Duke Hansen.

Neither the priest nor the altar shall be clothed in black. It is good that something is given to the poor people.

IX. That coats of arms are hung on candles and banners is not a big deal. But they should not be hung on the altars.

X. On the morrow there shall be no measurement or sacrifice, but preach and bury it in the name of God.

XI. Give the offering money to poor people.

XII. Let not the stallions be drawn round the altar.

XIII Let all sacrifices stand in a queue, whether it be the sacrifice of the shield or the breaking of the spear.

XIV Let a sword be given to one who has none, if ever he will give one away.

XV. Donation is good, if one is still alive.

XVI The morning sermon before burying the body is good.

I think that if the body of our most gracious lord were carried to the grave in a bad way, the students would go before and sing some good songs, and some of the nobility would carry the body, and the other court servants along with the common people would follow the corpse and greet it in the name of God, so that it would be best, and after that, when the body was buried, would preach an admonition or sermon to the people. As it is commanded above, to remember the death, and to pray earnestly to God for a godly prince; as we already hope that he has given him to us.

798 Georg Spalatin's personal report on how Prince Frederick was buried at Wittenberg on May 10 and 11, 1525, after having sought the advice of Luther and Melanchthon.

Printed from Spalatin's manuscript in Kapp's Nachlese, vol. II, p. 667.

How my most gracious lord, Duke Frederick of Saxony 2c, blessed and laudable memory, funeral here at Wittenberg Wednesday and Thursday after Jubilate has been held, with D. Martini, Philipp Melanchthon's 2c. Council. 1525.

Wednesday after Jubilate.

In the year of Christ, the birth of our dear Lord and Saviour, 1525, the introduction of my most gracious Lord, Duke Frederick of Saxony, Elector 2c, of blessed and praiseworthy memory, as follows, took place here in Wittenberg.

Early in the morning my most gracious lord's, laudable and blessed memory, body was bequeathed in a coffin, carried and placed by eight noblemen to Lochau 1) from his C. F. G. room into the castle chapel, and the office left there, and after the office ordered by the touched eight noblemen to the sedan chairs, and thus begun to be carried to Wittenberg.

From the castle to the Lochau the cortege is accepted by the inhabitants with the procession, with the song: "Mit Fried und Freud ich fahr dahin" 2c. and "Aus tiefer Noth" 2c.

Likewise at Jessen with all the bells in the procession, and the procession, accepted by the priesthood and the common people, also with Christian songs, also brought to the Eylstern 2) and thus following up to Wittenberg.

At 2 o'clock Count Wolfgang von Warbey, Mr. Hans, Noble of Plavenitz, 3) and Mr. Hans von Minkwitz, both knights, rode from Wittenberg, together with several of the nobility, as much as was required of them, to accept the body of my most gracious lord, of blessed memory, as they did. Then, between 11 and 12 o'clock, the great bells were rung in the parish and in the monastery, and the people gathered together with the university in the parish church, together with the students.

However, the people of the collegiate church have gathered in front of the collegiate church, and they have

2) "Eylstern" will probably mean the Elster. Jessen lies on the black Elster.

3) This name is spelled differently: Planitz, Plaunitz, Plawnitz; here Plavenitz.

Stiftskirche, until the procession come to prevent the crowd, not unlocked.

When the students, the university, the council and the common people came before the collegiate church, the people of the collegiate church also went into the procession in their order.

And touched all have kept the order in going out, as in the introduction of my most gracious lord, the Elector of Saxony 2c., of blessed memory.

As follows: First a cross was carried, then the disciples went, of whom there were six and fifty. After that, the members of the congregation, then the body of my most gracious lord, the Elector of Saxony 2c., was first placed in a coffin, and covered with a black cloth, and with a white cross of linen, and five coats of arms on the coffin, and covered with a black velvet, and with the coats of arms pinned on it, carried eight, all dressed in mourning coats and hats with black silk tails, as follows:

Count Wolf von Warbey. Sir Hans, Noble of Plavenitz, Knight. Sir Hans von Minkwitz, Knight. Kumb Rabil. Christoph Gross. Friedrich Brandt. Georg von Hulda, and Matches Loser.

Beside the body went twenty men, all in black, mourning disguised, with burning torches and hanging thereon the high-souled arms of my most gracious lord.

After the corpse, before my gracious lord Duke Franciscus of Brunswick and Lüneburg, Hans von Döltzck, Marshal, Bernhard von Hirschfeld, Councillor of Beimeburg and Bastei went. Then my gracious lord, Duke Franciscus of Lüneburg 2c.

The following is the preceptor at Liechtenburg.

Secretarii 2c.

Then the court and landed nobility, soon after the university, of which some have been counted one hundred and eight and sixty pairs. Then the council, then the commoners. Then the women and virgins. Finally the travellers after all the people.

Then, when the corpse was brought to the Elsterthor, the houseman at the castle began to count the deer, after which all the bells in the collegiate and parish church were rung, after which the procession began, as if touched.

With such a procession the corpse was taken to the collegiate church.

And when they came into the church, they put the body in the middle of the church.

Musmann, together with some of the Wepeners, has been careful with good measure and order that no crowding results from it.

In the entry Hai one poor people give each one a penny, and this is done by master Lucas Cranach, painter, and Christianus, goldsmith 2c.

The proclamation of the entrance, burial and donation is done in the German lection in the morning in the monastery and in the parish church. As soon as the procession has begun, the monks and students are to sing in Latin before the first chant:

8i could 8U8oox> imo8.

After that: From deep distress 2c.

Following: Media Vita, Latin.

Then the same song in German.

And when the body was brought into the collegiate church, and, as if touched, placed in the midst of the church, the choir sang, "We all believe in One God." Then the hundred and eighteenth psalm: Oondtomim Domino oto., Latin. Following this, Magister Philipp Melanchthon made an almost good Latin speech in the church against the corpse of my most gracious Lord Blessed.

After this, Doctor Martin Luther preached a very Christian and comforting sermon, based on St. Paul's words in the first epistle to the Thessalonians in the fourth chapter, about those who have fallen asleep and died in God.

At the end of the sermon, they sang: "Now we pray to the Holy Spirit," and then Vespers and Compline were held. The body of my most gracious lord was left in the middle of the church with four burning lights and guarded by several people, but neither sung nor read. The grave was made on Wednesday evening and on the following Thursday morning just below the high altar under the steps.

My gracious lord, Duke Franciscus of Lüneburg, stood over against the body on Wednesday and Thursday on the small Quer[em]porkirche 1).

The twenty men in suffering robes with the burning torches stood beside the Bahr under the office on Wednesday and Thursday, ten on each side.

Thursday after Jubilate.

In the early days the people in the monastery used to sing the masses and other tides in such a way that everything was over between six and seven o'clock.

At seven o'clock the bells rang together in the monastery and in the parish church, and they gathered again in the collegiate church.

Then the hundred and seventh psalm: Con-

1) In the old edition: "Qverporkirchen".

titommi Domino, finely sung slowly and well in Latin. And thereupon the Versicle and Collecten and the Fried, Don8, a yno 8anota d68idoria, read.

Then Doctor Martin again preached an almost Christian, comforting sermon, and also referred to St. Paul's words to the Thessalonians. As on the previous day, there were many people present with saddened spirits.

Soon after the sermon my gracious lord, Duke Franciscus of Lüneburg 2c., together with the council and the nobility of the Quersem^porkirche went to the corpse.

Then the eight persons touched before carried the corpse, as of the previous day.

In front of the corpse, twenty men each walked with the burning torches, two and two.

Soon after the corpse have followed:

First of all my gracious lord, Duke Franciscus of Lüneburg 2c., then the counsellors and the Atzel 2c.

Under the funeral the choir sang, for the first: 8i dona 8ii8ooximii8, mala antom Hiiars non 8U8tmoamu8.

And because they buried my most gracious lord 2c., the twenty men with the burning torches divided themselves, so that on each side of them stood ten.

After that they sang: "Austiefer Noth" 2c., followed by: "Wir glauben alle an Einen Gott" 2c.

And at last: "Praise be to God and give him praise" 2c.

After that they went out of the church to the table.

On the same Thursday afternoon after twelve o'clock the large bells were rung in the parish church for the donation, and there the donation was given, three pennies to each person, and there were three and a half thousand people who took the donation.

The corpse was also brought on the moat to the castle or fisherman's gate into the city and collegiate church, and to a small being, praise God, demurely and finely gone.

Chapter Eleven.

Of the imperial congresses which were held at Augsburg, Speier, Esslingen, Regensburg and again at Speier in the years 1525 to 1529.

First paragraph.

Of the imperial diets held at Augsburg, Speier, and Esslingen.

801st Conclusion of the Diet of Augsburg at the end of 1525/) in which the Nurnberg one is repeated, and at the same time a Diet of Speier has been appointed for the month of May 1526.

From Lünig's Imperial Archives, pari. gen. eont. l. x. 457.

By the Grace of God, we Ferdinand, Prince in Hispania, Archduke of Austria, Duke of Burgundy, of Steyer, of Carinthia and Kram, Count of Tyrol 2c., Roman Imperial Majesty in the Holy Empire Imperial Governor; Wilhelm, Count Palatine of the Rhine, and Duke of Upper and Lower Bavaria; Casimir, Margrave of Brandenburg, of Stettin, Pomerania, Duke of the Cassuben and Wenden, Burgrave of Nuremberg and Prince of Rügen; Philip, Margrave of Baden and Hochberg, Count of Spanheim; Erich, Duke of Brunswick and Lüneburg: do hereby publicly confess and declare against all men: As the Roman Emperor's Majesty, our most gracious Lord, due to the urgent complaints daily occurring in the Holy Roman Empire, especially the disruption and division of our holy Christian faith and religion, the tyrannical Turk is daily approaching the Christian kingdoms, lands and principalities, and is invading them as hard as never happened before in the times of his and his ancestors, as he is aware and aware of; Which the immense necessity of resisting, together with other defects and infirmities in the holy kingdom, requires for peace, <sup>1)</sup>Seckendorf reports iÜ8t. Ud. l. p. 42a, that the Diet had only begun in November 1525. But because only one ecclesiastical prince, the Bishop of Trent, appeared in person, the Diet was adjourned to Speier on May 1, 1526. Seckendorf also knows nothing of the date of our document, but only the year, 1525.

The Imperial Majesty, in the course of this time, has been prevented by the highest and most burdensome obligations of her Imperial Majesty, and it is not possible without irreparable and unbearable harm to appear at such an Imperial Assembly. Since, however, Her Imperial Majesty is prevented from attending at this time by the highest and most burdensome obligations, and is unable to do so without irreparable and unbearable harm, Her Imperial Majesty, for the promotion of the common good and the execution of necessary acts, has decreed that we, as Her Majesty's commissioners and rulers, shall attend this Imperial Diet with a stately, full-commentary order and instruction; Which order and commission we, as obedient Christian princes, in honor of the Almighty and our holy faith, and of the Roman Emperor's Majesty, have not unreasonably accepted for the submissiveness, promotion of the common good, and the maintenance of peace, justice, good police, and the unification of the Christian statutes, and have sent ourselves with an eager mind to the action, according to and by virtue of our authority and the Emperor's instruction. But the things in the beginning turned out to be so troublesome that we, together with the electors, princes, and estates, cannot consider that at this present Diet and Assembly described here, since no elector, prince, and the lesser part of prelates, counts, lords, and cities of the realm personally, even some of them neither for themselves, nor for the people, nor for the people, nor for the people, nor for the people, nor for the people, have been excused either for themselves or by their authorized message with conjugal causes, since otherwise in such public, important matters for final decision and actual execution, the contents of our instruction, could have been fruitfully proceeded with and acted upon: Therefore, for these and other excellent reasons, we as governors and commissioners, after the said electors, princes, and also common imperial estates, have agreed to the following

1. And since there are many preachers who are subject to the holy gospel and the word of God in various opinions and to divide it: Let every authority, whether spiritual or secular, take diligent care and earnestly see to it that the holy gospel and the word of God be preached in their principalities, lands, and territories in the meantime, according to the right true understanding and interpretation of the teachers accepted by the common Christian church, without sedition and trouble, for the preservation of God's praise, peace, and unity; As was decided at the recent Imperial Diet in Nuremberg and is in the process of being passed, the preachers are also to be notified of this and warned of it.

(2) For this purpose all princes, rulers, and estates are to keep themselves in their principalities, dominions, and territories in the strongest way possible with good armor, provisions, and safeguards, whether some rebellion, insurrection, and disobedience of the subjects against their dominions will arise and take place, so that they, and each of them may do and use in the beginning, without further development and gathering of the disobedient, good resistance and opposition, also otherwise keep and show themselves evenly in other ways to the imperial and imperial peace, so that thus, as mentioned above, happens that we hope to God and his omnipotence, all outrage, rebellion and disobedience will undoubtedly be prevented and sufficiently occur.

(3) And so that no one, whether of high or low rank, shall have to complain of the others' refusal of justice, likewise, between the present extended Imperial Diet, namely, until primam Maji, the above-mentioned court and justice shall be held, as before, according to the order of the Holy Roman Empire, and no one shall be denied the same.

4. And for this reason it is further considered good and necessary, because in the recent riots and uprisings that have occurred in many places in the Holy Roman Empire, some subjects have revolted against their sovereignty and authority and fallen away, and have thereby publicly forfeited great punishment, and in part may be considered infamous; and that some of them must be used as judges, speakers of judgement and witnesses, if law and court are to be held again, before high and lower courts, that then from all estates their subjects, who have been related to and part of the said rebellion, and have again been pardoned by sovereigns and accepted for debt, are admitted, and accepted as debtors, that they, irrespective of such their trial, be used in the courts as judges, judges and witnesses, and otherwise for all legal matters without objection, until further action, and after the decision of the intended extended Imperial Diet.

5. For the restoration, unification and unanimous settlement of our holy Christian faith, apart from which it is not possible to establish a common peace in the holy empire and the German nation, we have thought it useful and necessary to maintain a common, free universal council for the whole of Christendom, and have therefore undertaken to petition the Roman imperial majesty (with the greatest diligence) that her imperial majesty, in view of the division and discord of our holy faith, may graciously decree that the German nation will be highly stained and burdened at this time, that Her Imperial Majesty, in view of the division and discord of our holy faith, so that this time the German nation is highly stained and burdened, will graciously decree that a common free council be proclaimed and announced in the most conducive manner, if it is always possible, in the appropriate places of the German nation. If this is obtained, we are undoubtedly hopeful that the Almighty will to bestow upon all of us his divine grace, for a constant unanimous understanding and knowledge of his holy faith, from which a common peace, unity, its acceptance, welfare, right execution of good police, and praiseworthy government in the whole of Christendom will surely result.

(6) Whereupon we do speak and promise to keep, to perform, to comply with, and to live steadfastly, firmly, unbreakably, and sincerely, all and every thing above written, and understood by us as Imperial Commissioners, by virtue of the power of our own will. In witness whereof we, Ferdinand, Archduke of Austria 2c., Wilhelm, Duke of Bavaria, and Casimir, Margrave of Brandenburg, for ourselves, and in place of the said Lords, Philippsen, Margrave of Baden 2c., and Erichen, Duke of Brunswick, our Co-Commissarii, have hereunto affixed our seal of approval.

7. And we, the Electors, Princes, Prelates, Counts and Lords, as well as the Free and Imperial Cities of the Holy Roman Empire, the embassies and rulers named hereafter, also publicly confess with this letter that all and every one of the above-mentioned points and articles have been carried out with our good knowledge, will, counsel and discretion, We also grant, by virtue of this letter, to speak and promise in right, good, true faith to keep and perform, as much as may concern or concern each of his sovereigns or friends by whom he is sent and governed, truly, steadily, firmly, sincerely, and to live up to them to the best of our ability, without danger.

8th And these are the messages of the Electors written hereafter by name: The Archbishop of Mainz, Elector 2c., Marquard vom Stein 2c. And therefore, for true testimony, we Marquard vom Stein, and Schenck Veltin von Erbach, for the said Archbishop of Mainz, and Count Palatine Ludwigen, both of them, and other ecclesiastical and secular princes; and we Daniel von Rodwitz and Poley Probst, Doctor 2c., Duke Frederick, Count Palatine, and other ecclesiastical and secular princes, and the mayor and council of the city of Augsburg, for its sake and for the sake of all other free and imperial cities, have hereunto set our seal, which is given in the holy imperial city of Augsburg, after the birth of Christ, fifteen hundred and in the fifth and twentieth year?)

1) This time determination asked Seckendorf, nist. lmtb., 11b. II, p. 42 a, and says, oaf dieser Reichstagsabschied das Jahr 1525, aber kein Datum hat. The alleged correction by Walch, that Seckendorf b e. p. 43 (should be p. 45, aääitio III) found in the Weimar archives that the farewell was dated Jan. 9, 1526, is based on a misunderstanding of what was said there.

804. lecture of the imperial governor and the commissars to the princes, princes and estates of the Roman Empire, at the Diet of Speier, August 4, 1526.

From Kapp's Nachlese, Theil II, p. 680.

[illegible]

From which Princes, Princes and other Estates of Imperial Majesty may take and understand the mind and opinion of the Governor and Commissarii. Maj. may take and understand the mind, will and opinion, which governors and commissarii do not behave towards the said princes, princes and estates, and their messages of friendly, inclining and gracious opinion, to promote all things; but the said princes, princes and estates nevertheless want to be informed of them in the other articles, to the Imperial Governors and Commissaries, to the same Princes, Princes and Estates, and in other complaints, as far as they are not contrary to the above-mentioned document, to proceed, to advise, to conclude, and to show themselves in such a way that the said Imperial Majesty may graciously recognize their order and request. Majesty may graciously recognize their order and request. And furthermore report and remind their loved ones and common estates that out of gracious and heartfelt contemplation, and in view of the great, noticeable adversities, troubles and insanity, so that I, the Holy Roman Empire and the whole of Christendom have found ourselves challenged, afflicted and in daily apostasy and ruin in these miserable times and times, we would gladly request such an Imperial Diet in our own person, if we had not actually undertaken this time, and for this reason would be in constant and final exertion, also directing and sending all possible diligence to this end, with the grace and help of the almighty God, to rise from this Hispanic kingdom of ours even in a short time, and to go in our own person to Italy and to Rome, to receive there our imperial crown, as befits, and then next to and together with papal holiness, which we find no less inclined and eager for this than ourselves. Such is the concern and grievance of our holy Christian faith and common Christianity, as well as all heresy, insanity, abuse, and disorder, which have occurred in many places, but most dangerously and blasphemously in the Holy Roman Empire of the German Nation, and are being held by a general council and common Christian assembly and otherwise, as necessity may require and as may be most conveniently done, shall be stopped, eradicated, and by a wholesome, unanimous, Christian reformation, order, statute, and life provided for and prevented, not only for such un-Christian, but also for quite inhuman riots, indignations, and actions everywhere.

1) "fourth" put by us instead of: "third" in the old edition, because in the following number we are told that the lecture happened on a "Saturday"; but this was August 4.

And that we again want to go to the Holy Roman Empire in the most beneficial way, to show and prove help and assistance to it by restoring and establishing divine, Christian peace and praiseworthy lawful order and good police, also due and needful supervision, and for this purpose use and require all our and our kingdoms' land and people, property, body and goods, so that nothing that a Christian, laudable emperor has to do in such burdens 1) and concerns dangerous to the Holy Roman Empire and common Christianity shall be neither omitted nor neglected by us. And be it therefore our gracious and earnest request, desire, and command to their beloved and common estates that they not at all undertake, act, hear, or resolve anything at this time from such future day of ours and of the realm at Speier that is contrary to our holy Christian faith, or to the laudable laws or ancient customs of the church doctrine, order, ceremonies, and customs, or the ancient customs of the churches, but that they, the contents of our mandate and letter of prohibition, which we have decreed and issued with their advice, foreknowledge and consent at both imperial diets at Worms and Nuremberg, be everywhere in the realm, We have decreed, executed, and commanded to be observed everywhere in the realm, in their own principalities, lands, dominions, and territories, and to abstain and delay this short time, until we ourselves, as mentioned above, dispose of the papal sanctity in a short time, and together with their sanctity, as is due, and proclaim a general council and common assembly of the whole of Christendom, and in this so grave and highly important matter may do all the more bravely and fruitfully, and also undertake and establish a holy, Christian, constant and necessary reformation, statute and order.

For by such particular action and separation, insanity and disobedience are much more likely to be promoted and increased than to be stopped, and the hearts and wanton leaders of the poor, unintelligent church are more likely to be blinded and strengthened than to be enlightened and alleviated.

And thereupon the spouses, our friendly governors and commissioners, shall use all possible diligence in this, so that through our dear nephews, sovereigns, princes, and common estates, this proper and necessary request and order is obediently complied with and carried out, and that we, in turn, most conducively ascribe and instruct such and what they encounter here, as we fraternally and graciously provide for their devotion and love, and always want to acknowledge with special graces. Your love, devotion, and charity do us special good, and our earnest opinion. ## 805 The answer of the imperial cities to the first part of the bortrag, concerning the gospel, at the imperial diet at Speier.

From Kapp's Nachlese, Theil II, p. 685.

Most Reverend, Most Serene, Most Highborn Princes, Most Reverend, Most Serene, Most Highborn Princes; Reverend, Well-Born, Noble, Strict, Most Learned, Most Honorable, Most Gracious, Most Merciful and Most Favorable Lords. Your Electoral, Princely Graces, Graces, and Favors, verbally reproached, Saturday next happened, 1) we, the honorable free and imperial cities sent messages, have heard in submission, and of our retention so much understood, that they divided the first article, in the imperial Instruction understood, into five points. Hereupon we give E. C. F., F. G., graces and favors of submissive opinion to hear that, after E. C. F., F. G., Graces and Favors have considered the first point, that in matters concerning our Christian faith, no change should be made here, nor should it ever be made, we, the envoys, confess that it is true that no change should be made to our true, holy faith, which is based on Christ and His holy, eternal, unchangeable Word.

Secondly, E. C. F., F.G., Grace and favorable concern that all well-established good Christian practice and order be acted upon in the meantime until a free Christian concilio, we may also well suffer: For by well established good Christian practice, order, and usage we understand nothing else than that which is not contrary to the faith in Christ and his holy word; but where some practices and usage or order are contrary to the same, by which the faithful in Christ are led away from their Lord and Creator to the trust of creatures through misbelief or superstition, or otherwise serve to endanger the salvation of souls, we regard E. C. F., F. G., grace and favorable opinion, that the same should remain unchanged until the meeting of a Concilii (which in view of the present course and disagreement should be long drawn out), and thus the faithful in Christ must in the meantime remain in error and danger to their souls. But how the aforementioned customs are to be handled, so that these, in turn, are to be changed and discarded; for this reason, our concern is that they should be changed and discarded.

1) August 4.

In order to prevent future errors and complications, further explanation on this point is necessary.

Thirdly, that E. C.F., F. G., graces and favors are willing, together with other estates, to think of means so that the abuses in the Holy Roman Empire of the German Nation may be corrected or even abolished, we are not only pleased, but have received a special great joy at such an earnest and gracious request, for it is knowingly evident and unknown to all estates of the Holy Roman Empire, how extensively they have been torn down, and what mischief, mischief, and trouble have arisen from them for the Holy Roman Empire in the German Nation, in the good hope that, if they were so used or put away for the better, they would not be a small help and tax to stop all the pending confusion and unpleasantness that has arisen in the Holy Roman Empire in these times.

Fourthly, concerning the punishment of those who have come here to the Imperial Majesty. Majest. Edict, established at Worms, we consider that E.C.F., F.G., Graces and Favors have graciously offered the punishment entirely out of gracious benevolence, but we could well imagine, where the same imperial edict should be most strictly complied with, that the punishment would extend further. However, E. C. F., F. G., Graces and Favors, along with other estates, at the Imperial Diet at Nuremberg, held in 1523, highly considered and well thought out why it was not possible to live up to the mandate, and what might result from it, if it were to be lived up to, as they also gave the papal orator for an answer at that time. Thus our lords and friends of the respectable cities have publicly protested and testified to this at the recently held Imperial Diet at Nuremberg, along with other high estates, on account of their impossibility, for which reason we hope that their Imperial Majesty, as a mild emperor, will never punish what is impossible and not recognized by the common estates of the Empire.

Fifthly, concerning the handling of the points mentioned, we also consider that, if the preceding points were to be dealt with and decided in a harmonious manner, it would be easy to find how to handle such matters, and our lords and friends of respectable free and imperial cities, as obedient members of the Holy Roman Empire, would undoubtedly show themselves to be subservient and obliging.

806 The Articles of Complaint in the Church, compiled, presented, and considered at the Diet of Speier in 1526.

From Cyprian's Documents, Vol. II, p. 381. Spalatin placed the title above it in his own hand. The title does not cover the content of what is offered in this document. For there are only reviews of articles; these themselves, however, are not included. The articles discussed here are essentially the same ones that were delivered at Worms in 1521 and at Nuremberg in 1523 (St. Louis edition, Vol. XV, No. 539 and 722), but new ones have been added and the order of the earlier ones has not been retained.

Sacrament. Article.

Sacrament of the Altar.

On the first article:

Which contains three articles. Because the holy sacraments have their origin [in Christ], my most gracious and benevolent lords agree with these eight decrees on this article. Lords, on account of this article, agree with these eight decrees, where they are of the opinion that one should hold fast to the sacraments which have their origin in Christ and are attached to faith, as their own words read. For there are no more than two sacraments of Christ, namely, of the altar and of baptism. For a sacrament must have two parts, namely, the promise of God and a sign. As these two alone have, Rom. 4.

Otherwise the princes and the message of the other article agree with them that the sacraments should not be preached against. For the clear words of Christ bring with them that the blood and flesh of Christ are true.

Lastly, that such unchristian teachers, according to the content of God's word, be taught the sermon, and where it does not help, be reprimanded and forbidden.

2. to keep the masses. Thus their fathers and their embassies would also agree with them that the masses should be kept as they flowed from Christ, as the first article states. Now it is not found that the masses are of Christ, and bound to the Latin language, or to some place, but are free, and that no one's conscience is taken captive in things outside the word of God, with the wearing of clothes and ceremonies in or out of the church, Col. 2. Nissu surrn surnta saoru sst, sivs prs8d'tsr, 8ivs 1aioii8 818.

3. sacrament of baptism. The princes and embassies consider that it should also not be evil, because baptism is a sacrament, that one should also leave it free with the language and place. Just as one has no other reason from the Word of God.

4th Confirmation. It is considered by princes and embassies not to urge people to Confirmation, considering that it is not a sacrament, according to the instruction of God's Word.

(5) Concerning ordination, princes and embassies consider that, because ordination does not flow from Christ, people should not be attached to it, nor should they be insisted on it, but that everyone should be free to act according to God's word in the things that their word brings.

(6) Marriage, repentance, and chastisement, because they did not flow from Christ, as they themselves indicate in the first article, they consider that they ought not to be insisted on.

7. abuse of the sacraments of the altar for the sake of money. That the mass should be stopped altogether, and that no one should insist on it, considered the abuses against the word and honor of God, according to the example of Ezekiel. For [the] mass is nothing else than taking the sacrament. It is also found in Isrtulliuno that the Mass arose after the time of Christ.

8. not to overcharge with masses, because they themselves confess that there are abuses in them, and that the priest should not be overcharged with them if he has no desire to do so. That no one should be overburdened with masses, since it has been sufficiently proved that mass is nothing else but a means of obtaining help, and not a sacrifice.

9. to hold the mass in a good understandable voice. This is how it must be held in German in German-speaking countries.

10 To read the gospels and epistles in German is agreed upon, but to add these words: To seek help. For this is the right thanksgiving when we recognize God as a helper. The Sunday Collects, because they are according to God's Word, should remain, but the other Collects of the saints should be avoided.

To drop the Canons.

11. to do away with blessings and histories one is well satisfied.

1012 That all sacrifices are left free, it is supposed, that it hath an appearance, as if it were a good work to serve God thereby. Therefore, one should be diligent to provide the priests with their due care and entertainment.

13th Concilium of Constance. The Concilium of Basle has decided on the widow's remedy, so that it is considered just that which Christ has set forth. From one agrees with them that it could not be done without difficulty, as they themselves indicate. Therefore, it is right to stick to God's word and Christ's suspension and not to seek permission anywhere, but to let everyone take it freely, as he knows how to justify it with God's word.

14th The suffragan bishops, because they have indicated before themselves that the parish priests and other ecclesiastical servants are to be provided with considerable entertainment, let it be just that the ecclesiastical servants be provided.

15. with the funerals 2c. that one arranges a right use, that those who lived in their life Christian, are buried honestly to the earth with Christian songs.

Sixteenthfathers. Because this is an exercise of faith, and in baptism it is asked that God may give the child faith, it would be good that there should be many people present. But the number of godparents should be left to each one's discretion, and should not be laid down in any law. Especially that there be no impediment to the marriage of spouses in the word of God.

17. suffragan bishops confirmation, to go about. He is to preach Paul's words; it is right that the pastors go about, and faithfully drive God's word into old and young people, which serves God's honor and their blessedness, to refer to the Christian profession. Even if confirmation is permissible, it would still be inappropriate according to God's word to deny confirmation to children who have no understanding, in view of the fact that they are given baptism, which is much more.

18. the consecrated interrogation and priestly age 30 years, that it would be best that the priest's authority would be according to St. Paul's order, as God clearly expresses it to St. Paul.

The nature of the clergy. It is right that the priests' doctrine and life be judged according to St. Paul's report.

19. priestly chastity. Decision of Imperial Majesty. Majesty. What God has permitted and left free may not be subject to human permission. But that one may ask Imperial Majesty of this and other grievances of the German nation at length and in all necessity, be honest, with humble request that His Imperial Majesty will honor God. Majesty, in honor of God and for the common peace of the German nation and of the entire empire, will graciously permit, without any oppression, to carry out in all the articles indicated that which they know to be preserved on the basis of God's word, and that conscience be left free in each case. For the conscience cannot and should not be controlled by any creature, neither in heaven nor on earth, but only by God and His Word.

are ruled. And he that practiseth the antagonism is the Antichrist, as St. Paul mightily casts 2 Thess. 2. Xi6U6ua 8uo8 XXXIX.

(20) Toleration or permission between spouses. Cases concerning marital status are subject to the judgment of a Christian, prudent priest. For one cannot set a certain rule in such matters, and one should not take money for it.

21. to abolish illegitimate cohabitation 1). Since illegitimacy is to be prevented, marriage should be left free. For marriage is the only remedy for illegitimate vices. ?uu1u8: lluu8czui8HUS p088ia6ut VU8 8UUIU 81116 koruieutiou6.

With the punishment, I guess it stays with their aforementioned punishment.

22. not to forbid one's own people to marry. They shall be free, but only after first asking their parents.

23rd proclamation. 2) Probably stays with it.

24. to stop forbidden time of marriage. To leave free. Vox 8x>ou8i 6t 8pori8L6.

25. secret marriage forbidden. Cheap, 4 Mos. 30.

Twenty-sixth, to put an end to penitential and confessional abuses. It is also good. For confession is absolution.

27. turn off confessional in suspicious [places]. Is also good.

(28) Heresy is not to be delivered outside of mortal peril. There is nothing better than to keep it according to Christ's order and the word of John 20. Therefore, a good explanation from God's word is needed as to who the banished heretics are.

29 With repentance it should be kept according to Christ's word Uuou. 6 ult. It6iri, Oueu6 7. It6iu, Io1iuririi8 5.: Vuã6 in PU66.

New foundations and pilgrimages not to penance. Is good.

Unjustly restore good. If it is sacred, 3) he may keep it euui ud8olutiou6, Dp>li68. 4. Hui kurudntur, uiux> 1iu8 riori kur6tur.

Confessors should refrain from asking awkward questions. All right.

(30) Subjects shall not be compelled to confess to others than their pastors. It is right that the priest should interrogate his confessors in order to find out about their faith.

31 Not to hear confession from monks. It has been decided by Paul that it is due to the priest, who is not a lord, but a comforter and helper of consciences and faith.

Thirty-two: that the confession be kept secret. This is the foregoing. It also belongs to the priest's office.

1) In Cyprian: "beysitz".

2) "Proclamation" posse, proclamation.

33. To give the blessing only once. There is no reason for it in God's word. Therefore it cannot be an exercise of faith. For faith must be directed to God's word, Romans 10.

34. the preacher half. Whoever says this is the end-Christ. For God has ever said Matthäi 17, likewise 2 Petr. 1 indicates: Illo 68t üliu8 M6U8 cil6otu8, in Huo iniln l)6N6 ooniplueui, iUrn uuäito. Itoin: Oinnis proplisti non 68t ullutu voluntut6 Uorninuin, 86ä 6x 8piritu 8unoto. It6Ni: Hoo V6rdnin lue6mu 68t in looo od8ouro, äon661uoit6r oriutr inooräiUu8 V68tri8. Thus Jerome and Augustine, as it is understood and repeated in their own Decrees, wrote that where there is error or ignorance in the divine Scriptures, one should run to the origin and fountain of the Hebrew and Greek languages. From this it must necessarily follow that the preachers are to be punished unreasonably and contrary to divine and human statute and order.

35 Of holidays. Holidays are to be free, and not commanded to anyone, Col. 2, Gal. 4, Isa. ult. Isa. 1; the other, that the common man may work after he has preached, is also well pleasing to us.

(36) Of fasting. It is unreasonable and unchristian to impose fasts on the whole community. Therefore no better thing can be done than to leave fasts free, like holidays. As St. Paul, Col. 2, also indicates. That the opinion of the fathers should have been good is of no concern to Christians. For it is not the good opinion of men that counts and stands before God, but the word of God, Deut. 6, 12, Deut. 15.

For this reason it is impossible to have cause, reason, right, or authority to punish anyone. For where there is no law, there is no sin; where there is no sin, there shall be no punishment, Romans 3.

For the sake of the offense, we say that, regardless of this, one should and may eat meat freely, as Christ permits. First, because it is insisted upon as a necessary thing, which God has forbidden, Col. 2, l§6ino vo8 M<1io6l 6to. Secondly, that it has now been manifoldly given day by preaching and printing some years ago, that it is free on the ground of God's word. Third, that it has now been publicly acted upon at three imperial congresses. And fourthly, that those who are now no longer weak, but stiff-necked, of whom Christ said Matthew 15: 8init6, ou6oi 8mU, ou6ooruir (1u668.

(37) Of seven times. 1) It is also best to leave such things free. For Christ saith in Matt. 6, Let prayer be brief.

There is no better way to do this than to restore the church discipline according to St. Paul's instruction, 1 Corinthians 12:13:14, which is far inferior to these present church ceremonies. For therefore it would flow from him how to appoint preachers and interpreters of the Scriptures for the aged, and schoolmasters for the young, to educate them to God's service and honor, honorable arts and good morals. Since the foundation 2) is first established and built as a school of discipline and instruction. As then their names still bring along: Provost, Dean, Schoolmaster, Singer.

38 Visitation of the Parishes. Yes, all authorities are obliged to ensure that their subjects are provided with God's word and Christian bishops and pastors, as well as with peace and justice. For it is clearly seen in the books of the Kings and the Paralipomenon of the Chronicles that the kings were all severely punished by God because they did not stop the ungodly worship in high places and groves.

39. from printing. It is honest and good to abolish pamphlets. But that one should not draw and interpret defamatory writings further than the common right interpreters and draws them.

But it would ever be difficult to stop the pressure altogether. Considering that pressure is not a small gift from God, it was undoubtedly given to us by God so that many souls could be saved and won to Christ through this means. For even if it works with the pressure, as with all the other gifts of God, it would not be the pressure's fault, but the devil's fault, who would drive it to that point.

Because it would be much too burdensome to request Roman Imperial Majesty for the sake of pressure. Majesty for the sake of printing, the authorities and powers should be commanded, by virtue of their duty, to take care that abusive writings and unchristian books are suppressed. Majesty and the Roman Empire, to see to it that pamphlets and unchristian books are suppressed.

If it were found by impartial linguists that the previous bibles were wrongly translated, one might well undertake to create another translation by impartial persons: that is, to tolerate a translation next to the other of the truth and to strengthen it, as was done in the time of St. Jerome with the Hexaplis.

(40) Of the inferior schools. It is Christian and right that children's schools be set up for the best, in view of the fact that nothing on earth is more important to all classes than that the schools be well ordered, as has been further reported in the 39th article.

The secular complaint of the See of Rome, and the clergy forbidden.

1. of the marriage and dispensation.

Because this matter concerns the external clans, it would be best that in this case the papal dispensation should be left alone, and that the secular authorities should be governed in accordance with the order of Moses, 3 Mos. at 18; it being considered that Moses' secular good government is concerned.

(1) Husbands and wives should not and must not hinder anyone from marrying. For if spouses should hinder it, it should hinder all those who also teach and instruct the people in the faith. For they are all fathers, as Paul says in Gal. 4: In Öüristo vo8 Zsuui psr svauZslou. 1 Cor. 4.

Of the forbidden time.

2. this article is directed before at marriage. Shall also freely fine, for the sake of God's word.

3rd indulgence abused. It is not allowed. For we have the only and best indulgence through Christ alone, Rom.

4. stationirer. The same article is also good.

5. to abolish orders of beggars. According to Christ's order, beggars are not to be admitted at all, Luc. 10, likewise Oueas in ^etis: Nslius sst äars, Hnum uoeipsrs. Item Thess: Hui uou ladorat, non munäuest. Item Eph.: 8sä ma'is opsrstur, ut Badsat, unäs vietum prasstet neeessitatem patienti. For Christian poverty is not in taking, or begging, or not having, but in not hanging on to temporal goods, and in giving, as Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, David 2c.

6. foreign beggars. Is a good article, and founded Deut. 15: For every country shall feed and maintain her poor. With the poor students, I guess their concerns remain as well.

7. inheritance, pledge not to be drawn to Rome 2c. It is also reasonable. For one has judges

1) From here on, Cyprian indicates by numbers in the margin the number of the article to which the expert opinion refers. Since, however, the complaints submitted to Worms are not numbered, but those submitted to Nuremberg are in a different order than here, we, like Walch, have not set the numbers.

enough in such matters in secular judges, as the book of the judges well proves.

8. from the papal conservators. Remains cheap also in doing so, from causes indicated in the next article.

(9) Of exemption. Is also Christian and equitable, according to the word of Paul Rom. 13: Oruiis auiina sudzsota sit potsutiis supsrrioridus. 1 Petr. 2.

(10) Ecclesiastical fiefs shall not be granted by the See of Rome. This is also reasonable. For the appointment of ecclesiastical services is due to the authorities by right, and to the community by necessity.

Eleventh Commendations. This is right and just. For it is nothing else, but the evil covetousness, which is a true idolatry, as Paul often calls it.

Twelfth referendums and pensions to be abolished. It is also honest and fine, for a legitimate reason. For if one is good, so is the other.

013 That the bishops are bound to their chapters for the sake of the benefices.

14 The commissions and incorporation of the prelatures shall also be decreed in due form.

(15) Founded by the foundations on the nobility alone. Remains also cheap in this.

Sixteenth annals are to go out and confirmation. This is also good. For the Christian and right confirmation of the bishops 2c. is in the hands of the authorities and the congregation, on the basis of God's Word.

The clergy, places of worship and help against the Turks shall be postponed. In the name of God, it remains so.

(18) The consecrated are not to be exempt from the constraints of the secular courts. This article also remains.

Because the marriage state also affects the conscience, and is a spiritual court, the authorities, together with their pastor, who is the spiritual judge, should have an appointment in these matters. For there is no measure that can be given.

For the sake of the clergy. It remains fair with St. Paul's opinion, Rom. 13. 1 Petr. 2.

Nothing better can be done with profanation than to keep what Paul indicates in 1 Cor. 5.

019 That no man be bidden, save for a mortal sin. Is also Christian. For Paul writes in Titum: Nasrstioum komiusiu äsvita. 1 Cor. 5: That therefore the ban should not be used in any way, except for apostasy from the faith and the gospel.

020 That the excommunication of the temporal authorities be not prevented. In this, the order of St. Paul is kept, 1 Cor. 5, that a priest together with the authorities and the congregation drive the ban. For he saith in the same place, Oonsuneto spiritu mso surri spiritu vsstro.

No one holds and carries out spiritual judgment more cheaply than every pastor according to God's word.

(21) Of an authority, and (1) of the houses of chivalry in Apulia and Sicily. Of the same order is to be said that which is said of the other orders, where the word of God is more to be followed and obeyed than to be given outward appearance.

complaints that the secular have against the archbishops.

(1) Of the useless interdicts. Because spiritual persons, as stated above on the basis of the divine word Rom. 13, are subject to the sword like the common man, it is equally right. For the same difference ever God hath not made, but is before God one as another, spiritual as Lai. 6. of the goods abandoned by the priests. It is proper, because they are secular, and otherwise of common right, to divide the goods to the next of kin, ^isi rslingfuunt uxors st lidsros. For they are subject to the secular rights as well as the laity, even from God's creature and [order] 3) as well as other men of wives and children, and capable of inheriting inheritances to them.

(7) Of the secular goods purchased by the ecclesiastics. This is also done in view of the fact that, according to the aforementioned imperial rights, the estates follow with their burdens.

1) The words: "from an authority and", which are added to the preceding in Cyprian and in the old edition of Walch, we have drawn here. Compare St. Louis edition, vol. XV, 1742, likewise there Col. 2162.

2) This will refer to the 29th article of the complaints handed down at Nuremberg. See St. Louis edition, vol. XV, 2162 f.

3) Supplemented by us. A gap is indicated in Cyprian.

8. from awarding new foundation. It remains cheap to do so.

(9) Subsidies and investments. This is also done according to the order of divine rights.

10. not to be ordained by unlearned priests. It is also reasonable. For an ecclesiastical minister ought to be learned, as St. Paul writes.

(11) For the reconciliation of the profaned churches there is no better counsel than that the authorities should justly establish and defend themselves, so that such an outrage may no longer take place. For the authorities bear the sword for this reason. Rom. 13.

12. the income of new pilgrimage; is true, as they themselves write. So that it is certain that God is present in his word, and that the devil must depart, Marc. 5 and Luc. 11.

13. how they unseemly take money from the virgin monasteries, provostries^ . It is thus decreed. For such drudgeries have been much in some countries.

14 That abbots and abbesses be ordained in vain. Remain with the foregoing, speaking of monks and nuns. For it does not flow from Christ. Nor is it dependent on faith without means.

(15) The complaints of officials shall be justly abolished, and what the officials have hitherto done shall be ordered to pious pastors, as they have reason to do from the divine word, 1 and 2 Tim. and Titum.

(16) The laity are not lawfully brought before spiritual courts, as men only know.

Some articles remain cheap in their established order, considered that it is cheap and right.

(17) The reformation of the ecclesiastical court is due to the pastors, for the reasons indicated above.

018 That the bishops be not ensnared by their chapters, before they come to the government. It is also good.

(19) In matters concerning the conscience, not to take money for penance. This is also reasonable. Neither should repentance be imposed, because never to do it, as Christ himself says: Vuäs st noli amplius pssars, Joh. 8.

(20) That no one should do new public penance for secret sins. Is equitable. Os ossultis non zuckisat Dsslsia.

021 The spiritual magistrate's unjust interest in marriage is justly set aside altogether, inasmuch as it is a vain avarice.

22) That the ecclesiastics want to bar secular jurisdiction, is reasonably dismissed. For initio irialurri tsrnporis trastu riori sonvalssst.

023 That ecclesiastical judges tolerate illegitimate cohabitation shall be stopped together with usury.

24. senders 1) and weekly allowance of craftsmen shall also be turned off.

Twenty-sixth, to put an end to unreasonable detentions. This is also fair.

27. that one should not proceed 6x otUoio. Is also cheap.

028 That no stranger's advocate should be needed in spiritual matters; for it concerns the conscience, and belongs to the pastors.

029 For no cause ought the poor to be denied the sacrament, but because of unbelief.

(30) The rebuke in Sending is to be stopped, for it has served more for annoyance than for good.

(31) That no one should buy the funeral. For it is ever unreasonable to do this and other things for the sake of money.

32) It is not to be denied that some clergymen keep house. It is also reasonable. For St. Paul says: I)tzi ssrvuna non oporstst imploioitum 6886 86ou1urUJN8 n6Zotii8.

(33) That wills should not be forced upon the sick to the detriment of the heirs. And it is right. For such torturing and scraping is of no avail.

034 That mendicant orders should be subject to the ordinaries. Yes, they are subject to all authority, according to this saying, Romans 13.

(35) That honest persons be placed in the convents of virgins. It is right, and especially so, that no nuns be forced to remain there all their lives, any more than monks, since monasteries and convents are nothing more than schools of learning and education from their first beginnings.

(36) The secular estates are concerned that the bishops of the empire are so highly indebted to the Roman see. This is also reasonable. For since the archbishops and bishops of the Roman Empire want to be members, and are in part councillors of the Empire, it is also their duty to follow the Roman Emperor's Majesty and not the Roman See, in view of the fact, as has been indicated many times before, that there is no other authority than the temporal one.

7 An article concerning the free, Christian and impartial Concilium.

From Kapp's Nachlese, Theil II, p. 688.

The article concerning the free, Christian, and impartial concilium should thus be observed until a free, Christian, and impartial concilium has faithfully spoken of, decided upon, and established how, on the basis and continuance of God's word, the ceremonies may be ordered by God's help, according to the occasion of each principality, dominion, and country, and as the common peace and unity of the land may require.

For the reason that a Christian congregation has power and reason to do this, and should also judge and act according to God's word, to bring the infants and children further in their faith, it is considered that the ceremonies are nothing other than child rearing, which one may set up and do according to occasion, person, time and place, according to God's word and approval, as it is considered and found best.

But the other, their evil, adultery and fornication, are all let pass; therefore it is considered necessary and useful that the clergy should henceforth be left free to marry, and whoever should engage in fornication and fornication over them should be allowed to marry.

If a man commit adultery, he shall be duly punished by the temporal judge, as other temporal judges.

809. parting and resolution of the Imperial Diet at Speier, Aug. 27, 1526 made known.

From Lünig's Imperial Archives, pari. Mn. cout. l. i., p. 466.

We Ferdinand by the Grace of God, Prince and Infant in Hispania, Archduke of Austria, Duke of Burgundy 2c., Count of Habsburg, of Flanders and Tyrol 2c., and from the same graces we Philip, Margrave of Baden, Bernhard, Bishop of Trent, Casimir, Margrave of Brandenburg, of Stettin, Pomerania, Duke of the Cassubians and Wends, Burgrave of Nuremberg and Prince of Rügen, and Erich, Duke of Brunswick and Luneburg 2c., of the Most Sublime, Great, Highborn Prince and Lord, Mr. Caroli the Fifth, elected Roman Emperor, our most gracious Lord, decreed and sovereign governors in the Roman Empire, and commissioners decreed to the crazy Imperial Diet here at Speier, publicly confess and declare with this letter: After the above-mentioned Roman imperial majesty has announced and proclaimed a common imperial diet and assembly on St. Michael's Day, in the year 1525, next to Augsburg, which day was later, for obvious marital reasons, moved and postponed by us, with the advice and consent of the electors, princes, estates and the holy empire's embassies, which were then at Augsburg, next to Speier, until the first day of May. Thereupon we have appeared in our own person, as appointed Imperial Governors and Commissaries, such as the Princes, Princes and Estates of the Holy Roman Empire, and their embassies in brave numbers. That we therefore, in place of and on account of the most illustrious Roman Imperial Majesty, together with the now reported Princes, Princes, Prelates, Counts and Estates of the Holy Roman Empire and the same embassies, have written out the points and articles in her Imperial Majesty's writ, and especially the Instruction sent to us by the Commissars, taken them in hand, discussed them with timely and brave counsel, and therefrom united and compared all our past counsels and actions, as is written from Article to Article hereafter.

1. And first, since the Imperial Majesty's Instruction primarily expresses and contains that from this Imperial Diet, in matters concerning the holy Christian faith and religion, also concerning the ceremonies and well-established customs of the holy Christian church, no innovation or determination shall be made or undertaken, and then it is judged and considered that the discord is not the least cause of the previous outrage of the common man, as well as of all the discord that now exists in the German nation: So, where with timely brave counsel it is not seen that still greater uproar and indignation between high and low estates is to be worried. Accordingly, and in order that a unanimous, uniform understanding in the Christian faith be established in such a way, and that peace and unity be planted and maintained in the German nation between all the estates, we, also the princes, princes and estates, have not been able to determine and decide on this in a more fruitful, better, more agreeable and more skillful way than through a free general council, or at the very least a national assembly, which is to be held in a year or a year and a half in the German lands. So that this may proceed in the most beneficial way, we, the Princes, Princes and Estates, have duly sent a trespassing message, namely N. N. and N., to Imperial Majesty, with urgent instructions, for the reasons stated therein, to request and entreat their Imperial Majesty most humbly to take the heavy burden of the German nation, on account of such discord and misunderstanding, graciously to heed and consider it, to dispose of it in its own person in the German nation in the most beneficial manner, and to have and procure understanding, so that a General Council or at least a National Assembly may be convened in a definite manner.

Time, without, long lift would like to be made, all further contents of the same instruction.

2. And because on such message, considering distance of the way, opportunity of the landscape, also future wintry time, not a small presentation and cost (as we the overruling) belongs: so thereupon a rather common notice to electors, princes and estates is considered good and made, so that each one shall deliver his due share, between All Saints' Day next future, to mayor and council of the city of Speier, as then the same share and place of payment shall be further indicated to each one in writings.

3rd And the same sent ones shall, on their return, give us Archduke Ferdinand, governor, and our uncle, lord and friend, the Cardinal and Archbishop of Mainz, as archchancellor, their action, and what they encounter, report and give notice of it to the others.

4. Accordingly, we, also Princes, Princes and Estates, and their embassies, have now unanimously agreed and united here at this Imperial Diet, in the meantime of the Council, or National Assembly, nevertheless with our subjects, each of us, in matters in which the edict of the Imperial Majesty was issued at the Imperial Diet held at Worms, to live, govern and hold himself in such a way as each of us hopes and trusts to answer to God and the Imperial Majesty.

5. On the other hand, when in various years frightful, outrageous and unchristian rebellion of the subjects occurred and arose almost in all places of the Upper German nation against the supreme and honorable authorities, to noticeable Christian bloodshed, devastation and destruction of country and people; for which reason Her Imperial Majesty, in the Instruction she issued for this Imperial Diet, has expressly willed and commanded that serious caution be exercised, so that in the future such rebellion and outrage of the subjects may be prevented and occur. Since we now owe our obedience to Her Imperial Majesty in this matter! We have pledged and promised each other to their Imperial Majesty for their submissive obedience and favor, also to the German nation, to the same subjects, and to the common good, that each of us shall and will keep and maintain the land peace established beforehand by the Emperor and the Holy Roman Empire at Worms with good honor and loyalty, so that neither may wage war against the other, rob, see, overrun, or besiege the other,

Neither shall any man take, despoil, burn, or otherwise damage another's cities, castles, or towns; nor shall any man by force or deed spoil, deprive, or force away another's property, either by himself or by any other person; In addition, no one shall dangerously contain or push away the other's enemy and damaging party, nor show help, counsel and assistance in any way; but whoever has to speak to the other shall do so with due rights, all other contents, even with penalty and punishment of the affected land peace.

6. And although the common man and subjects in past rebellion have hardly forgotten themselves, and acted rudely against their authorities: However, that they may feel the grace and mercy of their superiors and mediators, [more] than their [un]reasonable 1) deed and action, every authority shall have power and authority to restore their subjects, who have gone into grace and disgrace and have been punished, according to opportunity and their pleasure, to the former state of their honors, to qualify them and make them competent, to hold council and court, to give advice and hold office, and to hear them and others in their concerns and complaints at any time graciously, and to give gracious and favorable advice according to the state of the case. They also not unreasonably complain by themselves, their bailiffs, mayors and other servants, but who may suffer right, to let it remain.

7. If some of the subjects of their sovereignty have insulted or damaged someone, and for this reason they do not wish to be relieved of their duty and support, then they are to return to the damaged party the damage they have inflicted, according to the assessment of their ordinary authority under which they sat, or according to the Imperial Court of Appeal, and to make restitution according to the order of the Empire, and what is thus mitigated by their authority, as now reported, it shall remain so, and the injured party shall therefore continue to leave the other injured party unchallenged, by deed or otherwise, whether with or without right, in some manner. If, however, one party believes that he is adversely affected by a decision or judgment rendered before the ordinary judge, he shall be at liberty to use his right of appeal in the proper manner, including up to the Court of Appeal. 2) And the contracts shall hereby be subject to the jurisdiction of the Court of Appeal. And herewith the contracts and decrees which the weaker judge has made are to be respected.

1) "unreasonable" put by us to give sense. Compare § 8.

2) "unbenommen" put by us instead of: taken over.

bische Bund in Bavarian indignation made, nothing withdrawn or broken off be.

(8) Every authority shall, on the occasion of every trial, so show itself against those who have gone out on account of the peasant revolt, that the subjects, however much they may suffer, may feel and find more mercy and kindness than severity and disfavor. However, without special public cause and motion, which are the concern and power of all authorities, those who have been the instigators, winders, and main supporters, or special promoters of such rebellion, shall not be accepted for any pardon, nor shall they be housed, hosted, or removed by anyone, but rather, where they are found, they shall be dealt with and punished severely according to their experience, as is proper. In addition, the subjects are to behave obediently, faithfully, and peacefully toward their superiors, whether of spiritual or secular rank, and to act as they are obligated to do; they are also to be instructed in their duties and oaths, and are not to give any cause for their own destruction or harm.

9. Thereupon we, together with the princes, princes, prelates, counts and estates of imperial majesty, have united in submissive obedience and have agreed that if, as a result of the above-mentioned grace and clemency shown by some of our subjects, whether of ecclesiastical or secular rank, they should again come together, If, after the above-mentioned clemency shown by some subjects of ecclesiastical or secular status, they continue to converge, again arouse rebellion and insurrection, then the abutting princes, lords, earls and other authorities in which the rebellion has arisen, shall request, from time and place, and also most urgently on horseback and on foot, to come to their aid and rescue them. And if the same help, thus requested, would be too weak for the riot that has arisen, then the other next-sitting princes, lords and estates shall, upon request, as above, in the same way, as strongly as they can, also go to silence the disobedient rioters again, to bring them into obedience, and to punish the charge, and to show and hold ourselves all one against the other in this no differently than if such rebellion and insurrection had occurred and happened in each of our own principality, dominions and territory, and in such a way each would have liked to have done and take from the other.

(10) In order that there may be no confusion or misunderstanding between the helper and the one who has been helped, the help of the princes, prelates, counts, or estates, who are required by the other for rescue and help, shall be given to the sovereignty of the principality, dominion, or territory.

If the rebellion has arisen, the governor shall give the most powerful assistance, horse and foot, and, if necessary, at his own expense and damage, for one month against the disobedient subjects; but in such a month, the arrival and departure shall be counted. If, however, such assistance extends over a month and is delayed, the party to whom the assistance is rendered shall then unite and settle with the assailant for the assistance which he will render and perform over the month. For this purpose, the helper against whom he has rendered assistance shall keep and perform such assistance in a tolerable, friendly, and neighborly manner, as he would have liked others to do and perform in the same case.

11. And after consideration and deliberation at this present Imperial Diet, how in many places the clergy or the secular are in danger of their life and limb, and how their interest, rent, validity, and tithes are held against them, and how they are to be prevented from entering and lending, and how no one is to be spoliated and deprived of his own against the law: Every authority, ecclesiastical or secular, shall faithfully defend, protect and protect its subjects, ecclesiastical or secular, from violence and injustice, according to their own content and by virtue of the order established by the peace of the land or the Holy Roman Empire, until the future council, so that peace, unity and equality may be maintained between ecclesiastics and seculars until the future council, and neither ecclesiastics nor seculars may have cause to complain of any improper administration or appointment. They are also to treat each other in a friendly and skilful manner, as befits each class.

12. Further, as the royal dignity of Hungary, an urgent message has been prepared here for this Imperial Diet, which, on the basis of the credence handed over to us, opens up and makes known to us how the enemy of the Christian name and faith, the Turk, with great power, on horseback and on foot, in his own person, is approaching to invade the kingdom of Hungary and bring it under his cruel power, was about to overrun the kingdom of Hungary and bring it under his cruel power, with the highest request and entreaty not to leave their love and royal dignity, as a Christian king, in such extreme distress, with hasty, brave, comforting help, and especially as granted above. And after we have received here at Speier for this reason, the longer the more certain and difficult the message and report from the crown in Hungary and elsewhere, that everything, as mentioned above, has taken such and somewhat difficult shape, and especially that the Turk has more violently attacked the fortifications of Peterwardein and other castles.

The Turkish army has conquered the German land, and no longer has a necessary fortification in front of it, but has an even approach to the furnace and the German nation, so that no other resistance, consolation, help, or other means can be provided, except a battle in the field, and that therefore all welfare and misfortune stand with God and on the happiness of the same: We, together with the princes, princes and estates, have considered the great power and might of the Turk; even if he (since God is the Almighty for him) should prevail in such a battle, retain the victory, and conquer Hungary, that he would then soon (after he had thereby increased his power and might somewhat) move on into the German nation, and after that it would be difficult to resist him. And therefore, not only for the protection and shielding of our own lands and people, we have considered it a great necessity, but also Christian and just, not to leave the crown and the kingdom of Hungary, as a Christian kingdom, at this time with help, and therefore, for the urgent help of the Crown of Hungary, the two-fourths of the twenty thousand on foot, which at the recent Imperial Diet in Worms were given to the Roman Emperor's Majesty for her campaign in Rome, and which were given to the Crown of Hungary at the Imperial Diet in Nuremberg in the year 1523. The first year, the next two were promised and decreed at Nuremberg, but had no progress, now again promised and granted for six months. And thereupon, because the trade may not suffer any delay, but requires great haste, captains have been placed here who are to accept such servants and lead and use them down into Hungary against the Turks. For the causes now mentioned and such haste, the above-mentioned two-fourths have also been paid in one money, which money, according to the tender, is due to every state in the Holy Roman Empire in such two-fourths six months, half of which is due on St. Michael's Day. Half of it is to be paid on St. Michael's Day, and the other half on St. Martin's Day next after, to the mayors and councillors of the cities of Augsburg, Nuremberg, Frankfurt and Strasbourg, whichever city is most convenient for each estate. And 15 Batzen, 60 Kreuzer, 21 Meissen Groschen and 26 Albus are to be paid for the Gulden, which receive the same, and for these hereafter named, by reason of Electors, ecclesiastical and secular Princes, Prelates, Counts and Estates, namely Philippsen von Gundheim, Ulrich Schellenberg, Knight, Bastian Schilling, Knight, and Christoffel Plarer, all four of the Imperial Regiment Councillors, or who would be appointed in place of the Reg[iment] Councillors, the

We have specially decreed to receive such money, and nowhere else but for the maintenance of such two quarters on foot, to go out for six months, to give and answer. They shall also render their due account thereof to princes, princes and estates. The Imperial Majesty's Fiscal has issued a serious order that anyone who is found to be in default for the stated purposes and does not pay his due share is to proceed against them in the proper manner.

13. We, the Governors and Commissaries, Princes, Princes and Estates of the Holy Roman Empire, have also specially united and decided, as our letter also states, if such an addition of the two fourths reported above does not proceed this summer, or if such a people would be attracted and demanded again before the end of the six months, that each estate, according to a good modest account, shall again receive its fee without hindrance or entry; As we, the princes, princes, and estates of the Holy Roman Empire, have specially bound the above-mentioned four appointed collectors in their duty to keep such money with them in this case, and not to return or turn it at anyone's request or commandment until a future Imperial Diet; Then, according to good account, the number of each estate shall certainly be given again by the princes, princes, prelates, counts and estates of the realm who appear there, and no one shall make a demand of this kind on anyone else for the sake of his investment, except on us governors and commissioners, as well as on princes, princes, prelates, counts and estates of the realm altogether. As we also here with this agreement all talk and promise, if mayors and councillors of the mentioned cities Augsburg, Nuremberg, Strasbourg and Frankfurt, on account of the aforementioned ordered receipt of such money, are approached and challenged by anyone, legally and physically, or otherwise suffer or suffer any damage because of this, to represent them in this, to answer for it, and to hold them harmless without any danger.

(14) And that such urgent help may be the more fruitfully applied and rendered, we have made the well-born Georgen, Count of Wertheim, Philippsen of Feilitzsch, Knight, and Veit Arenbergers, with instruction, credence, and several articles, to the royal dignity of Hungary, to confer and compare with their beloved and royal dignities in form and measure, how such servants may be of most use and benefit.

shall be used most fruitfully, as this was also discussed at the above-mentioned Imperial Diet at Nuremberg, and so acted, that the same deputies, what they hear and hear, and what will arise for them to answer, about how it is going on everywhere with the Turk's actions and actions, and also the resistance of the Hungarians, shall inform us, Archduke Ferdinand, Governor 2c., as the warlord ordered in these matters, to inform our lord and friend, the Cardinal and Archbishop of Mainz, Elector 2c., as the Archchancellor, and to report this to others.

15. It has been especially unanimously decided and considered good where the affairs of this war exercise of the Crown of Hungary against the Turk would be such that they would not have to use such help of the two fourths, as where the Turk (since God Almighty is for) conquers the Kingdom of Hungary, or obtains a treaty of his own liking, or turns from Hungary to the House of Austria or other adjoining principalities with his people of war, that then such aid should be used for the House of Austria or other adjoining principalities where it is most necessary.

16. Since the resolution of the recently held Imperial Diet at Nuremberg contains, among other things, that we, the governor together with the appointed regiment, are to give consideration, and think of ways and means, how and to what extent a constant and persistent maintenance of the regiment and the Court of Appeal may be invented, we, together with the princes and the estates, herewith submit to the most diligent and faithful attention of the governor and the regiment a number of points and articles in writings; For this reason, at the present Imperial Diet, we submitted a number of points and articles in writings, of which we, together with the Electors, Princes, and Estates, are now here most diligently and faithfully considering and discussing which of the ways and means proposed therein would be least burdensome and most beneficial to all the Estates of the Empire. For excellent reasons, however, we have not been able or willing to finally decide on any of these points, but rather have directed and placed them in the orderly regiment for further consideration and advice.

17) So that the established Regiment and Court of Appeal may continue in its essence, and the Holy Empire of the German Nation may remain in law, peace and unity, the Princes, Reigning Princes and Estates, as well as those who have sent messages to them, have granted and promised that the Regiment and Court of Appeal will continue from Whitsun onwards, at a different time from the two years previously granted at Nuremberg, until the next future St Michael's Day in 1527. year, which together bears six and a half quarters of a year, in the form and measure granted at the recent Imperial Diet at Nuremberg, namely, to the half part, and to the other half part by Imperial Majesty. And the payment is to be made to two ends, namely in the two Frankfurt fairs. And the first goal of such payment shall take place at the next Frankfurt Lenten Fair in the year 1527, and shall be immediately and irresistibly placed and paid behind the mayor and council of the cities of Augsburg, Frankfurt, Nuremberg, or Speier, which money shall be delivered and handed over to the collectors who have been specially ordered to do so; the same collectors shall also do a thorough and fair accounting of it at the end of the six and a half quarter year.

(18) The order shall also be kept, as the six Electors and twelve Princes, in their own persons and by their counsels, shall sit in it every Quatember. And namely, after in the Nuremberg parting in the order, Count Palatine Ludwigen, Elector, the Bishop of Bamberg, and Duke Georgen of Saxony are to sit, now on Michaelmas, coming next, the Bishop of Bamberg, as the ecclesiastical prince, shall sit in his own person, and Palatinate and Saxony shall send their counsels.

(19) The other quarter of the year, which is due to the archbishop of Treves, the bishop of Wuerzburg, and Duke William in Upper and Lower Bavaria, Duke William, as the temporal prince, shall sit, and Treves and Wuerzburg shall send their counsellors.

20 The third quarter of the year, in which Duke Hans of Saxony, Elector, and Bishop of Speier, and Margrave Casimir of Brandenburg sit, the Elector of Saxony shall sit in his own person, and Speier and Brandenburg shall send their counsels.

21 The fourth and last quarter of the year, in which the archbishop of Cologne, bishop of Strasbourg, and Duke Henry of Mechelburg sit, the bishop of Strasbourg, as the spiritual prince, shall sit in his own person, and Cologne and Mechelburg shall send their counsellors.

22 However, the prelates have been granted, at their diligent request, that they may appoint a persevering, skilful person to be in charge of the regiment for all their sakes. The governor and the regiment shall have the power and authority to act in every form and measure, by virtue of the regimental regulations first established at the Imperial Diet held at Worms, and subsequently amended at the Imperial Diet held at Nuremberg in the year 1524, so that the same amendment shall be observed by them.

(23) And we, together with the princes, princes, and estates, have changed the aforementioned regiment and chamber court here to Speier for movable reasons, and thereupon have given the administrators of both regiment and chamber court chanceries, through our uncle, lord, and friend, the cardinal and archbishop of Mainz, as the archchancellor, orders to dispose of the chancery acts and actions, together with the persons belonging to them, in the most beneficial manner to Speier, so that they will be here at Speier before St. Michael's Day. Michaelmas Day, so that they will be here at Speier with the utmost certainty, so that all matters and actions will be carried out as befits.

24th And after all kinds of defects and deficiencies were found in the imperial regiment and chamber court, so that the necessity requires to do their reformation and to give them good order, and this cannot now be done in half the time: so we have united and agreed that we, Archduke Ferdinand, in place of and on behalf of imperial majesty, our hosts, lords and friends, Mr. Albrecht, Cardinal and Archbishop of Mainz 2c, Mr. Ludwig, Count Palatine of the Rhine, Duke in Bavaria 2c., both Electors, each of us a Councillor; our Oheimes and friends, Mr. George, Bishop of Speier, and Mr. Hans, Duke in Bavaria, cousins, both Counts Palatine 2c., of their own persons; our friend, Mr. William, Bishop of Strasbourg, Landgrave in Alsace, and Philip, Margrave of Baden 2c., also decree each a council for such visitation and reformation, which all on St. Michaelmas, and shall have full power and command from us, the Imperial Governor and Commissaries, as well as from the Princes, Princes and Estates, which we also give them here with this farewell, both to visit the regiment and chamber court with the highest diligence of necessity, and to reform it most diligently and best, in persons and other defects and infirmities most faithfully, to put it in good useful order, as befits it.

Item 25: When at the Diet of 1523. The above-mentioned two-fourths of the twenty thousand men, firstly granted to the Crown of Hungary to help against the Turks, and at that time many of the princes, princes, prelates, counts and estates complained somewhat highly of the excessive and unequal attacks, and counts and estates of the excessive and unequal attacks, complained, and did not consent to the same aid of the two fourths in any other way, than that the remaining part of the twenty thousand on foot, also four thousand on horseback, which will be sent hereafter, should not be used.

shall not grant or give anything for this purpose in any new facility, unless such proposals had previously been reduced according to each estate's opportunity and fortune 2c.; and because from some Electors, Princes and the Counts in the Wetterau, in Swabia, Franconia, Harz and Thuringia and other estates 2c. again at the present further granted maintenance of the Regiment and Chamber Court therefore the suggestion has been made 2c., that we, together with the princes, princes and estates, hereby want to have renewed and again promised to them the pledge made here before at the above-mentioned and the last Imperial Diet held at Nuremberg for this reason.

(26) If the monopolies and large companies have committed a selfish, unpleasant act, which is forbidden by the common imperial laws with heavy penalties and punishments, the imperial treasurer shall proceed and act seriously against them, as is proper in law, so that this may be remedied and the common good promoted.

27 As the governor and the regiment, due to the passing of the Imperial Diet in the year 1523, have established an order of coinage in the Holy Roman Empire, which has not yet been put into use and enforced, we, the princes, princes and estates of the empire, want and believe that the same order of coinage should again be diligently inspected by the councils of the regiment and finally enforced.

28. Item: When at the beginning of the Imperial Diet some princes, prelates and other estates made a mistake in the session, which had a certain effect in prolonging the actions and affairs of the empire, for which reason princes, prelates and estates, at our request, kindly made to them by the governor and commissioners on the ninth day of the month of July, kept their sessions of this Imperial Diet in a sociable manner, without danger and without any order. We, on the authority of the Imperial Majesty, do not want any prince, prelate, or estate to be harmed, damaged, or degenerated in any way by such a session and survey of this Imperial Diet, which is held in a convivial, harmless, and orderless manner.

29) Item, when some estates of the Holy Roman Empire went out against the mandate and prohibition at the recent Imperial Diet at Nuremberg not to mint any more coins, the Imperial Fiscal proceeded and acted against these estates ex officio, and such minting happened in the past peasant uprising out of noticeable emergency circumstances: our of the Holy Roman Empire is to be punished.

on account of Imperial Majesty, also of the Princes, Princes, and Estates, order and opinion that the Fiscal shall not proceed further against such, for that which has happened, but shall desist from his suit and let it fall.

(30) As it has happened at previous imperial diets that the treaties have not at times been printed and sold in conformity with the true original, we decree that no one shall print this treaty of this imperial diet unless the sealed original is shown to the printer by Andressen Rücker, Secretary of the Mainz and Imperial Departments, nor shall any printing of it be believed unless it is collated, extracted, and signed in his hand by Andressen Rücker.

31. we Ferdinand, Prince and Commander in Hispania, Archduke in Austria, in Burgundy, 2c., Imperial Majesty's Governor, and we, the commissioners aforesaid, in virtue of our power, by reason of the Roman Imperial Majesty, our most gracious lord, all and every thing that is above written, and may affect Imperial Majesty, steadfastly, firmly, and sincerely, to comply and live with it strictly and without refusal, and not to do, perform, or act contrary to it, nor to allow anyone else to do so on our behalf, except all danger. In witness whereof we Ferdinand, Prince and Archduke, have hereunto set our seal for ourselves and our fellow commissioners.

32. And we Electors, Princes, Prelates, Counts and Lords, and also the Electors, Princes, Prelates, Counts and the Free and Imperial Cities of the Holy Roman Empire, envoys, embassies and rulers, hereinafter called, also publicly confess with this farewell that all and every one of the above-written points and articles have been made and resolved with our good knowledge, will and counsel, and also approve the same altogether and especially herewith and in virtue of this letter; We do, in right, good, and true faith, speak and promise, as much as each of us may concern or be concerned with his sovereignty or friend, by whom he is sent or trusted, to keep and perform them truly, steadily, firmly, sincerely, and unbreakably, and to comply and live with them to the best of our ability, without any danger.

810 Aurifaber's report of this Imperial Day.

This document is found in the Eisleben Collection, vol. I, p. 278; in the Altenburg, vol. III, p. 657; and in the Leipzig, vol. XIX, p. 533.

In this year a Diet was held at Speier in the month of June, to which John, Elector of Saxony, and Landgrave Philip of Hesse also arrived, along with many other princes, where, for the sake of religion, it was once again decided that the Lutherans should rejoin the papal church and not undertake any innovation, and that they should behave according to the Edict of Worms, issued in 1521. Since the estates were divided and divided in this action, and the Elector of Saxony and the Landgrave of Hesse wanted to break away from the Imperial Diet and go home, the matter was resolved by King Ferdinand and the Bishop of Trier, Elector, that a Christian, free council should be held in the German lands within a year, in which these religious disputes would be settled and resolved, and in the meantime everyone should behave quietly and peacefully.

811 News of the Battle of the Turks that took place on Aug. 29, 1526, and other news, written from Nuremberg on Sept. 22, 1).

Äus Kapp's Nachlese, Theil II, p. 696.

From the Battle of the Turks in Hungary in 1526, on the 29th day of the month of August, on the day of St. John Enthaupt from Nuremberg on Saturday the 22nd of September.

1st Willing service, honorable and highly respected, especially dear lord and friend. You have undoubtedly heard of the extent to which the King of Hungary lay down against the Turks a few miles from Fünfkirchen on August 29.

1) In Walch's old edition: "the 12th of Sept. I, but, as below, it reads the 22nd of September, which was a Saturday.

The king is said to have been betrayed by his own, to have lost the battle, and to have received considerable damage, for which reason only the men fled from Ofen and the queen to Bratislava; three bishops and great lords are said to have perished. Of the king I do not yet know any news that he is alive, although they sang Te Deum laudamus at Prague, but he is said to have drowned in the flight.

(2) As yet they have no lack at all in Milan, nor do they fear that the Venetians lie before it and do nothing, though they have lost a brave summa of people in several storms and skirmishes before Cremona.

3rd Further, the alliance undertakes to besiege Genoa with a powerful armada, but hopes that they will not achieve anything.

(4) The emperor is sending a great armada from Rome, which, if they arrived happily with divine grace, would change many things. He has also made on Genoa and the Low Countries by bill of exchange over four times a hundred thousand ducats; but the payment is consumed by evil practica.

5th Verhosse, Lord George of Fronsberg shall lately lead ten thousand good servants into Lombardy to relieve Milan.

6th The king of France has the dog put to death, and the emperor and the pope send themselves against each other in such a way as if one wanted and had to make himself master of the other, although I have no doubt at all, and trust God well, that the emperor will intercede. One hears that the Turk has further plans.

Inserted note eoäeni the.

Letters have also come that the Turk has taken the county of Cilli, under the Archduke's jurisdiction, has taken the city of Ofen, has burned out the plague. He has stabbed young and old, besieged Stuhlweißenburg, and is seeking Styria; the Grand Count is staying in Transylvania, may be patient to become king in place of the deceased king; the Archduke and Duke Wilhelm together with Duke Ludwigen have been with each other not far from Kopfenstein; the princes of Bavaria have described their countryside to Ingolstadt.

812 Emperor Carl V's letter to the princes of the German Empire about the true cause of the Hungarian defeat, in which he blames King Francis in France. Dated 29 Nov. 1526.

From Goldasts oo "8t. iMp., tom. I.

Translated from the Latin by Joh. Frick.

Carl von GÖttes Gnaden, gewählter römischer Kaiser, zu allen Zeiten Mehrer 2c., den hochwürdigsten und Hochgebornen Fürsten, des heiligen römischen Reichs Churfürsten 2c.

(1) Most reverend in Christ the Father, venerable, highborn princes, beloved friends and homes. What we have hitherto done for the welfare, peace, and tranquility of the commonwealth is, we believe, so well known to men that our reputation and honor will not be harmed in the least by the malice of any man. We have been careful at all times not to prove our actions with made-up and false words, as most do, but with the deed itself, not before individuals and those who lack right understanding, but before the great God who tests the hearts, and before all of Christendom.

2. 2. Since we do not wish to mention older histories here, it is precisely because we desire and wish with all our hearts to provide for the common good and especially for the tranquility of the German Empire, that we are opposed to the King of France, whom, as everyone knows, we had good reason to hold captive with us, after we had received him with all love and grace in our Spanish lands, and he also stood in great honor with our subjects, had been so kind that, if he had not himself forfeited his fortune, it would have easily gained the appearance as if he had not only not been defeated in the encounter at Pavia, but had even been the conqueror. Although he was our enemy, we nevertheless married our beloved eldest and in the successes of so important kingdoms closest sister to him, so that he might become our friend and brother-in-law from an enemy. Everyone considered him a destroyer of Christianity, and we wanted to bring the glory of general welfare upon him. He took much from our ancestors in the kingdom of Spain and the duchy of Burgundy by force and kept it against all justice and equity; nevertheless, we granted him our rights and only asked him for what we could not pass without hurting our honor and dignity and without the constant reluctance of our subjects, namely, what he himself had to give us back, even without our seeking (if he otherwise wanted to rightfully claim the name of the most Christian). This king, who was pardoned with so many benefits, we have rescued from captivity in his royal honors, and, although many who thought him not to be trusted at all advised against it, allowed him to go to France, and would rather put his fidelity to the test and forgive us something in our right, than let us be blamed for a misfortune that might come upon Christendom. ...blame us.

3. And while we, after the internal disturbances had been settled, were getting ready for the journey to Italy, as had been agreed among us, and in the hope that he would keep his word just as we keep ours, direct our weapons against the constant arch-enemies of our religion with united forces, as by both of which the kingdom of Hungary could have been protected and the enemies removed from the country, he, on the other hand, is arming himself against us for a bloody war, and is attacking us, after he has entered into an offensive alliance with the Roman pope and several other potentates in Italy and divided our Neapolitan kingdom among them, and after he has entered into an offensive alliance with the Roman pope and several other potentates in Italy and divided our Neapolitan kingdom among them, so that the one with empty assurances, what he promised us, to keep, the other but us, to defend Hungary, only that they may invade us unawares, with these his aliirs hostile to our lands and the Holy Roman Empire, putting out of sight both our love and affection, and the good of Christendom and the honour of our religion.

(4) But as they did not succeed in their enterprise as they wished in the just judgment of God, it was not enough for the French king to attack us by force, but he also throws blasphemies around him and has them printed with royal privilege and scattered everywhere, without concern that he might invalidate his own words by his actions and deeds contrary to them. And therefore we (although this responsibility or rather scandalous writing, which in days gone by was printed in both Latin and French with a royal decree in Paris, was answered without our knowledge) did not at all want, and rather expressly forbade, that something like this should be printed in our reigns, that such a thing should be published in our kingdoms and countries, and considered far better to win him by virtue than by counter-insult, living in the hope that our gentleness and modesty would subdue and tame his will to anger.

005 But now that a copy of the letter which the king himself wrote to you and to the rest of the estates of the holy Roman empire, on the one which you wrote to him for the preservation of the free
If you have allowed to reach us the letter of the Holy Roman Emperor's authority for the nuncios to arrive and depart in the name of the Empire, which has been delivered to us on occasion, not in copy, but printed in Paris, and we perceive that the King of France therein expressly sets out on us and our imperial dignity and honor, we are obliged, whether we wish to act in these confused and dangerous times, to reveal the truth to everyone and to give an account of our actions, Although in these confused and dangerous times we would much rather act on the common and private matter, we are nevertheless obliged, whether we want to or not, to reveal the truth to everyone and to give an account of our actions, so that it does not appear as if, through our excessive silence, we accept such false abuse and blasphemy as known.

6. Accordingly, we send you the aforementioned responsibility or rather invective, together with an enclosed rebuttal of the same, issued in our defence, so that you may the more thoroughly and widely see by what right and in what manner the French King can excuse his broken loyalty and oath; How he would be considered a peace-loving lord, and boast as if he had offered us cheap peace proposals, even though he had not kept a treaty, but contrary to the loyalty voluntarily given and accepted, forged an offensive alliance against us, of which we also send a copy, and made a hostile incursion into our lands. How inclined he is to Christianity, the ornament of our religion and the honor of the Christian name, that when he hears that the cruel tyrant, the Turk, is invading Hungary with a large number of soldiers and instruments of war, he makes war on us and compels us to defend our, Hungary's, determined power within our borders. power within our borders for the protection of our subjects! Hence it came to pass that the arch-enemy, to the greatest dishonor of the Christian name, was granted his wish, and brought this strong rampart of our religion under his impious command, murdered the illustrious king, drove the Christians from their homes, defiled so many temples, and shed so much innocent blood, that we cannot tell it without the utmost sorrow of heart. And since he has given rise to this and all other mischief and misfortune of the common people, he now pretends to have felt this evil, just as if he had given more credence to his words than to his deeds and the testimony of all those who saw them with their eyes. But we hold that he wrote this with the intention that he might shut those up, who caught his breeze, and did not allow themselves to be turned away from claiming that the Turks had so grimly attacked Hungary through his help and incitement. But let us pass by the words of others with silence, and rather come to the letters of the king himself written with such a false and dissembled sentiment.

(7) If he was concerned that the Christian religion might be endangered; if he wished the republic well; if he cursed the weapons that would be taken against the enemies of our religion; if he cursed the power that would be brought against them; if he cursed the attempts that were made to exterminate them, but were made against ourselves, and that a Christian should shed Christian blood; why did he himself stir up new wars and thereby endanger the republic? Why did he deprive them of their peace and quiet? Why has he invaded our countries by force, and shed Christian blood at the very commencement of his government? Why has he forced us, by his cunning plots and undertakings against the common welfare, to withdraw our power and our plots, which have been repeatedly made against the common enemies of our religion, for the protection of our subjects? Why, then, would he rather, in spite of the divine justice which aids our righteous cause, be so often cut short, be so often unhappy with the shedding of much Christian blood, than look to the glorification of Christ and his own honor?

(8) This, although it is known to men, he has no hesitation in laying all the blame on us, without considering whether he is spreading truth or lies, by pretending that we seek to conquer a small piece of land with much blood. Certainly, we were satisfied with a small piece of land for the liberation of such a great king, and would not even have demanded this, if our right to it, as can be clearly seen from the answer to the French apology, were not known to all, and the disregard of it could not be interpreted both for a piece of Christianity, or for a generosity, but rather for a carelessness and sleepiness. And the king, both in the covenant made and apart from it, with express words which he had heard from his mouth and confirmed with a sacred oath, gave the assurance of himself that he would restore this duchy to us, and afterwards, when he was released from captivity and came to his kingdom, verbally and by his own words, that he would restore it to us.

In his letters written to us in hand, he indicated that he wished to keep and fulfil all the covenants contained in the alliance; finally, however, he changed his mind and no longer wished to think of restitution: We have not been able to decide to take revenge for the broken covenant, to invade his lands, and to offend the common peace by new hostilities, but have urged his hardened heart, partly in writing and partly orally through our nuncios, that he should keep his promise, and if not for the honor of the commonwealth, at least for his own honor. But because he prefers to see the whole of Christendom plunged into obvious danger, and that his given loyalty and sworn oath be completely forgotten, the misfortune he himself cites has just affected us. In the meantime, he is not afraid to say how wrongly he would have protested to us to accept the Christian peace, and in this he uses the very words that we have often reproached him with, that he should not break the oath and the loyalty.

9. That, then, time is wasted by many a delay, the fields of the Christians are laid waste, cities are destroyed, fire and murder are committed, the borders of the enemy are extended, and their power is daily increased, is something that Christendom has no one to thank but King Francisco, who, dwelling in the midst of Christendom, boasts and brags that he is far removed from this fire of war and from the imminent danger to Christendom; Who confuses everything, lets no one live in peace, compels the peoples to be sent against the Turk to lead against him, detains in his kingdom the envoys sent for the good of the common people, and reckons on fine victories that the Turk has thus overrun our brother-in-law's kingdom, enjoying himself with it, and regrets our brother-in-law's misfortune, who sacrificed his life for the faith, for the fatherland, and for the honor of God Christ, and came to a better, leaving to posterity the fame of a pious, brave, and magnanimous prince. For all sensible people must consider this not a misfortune, but a good fortune. But how far more unfortunate the King is in France, he may see for himself. At least we would rather exchange our fortune with the king in Hungary than with the Frenchman, even though he often and impudently lashes out, saying that he will try everything to preserve the peace of Christendom. If he seeks it, who will challenge him to a quarrel? Who will invade his lands?

Who wants to get involved with him? Who would stir the dung? If he desires to see again his sons, whom he gave us as a scourge, why does he not keep the treaties made? If he promised something which it is not possible for him to keep, why does he not return to captivity as he promised? Truly he will learn that we are at once concerned for the common welfare and for his honor. But if he desires to continue the war, should we put our honour so completely second and allow such a great enemy to attack the army entrusted to us in a senseless way? This reminder, this protestation, which he wants to make to us, is most suitable for him. But we must almost be ashamed of ourselves that we respond so broadly to this empty and unworthy talk.

(10) If he is far from danger, if he enjoys the most pleasant peace and tranquillity within the limits of his kingdom, we never begrudge him this happiness, but rather congratulate him on it from the bottom of our hearts; indeed, we would congratulate him still more if, while he enjoys tranquillity, he would also let his neighbours live in peace, and would neither start so many wars, nor endeavour to confuse everything by secret connections. All this, although it cannot be unknown to anyone and therefore needs no testimony, we have nevertheless wanted to report to you, so that no one would think that such gossip must be believed, and so that so many bad words would not in the least offend our still unsullied honor; and finally also so that you know that it was only due to the King in France that we were not able to complete the journey we had begun, of which we had thought something to you in the previous days.

(11) However, with the help of God, we hope to arrange our affairs in such a way that, if he is already against us, but his intention has been frustrated, we will satisfy our desire to make ourselves well deserving of the commonwealth and our zeal for the purity and propagation of our religion. For in the end, on the twentieth day of the next coming month of January, we want to hold a general assembly in this Castilian kingdom of ours, namely in our city of Valladolid, to which we are now departing, where help is to be sent quickly to Germany, so that we are not only in a position to defend it, but also to weaken the enemy's efforts and bring them away from the Christians again. For the Spaniards have thereby been led into such a movement of mind.

that they have already begun to risk all their strength and fortune, yes, their own blood, and encourage us to this campaign, for which (if it will be good) we have sacrificed not only all our kingdoms and dominions, but also our person, blood, yes, even our soul to Christ, the great God.

(12) In the meantime, however, if by divine inspiration the king of France should come to better thoughts and make peace with us, let us not only endeavor to promote his benefit, honor, and reputation in all things sincerely, and to forgive him gladly and willingly for the wrong done us, but let us also be ready to yield him something of our rights, only so that, after the disputes have been settled, we may with united forces defeat the enemies, drive them from their abode, or even, according to God's will, bring them the more easily into the sheepfold of Christ.

Thirteenth By the way, let it be known to you, beloved friends and foes, that we do not know the pernicious intrigues of the French, for it is their business to think constantly of how they may make mischief. It will only come to you to believe their words, so that they may know that you, as great princes, care nothing for them. Given in our city of Granada, the 29th of November, in the year of our Lord 1526, the eighth year of the Roman Empire.

813th Farewell of the Imperial Diet at Esslingen, established in 1526. Given in Esslingen on 21 December 1526.

From Lünig's Imperial Archives, pari. Zen. eont. I., x. 468.

By the grace of God, we Philip, Margrave of Baden, Imperial Governor, and the decreed counsellors of the Imperial Regiment in the Holy Empire; also we the Electors, and twelve ecclesiastical and secular princes, appointed in the Imperial Regimental Order, established at Worms; and of the same embassies, named at the end of this farewell, do hereby publicly confess, as is provided by a special article in the now touched Imperial Regimental Order: if it should come to pass that any remarkable thing should happen concerning the Holy Empire, that then an imperial governor together with the regimental councils of the Roman imperial majesty, our most gracious lord, should proclaim this, and nevertheless let it reach the six electors, as well as the twelve ecclesiastical and secular princes appointed in the said order, who then shall be informed of it.

They shall appear at the reported regiment and further act and decide according to their best reputation together with governor and regiment, for the benefit and best of imperial majesty and empire. And if the matters were thus public, which would not suffer any delay, they shall proceed in the matters and comply with what is decided by more than one part; Or, if the magnitude of the matter requires it, other princes and estates of the empire shall be summoned to them, and that these princes and estates shall also appear obediently thereupon, and thus do and act with diligence and faithfulness, as they are related to and owe to the imperial majesty and the holy empire; as then this article actually contains. That therefore, and as we the above-mentioned governors and regimental councillors judge, with what swift and serious rage the hereditary enemy of the Christian faith and name, the Turk, recently last summer attacked and invaded the Christian kingdom of Hungary, the royal dignity there, of blessed memory, together with its land and people of war, forced to its rescue, a battle with great defeat and cruel bloodshed of the Christians, the Oerter, so that also the said king himself perished, victoriously accomplished. Then the capital of Hungary, called Ofen, together with the little town of Pest, was conquered, along with other towns and villages, plundered and burned after the miserable murder and death of the inhabitants, devastated, with the dragging away of the Christian people, as well as a great number of goods and livestock and other plunder, which cannot be compared to a small treasure: In consideration of the noticeable damage, and that such a victory of the Turk, as an instrument and advantage for such a further penetration and rampage in Christendom, will incite him to more poverty, iniquity, and treachery, and that also his final intention and plot is directed to persistently persecute Christendom to complete conquest and extermination.

(1) And therefore especially this, as the supreme cause, by virtue of the proposed article, the above-mentioned Princes and Princes, on the first day of the month of December, lately summoned to us, in such burdensome matters and as to meet such intentions and invasions of the Turk, to act and deliberate and decide together with us in a proper manner. Upon which request we, the above-mentioned princes and princes, have appeared here in person, and the others, who were prevented from attending and stayed away for reasons of marriage, have appeared by their excellent message. And thus we all have two ways, the first, one of them

The governor and the regiment have taken before their hands the urgent and the other the persevering help, which we have drawn up in different articles to be further discussed, and have put these into diligent consideration as to how they are to be applied and used most usefully and most effectively against the Turk, and found that especially on a great and persistent help nothing can be done or acted here now, but that the greatness of the matters requires a common imperial diet or assembly of all imperial estates.

(2) And in consideration of the fact that the above-mentioned article is capable of being applied in the order of the regiment in question, and that this concerns not only a principality or a region of the empire, but also the whole German nation, and in addition also the Christian faith, and the soul, honor, body and goods of every one, and therefore a common work, the same common assembly is highly required to undertake and act with common counsel.

3. And so that such common persistent help and resistance against the Turk may thus reach its final progress, we, the above-mentioned governors and regimental councils, also princes, princes and their embassies, have considered it unavoidable and necessary that for the settlement of such common stately and persistent help and resistance, and tyranny practiced by the Turks against the Crown of Hungary, and especially since a further serious invasion by the Turks is to be expected in the near future, a general assembly of the imperial estates is to be described.

(4) And therefore, as the letter of the above article of order is able to require other princes and estates of the realm to appear in their own persons on Monday after the Sunday of Lent in Lent next 1) at Regensburg, decided unanimously. However, if for the sake of one or more conjugal affairs they do not appear, they should nevertheless finally decide their message with complete force and without hindsight 2) to order such persistent help and what may serve to resist the Turks and their followers, also in other necessary matters, which have been referred here from Esslingen to the same general assembly, to deliberate and conclude.

005 And after the emperor's majesty and the holy man

1) That is, the 1st of April, 1527.

2) In the old edition, "without bringing behind them," which is as much as without backing, without first inquiring of their masters.

If Her Majesty is aware that the whole of the Roman Empire, the whole of Christendom, and especially the German nation are greatly interested in such and other burdensome matters and affairs, then she should be informed of this meeting and the reason for it in writing by post, with the appendix that we, the governors and regiments, princes and princes, and their embassies, desire nothing better, than that Her Majesty, if it were possible, appear at such assembly in her own person, considering that this would do much good to the whole of Christendom, the Roman Empire, and especially the German nation, and would be no small comfort in the heavy burden in which the German nation now stands.

(6) Since the time is somewhat too short, so that Her Majesty will probably not be able to appear, nevertheless Her Majesty will dispose of the German nation for comfort and help in the most beneficial way, so that the Holy Empire, especially the German nation, and the other high and burdensome concerns and necessities may receive salutary and gracious counsel, help, and understanding, so that the German nation and the members of it may be placed in a peaceful, unified being. To such a day we, the above-mentioned governor and regiment, wish to appear.

7th Further, for the sake of immediate help, it is considered good that the bordering princes, sovereignties, and countries, whose place the Turk would like to invade, be reminded with the provision of passports and otherwise, and again be put off to the same time of a counter-help.

(8) And after Austria, Saxony, Brandenburg, and Bavaria have respected the adjoining provinces, and then have the princes of one part in their own persons, and the others have embassies, it is now acted with the same princes and embassies that the princes and the sovereigns of the embassies send themselves in resistance, so that one part may come to the rescue and help of the other, and be able to be shot.

(9) And although the Turk, after having conquered the Hungarians, has gone home (as it is said), it is not certain, and it is to be feared, that he has done this to his advantage, and is willing to invade Hungaria or other parts of the German nation again in the future spring, and to extend his power further. In order that the rulers, lands and dominions who are in contact with him may not be abandoned or shortened by the urgent aid, it is mutually agreed and resolved that the urgent aid of the two fourths shall be granted to the Crown of Hungary and others against the Turk at the recently held Imperial Diet at Speier.

The governor and the regiment will therefore take great pains to see that this is done and that the imperial treasurer is ordered to proceed with it. And what is thus imposed, that the same be kept with the four ordered cities and not be used or turned to any other place, but only to resist the Turks, as such has recently been granted at Speier, and the article of farewell is able to do so.

(10) And in order that this may be strictly and certainly complied with, it is considered good that, in addition to the four regimental persons named in the treaty at Speier, some more be appointed by princes, princes and the same councils and other estates, who, by their princely dignities, and the councils and others by their duties, shall pledge not to attack such money or to transfer it to other places.

(11) That also these decreed princes and rulers shall have power and command at any time, if necessity shall require it, to attack and use the above money for the resistance of the Turk alone, in the places where it shall be most necessary.

(12) And these are the princes and sovereigns so decreed, namely, the royal dignity of Bohemia, as archduke of Austria, the elector of Saxony, the elector of Brandenburg, duke Frederick and duke Louis of Bavaria, and the bishop of Augsburg, as adjoining and bordering princes.

(13) And especially for the promotion of trade, it is well considered here, if the Turk should make his attack on Poland in the coming spring, that Saxony and Brandenburg, for the sake of urgent help, should require the other princes, namely Austria, both dukes of Bavaria, reported above, and Augsburg, also the four in the regiment, ordered according to the farewell at Speier, to go to Coburg. If, however, the Turk were to march on Austria or Bavaria, Austria, Bavaria and Augsburg, the Electors of Saxony and Brandenburg, and the above-mentioned four regiments should have the power to take on competent captains, to attack the money for this purpose (as above), and to render urgent assistance where it will be most necessary, but nowhere else than against the Turk.

014 The four cities also, whither the money of the hastening help is to be brought, shall be informed of this opinion, namely, that, notwithstanding the former commandment, the parting of Speier, they shall pay all that which is behind them of such hastening.

for the sake of help, is or will be, without but the order of the above-mentioned princes and princes, now ordered here at Esslingen, and also of the four regimental persons, appointed in the parting above-mentioned, not to give it from them or to hand it over to someone, but to keep it with them until the above-mentioned princes, princes, and the four regimental persons have been informed.

(15) And, nevertheless, the same money laid up for urgent relief, where it is not given against the Turks, or would be unnecessary, shall be delivered and handed over again to each estate, according to the article contained in the decree of the recently held Diet of Speier.

(16) That princes, sovereigns, and the decreed councils shall also have power, where the greatest need and haste require it, to draw such urgent assistance from six months to three months, and thus to duplicate the number of the footmen.

(17) To this end it is also considered good that the princes and the abutting princes inquire in the meantime of the assembly of the Turk's nature and occasion, the like of other abutting princes, counts, and dominions, and of the same borders, as much as possible, how it is everywhere and situated, and that the princes, princes, and others, ordered to the money, at all times inform each other of this, and have the better to direct themselves to it in counsel and in taking urgent and persistent help.

(18) And these are the names of our Electors hereafter appointed, who appeared in their own persons at Esslingen, and the messages of the others. By the Grace of God we Albrecht, Cardinal Priest of the Holy Roman Church, Bishop of Mainz and Magdeburg, Administrator of Halberstadt 2c., Archchancellor and Elector of Germania. ## The second section of the eleventh chapter.

Of the imperial congresses held at Regensburg in 1527 and again at Speier in 1529.

814: The Council of the Empire at Regensburg, established in 1527. Given at Regensburg, May 28, 1527.

From Lünig's Imperial Archives, pari. Zerr. ont. I. , p. 471.

We Wolf, Count of Montfort, Imperial. Governor's Administrator, and the Councilors decreed of the Imperial Regiment in the Holy Empire. We, too, the Electors, Princes, and other estates of the Holy Empire, hereinafter called embassies, do hereby publicly confess, as Roman Imperial Majesty, our most gracious Lord, Governor, and we the above-named Regimental Councilors, together with the six Electors, and the twelve Imperial Councilors of the Holy Empire. Majesty, our most gracious Lord, Governor, and we the above-named Regimental Councilors, together with the six Electors and twelve ecclesiastical and secular Princes, in the Imperial Regiment Order, to

The kingdom of Worms was erected, determined, and the embassies and rulers of the same, according to the order now reported, appeared at the request of each other at Esslingen in the month of December of this year, to report on the swift and serious rage which the hereditary enemy of the Christian name and faith, the Turk, recently exercised against the Christian kingdom of Hungary last summer, attacking and raiding the same, the royal dignity there, of blessed memory, together with its land and war people, forced to its rescue, a field battle, with great defeat and cruel bloodshed of the Christians, the places, so that the said king perish, victoriously accomplished, many cities conquered, and partly burned, after miserable deaths and murders of the inhabitants plundered, burned, devastated, with dragging down much Christian people and robbery. People and robbery 2c., and that such a victory of the Turk [as a tool and advantage] 1) for such further invasions and ravages in Christendom, will incite him to more poverty, outrage and defiance; and that finally all his intentions and plans will be directed to persecute Christendom to complete conquest and extermination.

(1) Thereupon two ways, the first, a hasty one, the other, a persevering help, as at that time had been drawn up by governors and us, the regiment, in articles to be deliberated on in various ways, delivered to princes, princes and their embassies, taken before the hand, the same put into diligent consideration, how they were to be carried out, raised, and used for the most useful and most shootable 2) against the Turk. And he found out that especially on a great and persistent help at that time, nothing could be done nor acted upon, but that the greatness of the action and things requires a common imperial diet or assembly of all imperial estates. And in view of the fact that the article in the regimental order in question is able to do this, and that this not only affects one principality or region of the empire, but also the entire German nation, as well as the Christian faith, each person's soul, honor, body, and goods, and thus a common work, this common assembly must be held.

1) Added by us from the parallel passage in the previous number.

2) In Walch's old edition: "erschließlichen". Cf. §§ 1 and 8 of the previous number. The word "erfchießlich" stands in Luther in the meaning: ersprießlich; this, however, Luther derides as a neologism (Dietz).

The meeting shall be held in the presence of the President of the Council.

2. And therefore governors, and we councillors of regiments, also princes and rulers, [and] of the same embassies, so that such persistent help and resistance against the Turks may thus achieve its final progress, and especially because this summer a further serious invasion by the Turk is to be expected, have, according to the unavoidable necessity, held this assembly day, and all the estates of the realm have been summoned to appear on Sunday Lätare, here in Regensburg in their own persons, or, if one or more would be prevented by marital causes, by their embassy, to finally deliberate and decide on the above-mentioned persistent assistance and what may serve to resist the Turk and his followers. Thus the noble, highborn Prince and Lord, Philipp, Margrave of Baden 2c., as imperial majesty governor, together with us, the regimental councillors, content of the farewell and tender at Esslingen, arrived here at the right time in such a number, and first of all his princely grace; and when the same left some days ago for noticeable reasons, then we, the above-mentioned governor's office administrators and regimental councillors, were ever and always willing and ready to take our part in the actions therefore required; also to await the arrival of the absent estates or their messages, so that the latter may reach and obtain their progress, so that in this case nothing would have been lacking or invented on our part, as far as and where subsequently moving causes indicated by the estates would not have been present. Likewise, we, the embassies, as many as arrive here and are named hereafter, dispatched by our most gracious and gracious lords and superiors, in the form of the content of the tender that has been issued, to take action according to necessity; also to help advise, act and conclude everything that is required by Roman Imperial Majesty, common Christendom and the Church. Majesty, common Christendom, the Holy Empire and the German Nation for honor, benefit, good and welfare. And although it was found that, considering the gravity and greatness of the matters, our most gracious and gracious lords, princes and rulers were eager, willing and inclined to attend such a day in their own person, the diligence of the disobedient half of the subjects, who are still not completely satisfied at this time, as well as other troubles, which would otherwise have been in many other ways, would still be present; which all, besides other more incumbent hindrances of the personal arrival, and especially of this time to get out of their dominions and territories, give cause.

(3) Accordingly, we, the embassies, have taken the matter in hand, consulted it most diligently, and out of dutiful obedience, but also according to the inclination, form, and opportunity of the transaction, have been most eager to undertake, advise, act, and decide all that the above-mentioned farewell and the tendering of the property, and the necessity of the matter, requires.

4th We have considered, first of all, the greatness of the matters, and that the estates and their messages arrive here in small numbers, and whether the assembly is already present in greater numbers, which we cannot decide or suppose, that therefore nothing substantial, fruitful, and final may have been done and acted upon.

5. So that we may consider that our most gracious and gracious lords, the six electors and twelve ecclesiastical and secular princes, who have been in person at Esslingen for the most part, in addition to governors and regimental councils, in such highly important and burdensome matters, which not only, as has been heard, not only a principality or a region of the empire, but the whole German nation, in addition also the Christian faith, and each one's soul, body, and goods, do not want to submit to the action, or to decide therein, but which are placed and postponed at the request 1) and action of all estates of the holy empire.

6. To the fact that also the Roman Imperial Majesty was informed by the above-mentioned governor and regiment, electors, princes and the same embassies, of such a meeting and the cause of it from Esslingen in writings according to the length, with the appendix that they desired nothing better, than that Her Majesty, as far as possible, wanted to appear at such a meeting in her own person, considering that this would do much good to all of Christendom, the Empire, and especially the entire German nation, and would be no small consolation in the heavy, sorrowful burden in which the German nation now stands. But since the time is somewhat too short, so that Her Majesty is presumably not well able to appear there, that nevertheless Her Majesty will come to the consolation and help of the German nation in the most beneficial manner.

1) In Walch: "Auferforderung".

We and the embassies decree that the Roman Empire, especially the German nation, will receive salutary, gracious counsel, help, and understanding for this and other high and burdensome concerns and necessities, so that the German nation and the members thereof may be peacefully united. But since this has not yet been done by Her Majesty, we and the embassies consider that it has undoubtedly been omitted and prevented by Her Majesty's great marital duties 2) and business, and in no other way. Therefore, for these and other excellent reasons, we, the embassies, find it highly and almost burdensome, and also not useful, to undertake some action in this work, as we would have been well inclined to do, willing and obliging, where there was nothing fruitful in it, or to submit to it. And therefore, if it should be delayed any longer, it will be considered that time will be lost, and that the form of the matter will reach the imperial majesty much more slowly, and that the less will be done to resist the Turk, and in the end nothing else will happen, but the greater the burden, harm, mischief, scorn, and ridicule, all to the great irreparable damage and burden of the whole of Christendom, and especially of the German nation.

7. Therefore we, the embassies, have not known how to delay the matter any longer, but have considered it necessary, useful, and good, for the obvious reasons mentioned and for the considerable need, that this action, as it would take shape, should also be of interest to the Roman Imperial Majesty, to all of Christendom, to the Holy Empire, and especially to the German Nation and its members, be reported to the Most Reverend Roman Imperial Majesty, as our most gracious Lord, in the most urgent and beneficial manner, with the highest and most humble request and appeal, that their Imperial Majesty will first of all, in their humble and faithful opinion, graciously strive for and receive our present action, which is due to the present embassy, not otherwise than to meet the need.

(8) And since, for the above-mentioned reasons, nothing fruitful or definite was done or decided at this appointed meeting of the principal articles for which the meeting was called, let our governor's stewardship and regiment, as well as the decreed and skillful embassies, be further un-

2) "Ehehaften" as a noun occurs again in No. 814. In Luther "Ehehaften" as an adjective occurs only once in No. 747 of the previous volume, otherwise "ehehaftigen," that is, lawful. See Dietz 8. v.

Most humbly requesting that Her Imperial Majesty would lead this matter, as it is in herself, to an imperial mind and heart, and have, hold, and provide the German nation with gracious command, protection, and protection, to the above-mentioned and other high and burdensome duties and hardships, so that the heavy, painful burden of the tyrannical Turk of necessity may be averted, and the German nation and its members may be placed in a peaceful, united being.

(9) And for this reason we have considered in good, faithful opinion that nothing more useful and more advantageous 1) could be done to this trade than that Her Majesty should have had an Imperial Diet held and announced at a convenient time and place for Her Majesty's benefit, and yet we have wished to have this done for Her Majesty's good pleasure.

10. After it has been judged that the doing of this work and trade, as indicated above, does not only concern the German nation, nor does it stand in its capacity to meet or oppose it properly alone, but is also highly and urgently respected by all other Christian kings and potentates for the urgent help against the Turks: We would like to remind Your Imperial Majesty most diligently that Your Majesty deigns to work with all diligence so that a common peace of Christendom, as much as possible, or at least a cessation of the now pending confusion and disunity of the high Christian heads and estates, may be achieved in the German nation.

(11) And when the well-born and noble lord Ulrich, count of Helfenstein, and lord Sigmund Ludwig, lord of Poland, on account of the royal dignity of Bohemia and Hungary 2c. have made several half-article requests to us, the embassies, and first of all, since they have heard that we are willing to take hold of this assembly day, they have, on account of royal dignity, made their request and request that, in consideration of these grave and important matters, in which the Holy Roman Empire is not a little concerned, this day be extended until the following Martinmas, and that it be again appointed and held here in Regensburg. On the other hand, after the maintenance of the Regimental and Chamber Court has been granted no longer than the next St. Michael's Day, and the time of such maintenance will then end, that on account of Our Gracious Lady, the Court be extended until the next St. Michael's Day.

1) Walch: "erschließlichen".

We, the embassies, have agreed to grant the maintenance of half of the regiment and chamber court mentioned above until St. Martin's Day. Thirdly, that for the causes which they have put in writs and handed over to us, we want to follow with royal dignity the urgent aid which has recently been granted and decided at Speier and Esslingen. Lastly, whether the Weyda 2) wants to take care of and order servants and warriors in our most gracious and gracious lords and sovereigns' principality and sovereignty, so that no passport or passage would be granted to them, as they have presented all of this to us at length and most skillfully.

(12) From our previous deliberation and diligent consideration of the matter, we have given and opened the answer to the above-mentioned von Helfenstein and Poland: namely, to the first article, that this Assembly Day shall be extended until Martinmas and shall again be appointed here 2c., We would remind ourselves that the holding and enquiry of an Imperial Diet belongs to the Roman Imperial Majesty, our most gracious lord, and is not within our power and authority. However, we do not wish to keep it from them that we have resolved to write to the Imperial Majesty and indicate for what brave and moving reasons nothing fruitful or worthwhile may have been done at this assembly in these highly important matters, and for this reason we have placed it in her Majesty's will and favour to call an Imperial Diet.

(13) With regard to the other article and the preservation of the regimental and chamber court, we, the embassies, have no doubt that the decreed royal dignity has good knowledge that this day was not set aside and announced for the sake of such entertainment, but for other reasons; for this reason we have no order or authority from our most gracious and gracious lords and sovereigns. Since, however, it is to be written to Imperial Majesty, as mentioned above, we trust that Imperial Majesty will have and do his gracious understanding in this matter of necessity.

014 And as for the urgent assistance, we, the embassies, undoubtedly consider it, that our most gracious and gracious lords and sovereigns of royal dignity may show kind and submissive will that they are particularly inclined to it; so we, the embassies, would be willing for our person also; but we would have have inspected the next agreements drawn up at Speier and Esslingen, and therein expressly decree that these agreements give form and measure as to how and in what manner such urgent assistance is to be used, and if anyone should need it; who is to be asked for it; therefore it is not within the power of our embassies to change this, as they themselves 1) would like to accept and judge.

15. In the last place, for the sake of the servants and the people of war, we, the embassies, wanted to reach our most gracious and merciful lords and sovereigns, confident that they will behave and show themselves to be of good will and of due dignity; But because, as has happened up to now, many servants have secretly gone behind their lords' knowledge, the embassies consider it good, since such servants commonly take their course through the kingdom, principality and country of the royal dignity, that the royal dignity should also take precautions at their passports so that such servants or people of war are not allowed to pass through.

(16) After the Estates of the Empire at the Imperial Diet held at Speier had jointly undertaken and resolved to appoint several Oratores, with credentials and instructions ordered and sealed, to the Imperial Majesty in Hispania, who will also be named in due time, and at the end of this Imperial Diet will be ordered to our most gracious Lord Cardinal and Archbishop of Mainz and Magdeburg, Elector 2c., as soon as the escort [from] the King of France, to whom 2) has therefore been written, will arrive, then to deliver appointed Oratores for emergency. And subsequently it was found in the arriving escort that [it] was set for four months alone, one of which was already gone, and therefore the appointed Oratores were to wait for the arriving day at Esslingen, so that they had been in hand for a short time, and from then on the eighteen princes and princes, and the same messages, for reasons mentioned and other moving causes, the sending of indicated orators to this Imperial Assembly Day happened, as they were then attributed to Imperial Majesty, and thus thereupon reported to us, the other embassies, by us, the Mainz embassy all here, the business and causes of the delay, with presentation of suggested sealed credence and instruction. Thus, we, the embassies, have considered such action carefully, and have taken special care to ensure that it is highly useful and good.

1) Walch: "where" instead of: probably.

2) Walch: "the" instead of: dem.

Oratores have long since been dispatched, would still be dispatched, or in other ways suggested Instruction to Imperial Majesty, in consideration of what the Holy Empire and especially the German Nation are interested in. However, since we know how, in what measure and form, and also for what reasons, the instruction in question has been issued, and the orators have been ordered to do so by unanimous consent, moreover, we have not taken any action here for the reasons mentioned above, and thus it is not within our power or authority to change what was decided at the Imperial Diet in question, we do not need to be aware of this time.

17. And when on the held day at Esslingen a decided missive, issued by royal dignity of England to the princes of the realm, arrived, which also at that time, though some princes and lords had been restrained, was opened by the others, of whom again answer to it in writings, among others of the content that at this assembly day of the realm such letter should be held up to common estates: Thus the suggested letter of the tyrannical Turk has contained a practiced action, admonishing to what extent he should be resisted, to which their royal dignity also wants to lend its power and help. 2c., together with the reply made thereto, have been submitted to us in their entirety. However, since we have not taken any action in the main articles for which we have arrived here, nor does anyone appear on account of the royal dignity, we have put the matter to rest. However, a copy of it has been sent to the Emperor's Majesty, and a copy of it shall be sent to any person who requests it.

18. When, in the beginning and order of this Imperial Diet, some princes and other estates sent messages objecting to the session and subscription of this farewell on behalf of their lords and sovereigns, since, as they indicated, it would be contrary to and detrimental to their customary privileges, use and justice, Therefore the same embassies, at the request of the said imperial governor, as well as of our steward and regiment, held their session and subscription of the present farewell convivially, safely, and without all order on the day of the meeting: That therefore it is our, the governor's, official administrator's and regiment's, and because of the imperial majesty's mind and opinion, that every prince and estate may safely attend this assembly day.

The law of the state of the United States of America provides that the law of the state of the United States of America shall not be prejudicial, injurious, or objectionable to its customary use and justice in any manner whatsoever.

(19) And these are they which are hereafter written, we, the princes, princes, prelates, counts, and embassies of the holy realm, rulers, and deeds: by reason of the archbishop of Mainz, Frobin of Hütten, knight, and Caspar of Westhausen, doctor, chancellor. Of the Archbishop of Trier, Dieterich von Stein, and Michael Stut, Secretary. Of the Archbishop of Cologne, Dieterich, Count of Manderscheid, and Bernhard of Hagen, Doctor, Chancellor. 816th Imperial Diet Proposition at Speier. 1529.

From Müller's History of the Protestant Estates Protestation 2c., p. 18.

I.*Receipt of the Reichstag Proposition.

The Roman Imperial and Hispanic Royal Majesty 2c., our most gracious Lord, Governor in the Holy Empire, Orator and Commissarien, ordered to this Imperial Diet, the most illustrious, high-born Princes and Lords, Mr. Ferdinand, of Hungary and Bohemia 2c. King, Jnfant in Hispania, Archduke of Austria 2c., Mr. Balthasar, Bishop of Malten, Postulirter of Hildesheim, and Coadjutor of the Constance Chapter, the said Imperial Majesty Vice-Chancellor and Orator general, Mr. Frederick and Mr. William, cousins, Count Palatines of the Rhine and Dukes of Bavaria, and Mr. Bernhard, Bishop of Trent, in place of themselves, and on account of the most illustrious Prince and Lord, Highborn Prince and Lord, Lord Erich, Duke of Brunswick and Lüneburg, their fellow Commisfarien, give the Holy Roman Empire's noble Princes, Princes, ecclesiastical and secular, and other estates, who appeared at the present Imperial Diet, friendly, favorable and gracious opinion to recognize 2c.

II.*Second 1) Propositional point, concerning the matter of religion.

(1) Secondly, His Imperial Majesty bears no small sorrow and grievance that such evil, grave and pernicious teachings and errors have arisen in our holy faith. Majesty bears no small sorrow and complaint that in the German nation, during the time of her reign, such evil, grave, pernicious and corrupt doctrines and errors have arisen in our holy faith, and are now spreading more and more every day, that thereby not only (which is the highest and most important thing) the Christian and praiseworthy laws, customs and usage of the Christian church are held in contempt and blasphemy, to the shame and dishonor of God our Creator, but also her Imperial Majesty and the Empire, and especially the German nation, estates, subjects and relatives, are being held in contempt and blasphemy. Majesty and of the Empire, and especially of the German nation, estates, subjects and relatives, have been moved and inflamed by this to severe miserable indignation, rebellion, war, lamentation, bloodshed among themselves, and thus their Majesty's mandate and commandment, also the separations of the Empire, have been kept little before their eyes, but in much way have they been kept out of sight.

1) Müller has omitted the first propositional point, which concerns the Turkish War.

and contemptible, which is not to her Majesty's small, but to the highest displeasure, and furthermore to watch and permit (as she, as the supreme head of Christendom, is obliged to do) is by no means meant.

(2) And when in the parting, recently made at Regensburg, by the said imperial governor, the governors and councillors of the imperial see, the The governor and councillors of the imperial regiment, also of the churals and princes, and also of other estates. The messages of the princes and princes, as well as those of other estates present, are considered good, that in the confusions and disputes, which partly arise from the thought of our holy faith and Christian religion, a unanimous and uniform understanding should be made, which could not be done more fruitfully than by a free general council or at least a national assembly, which should have been held in a year or a year and a half at the longest possible time. 2) that her Majesty's governors, administrators and councillors of the imperial regiment, as well as of the absent princes, princes and estates, have considered messages at their discretion concerning the General Council, and that they consider such a meeting to be fruitful. At the same time, however, from the person of Her Imperial Majesty alone it has not been possible. If Her Majesty had established the General Council by special authority of the papal sanctity, and had not used the form of the law, it would certainly have caused considerable unrest and division among all the estates; therefore, Her Majesty considered it burdensome to establish the same General Council at the same time, and thus avoided it in the best way.

(3) Now, if matters between the said Imperial Majesty and Papal Holiness are in good Christian understanding, Her Majesty is certain that the General Council will not be held by Papal Holiness. Majesty and the Papal Holiness are, by the grace of the Almighty, in good Christian understanding, that Her Majesty is certain that the Papal Holiness will not refuse to hold the General Council, but that, according to her ascription, it will be sent to the Imperial Majesty at a later time before the Imperial Council. Majesty before the Imperial 3) that such a General Council be granted to the said Papal Holiness to be the first to be written out, in addition to Her Majesty, and that there should be no lack of it, so that then, in such cases of error, the Pope's Holiness may be able to act as the first to be written out, and that there should be no lack of it at all.

2) The following passage and the beginning of § 3 are included in the Preface to the Augsburg Confession. See No. 960.

3) Walch: "verfodern" instead of:

befördern.

We hope that the faithful will act in a manner conducive to our holy faith, and that our holy Christian faith will be preserved in its good nature, and that we may remain as good Christians.

(4) Accordingly, it is the will of the said Imperial Majesty. Majesty's will, opinion, and especially serious command, commands and mandates every person, ecclesiastical and mundane, of high and low rank, to perform the duties with which each person is related to Her Imperial Majesty and the Holy Empire, even in the event of the loss of each person's regalia, fiefs, freedoms, and graces. Majesty and the Holy Roman Empire, also in the event of the forfeiture of any regalia, fiefs, liberties, gifts and graces, and in addition in the event of serious penalties and punishments, it is understood in the mandates issued that between the establishment and holding of the intended council, contrary to our true Christian faith, no one of spiritual or secular rank shall punish the other with the act, on account of the faith, with confiscation and deprivation of ecclesiastical or secular authority and goods, contrary to old usage and custom, does not rape or urge the other to give himself to an unlawful or foreign faith, or to make himself dependent on the new sects, as may have happened in some places up to now, but each one, as seems good to an obligated person and kinsman of the realm, obeys her Imperial Majesty's commandments. Majesty's commandments and show, as dear to each one, the above-mentioned penance, repentance and punishment, and in addition the attention and disregard of the Holy Empire, 1) in which anyone who, contrary to such a serious commandment of her Majesty, in fact does nothing violent, shall immediately be cast out, without further declaration and explanation.

(5) For if anything should be done about such a command of Her Imperial Majesty. 5. For if, contrary to our Christian faith, nothing should be done about such a command of Her Majesty, or if someone should be overpowered, as has been said, this would cause further unrest, disobedience, rebellion, and indignation, which in the end would cause insurmountable harm and damage to those who would be the originators, and which Her Majesty would not like to grant to anyone.

(6) And to forestall such aforesaid diligence, mighty deed and action, it is further ordered by the said Imperial Majesty. Majesty's serious command, if new outrages, riots, or rapes should occur and happen through such a serious prohibition by her Majesty, that then the next-souled shall appear with help and rescue to the one or ones who would be overpowered, damaged, or burdened; as the agreement, made in the 26th year here at Speier, executes such according to [the] length 2).

1) Walch: "Oberacht".

2) Walch: "long ago" instead of: Length.

(7) And after an article has been included in the Imperial Diet of Speier, made in the above-mentioned 26th year, which says that the princes, rulers and estates of the Empire, and the same embassy, have unanimously agreed and united, in the meantime of the Council, with their subjects, in matters which the edict, made by the said Imperial Majesty at the Imperial Diet of Worms, touches. Majesty at the Imperial Diet at Worms, to live, rule and keep, as any one hopes and trusts to do against God and their Imperial Majesty. Majesty hopes and trusts to answer 2c. Her Imperial Majesty is not a little dismayed by the fact that this article, which has been understood, interpreted and explained by many of the estates of the Holy Roman Empire to their liking, has caused great disquiet and misunderstanding against our holy Christian faith, disobedience to the authorities by their subjects, and much other harm; But so that in the future the same article will not be further accepted and interpreted according to everyone's liking, and that what has hitherto been done from it contrary to our holy faith will be prevented: Her Imperial Majesty Her Imperial Majesty hereby rescinds the Article indicated in the aforesaid decree, and cassates and destroys the same now as then, and then as now, all out of imperial power and perfection. And is her imperial. And it is the command of Her Imperial Majesty that in its place the article now read concerning the faith be placed and used in future imperial decrees, and that no one act contrary to it, avoiding punishment, penance, and penance; Her Imperial Majesty will provide this to the Princes, Princes, and Estates completely and without refusal. This has been declared by the said Imperial Governor, Orator and Commissary. Governor, Orator, and Commissaries, but by the command of the Imperial Majesty, to the Electorate. Majesty's command to the Princes, Princes, and Estates of the Empire in the best way that each may be guided by it, to prevent harm and damage, in a friendly and gracious opinion.

III.

Conclusion of the Reichstag Proposition.

And finally, in the name of and on account of the aforesaid Imperial Majesty, the above-mentioned Stadtholders, Orators and Commissars, graciously and earnestly wish to grant their friendly and gracious request, petition and desire. Majesty, graciously and earnestly, also for themselves, their friendly and gracious request, petition and desire, Electors, Princes and Estates of the Holy Roman Empire to promote the above-mentioned two Articles, as the noblest, in which the Holy Roman Empire and the German Nation are most concerned, which cannot or may not suffer any delay or standstill.

In the same way, in other matters incumbent upon the Empire, which are also conducive to the establishment and preservation of peace and justice, good police and the welfare of the Empire, and as the above-mentioned Imperial Diet may act, the above-mentioned Imperial Diet may act. All this the above-mentioned imperial governors, orators and commissars. The above-mentioned Imperial Governors, Orators, and Commissaries, not only according to their orders from the said Imperial Majesty, but also for their own good. Majesty, but also for themselves, as members of the Holy Roman Empire, to the best of their diligence and ability, in addition to the said Electors, Princes and Estates of the Empire, to promote, administer and help to carry out. Such a speedy action, conducive to the electors, princes, and other estates, would confidently benefit all beings, and the imperial majesty would recognize, consider, and never forget this with all graces toward them as a whole, and toward each of them in particular.

817 Concerns of the Princes, Princes, and others delegated to the Great Committee, about the above Imperial Proposition. Bor the 10th of April 1529.

From Müller's History 2c., p. 25. We have the time determination according to the information found in No. 820 that the term "put forward" in the committee had been overlooked again on April 10.

(1) The princes, princes, and other delegates to the great committee, the royal dignity of Hungary and Bohemia, as well as the commissars of other decreed Roman majesties, have taken before them a written presentation and instruction, and have considered and considered the article concerning our holy Christian faith with the greatest diligence and all necessity. And after the other and last imperial congresses held at Nuremberg, item, the next one at Speier, and also at Regensburg, the princes, rulers, and estates of the empire have conferred on this matter with excellence and courage, and have unanimously decided that nothing more fruitful could be done for Christian unification and the laying down of such a law, than a free general council in the German nation, which would therefore be addressed to the Roman imperial majesty with the highest submissive authority. Majesty, with the highest submissive request to carry out the same. Since her Majesty now allows her the same General Council, the content of the instruction handed over, to be carried out, with the narration of the Causes why the same could not have been until now, and most gracious consolation that Her Imperial Majesty is certain that by Papal Holiness the General Council will not be refused. Majesty is certain that he will not refuse to hold the General Council by papal sanctity, with gracious reverence and consolation, to act and to pursue that the same General Council be proclaimed by papal sanctity next to her Majesty:

(2) Thus the Electors, Princes, and the members of the Committee deem it necessary and good that such a thing be accepted by Imperial Majesty's gracious grace with high and humble gratitude. Majesty's gracious command be accepted with high and humble thanks, with notification: After in many held imperial congresses it has been advised and decided in an emergency and bravely, but until now, not to little trouble and extension of the above-mentioned misunderstanding of the holy faith and confusion, it has been difficult, and has grown to such an extent that the trade should now not suffer a longer time or delay 2c., and attached request, that her majesty, as the supreme bailiff and head of Christendom, would take such a grave case and concern of the common German nation to the highest heart, and would graciously promote and be sure of it, that a free, Christian general council, at the first it is always possible, and safe for the longest possible time in one year after date, and after that for the longest possible time in the next year, and thereafter for the longest time in a year or a year and a half, and held in the German nation at the places determined above, as at Metz, Cologne, Mainz, Strasbourg, or at another location in the same nation, so that the German nation may be united in the holy Christian faith, and the pending discord may be discussed.

(3) If, however, at a certain time the General Council should not be able to proceed because of the accidental prevention of Papal Holiness, or otherwise, the German nation will by no means want to be reassured by Imperial Majesty and Papal Holiness that then their Imperial Majesty will be able to take care of it. Majesty and Papal Holiness, that then Her Imperial Majesty will call a general assembly of all the estates of the German people. and others, if the necessity should require it, should call for one in Germany at an appointed time and place; and that Her Majesty, as the head of such assembly, would be in favor of all things, also in his own person, and promote and bring all this into actual execution, so that it may reach its certain progress without some prolongation or refusal (as the highest necessity requires).

(4) And after in the parting of the recent Diet here at Speier an Article Respecting that the Princes, Princes and Estates of the Empire and of the same embassy have unanimously agreed and united to live, govern and keep in the meantime of the Council with their subjects, in matters concerning the edict made by Imperial Maj. Maj. at the Diet of Worms, to live, to govern and to keep, as each one hopes and trusts to answer for such against God and Her Maj.

(5) And the same article has since been misunderstood by many, and has been used as an excuse for all sorts of frightening new doctrines and sects; so that this may be cut off, and further apostasy, strife, discord, and discomfort prevented: therefore the princes, princes, and other estates have resolved that those who have hitherto adhered to the above-mentioned imperial edict shall now also adhere to the same edict until the future concilio, and shall and will hold their subjects to it. The same edict shall now remain in force until the future Council, and their subjects shall and will be held to it.

(6) And in the case of the other estates, among whom the other doctrines have arisen, and some of which cannot be averted without noticeable turmoil, trouble, and danger, let all further innovation be prevented, as far as is possible and humane, until the future Council.

(7) And especially some doctrines and sects, as much as they are contrary to the reverend sacrament of the true Corpus Christi and blood of our Lord Jesus Christ, shall not be accepted among the estates of the Holy Roman Empire of the German Nation, nor shall they be allowed or permitted to preach there publicly; likewise the offices of the holy mass shall not be taken away, nor shall anyone be forbidden, prevented, or urged to keep or hear mass in those places where the new doctrine has gained the upper hand.

(8) Likewise, because of the rebirth, which, contrary to previous imperial and papal law, has long since gone out, there is also a certain and obvious cause and intention to arouse new sedition and rebellion in the Holy Empire. Therefore, a new mandate should be issued by Imperial Majesty from this time on, and the same rebaptism should be seriously forbidden, and whoever enters into such vice should be punished according to the contents of the same mandate. When at Nuremberg, at the last two imperial congresses held there, two articles were passed and approved, especially concerning preachers and printing, the princes, princes and all estates want the same to be lived and obeyed; namely, that every prince, prince, prelate, count and other estates in the empire, with all possible diligence, shall be punished in his own right.

Order and decree that all preachers shall speak and act in a proper manner, avoiding in their sermons anything that might cause the common man to move against the authorities or lead the Christian people into error; but that they alone preach and teach the holy gospel, according to the interpretation of the scriptures, approved and accepted by the holy Christian church, and that they abstain from preaching and teaching it in matters of dispute, but that they await the above-mentioned Christian council's decision. To this end, princes, rulers, and estates of the realm shall and will take all possible care in the meantime of the Council in all printing houses and with all bookkeepers of every authority, that nothing new is printed, and especially defamatory writings are neither publicly nor secretly carried or interpreted for fine purchase, But what is printed or sold for that reason shall be inspected beforehand by persons appointed by every authority, and if any deficiency is found in it, it shall not be permitted to be printed or sold under severe penalty, but shall be strictly forbidden and kept.

(9) After all this, the Imperial Majesty commands every cleric and secular, of high and low rank, by the duties that every one owes to Her Majesty and to the Holy Roman Empire. and the Holy Roman Empire, also in the case of the loss of any regalia, fiefs, liberties, gifts and graces, that between the appointment and the holding of the intended council, no one of the ecclesiastical or secular rank shall in any way oppress the other by depriving and depriving him of his authorities, goods, rents, interest and customs. But whoever, contrary to this commandment of the Emperor's Majesty, would do or act in a violent or criminal manner, he or they shall be subject to the disgrace, attention and disregard of the Emperor's Majesty, but with a previous declaration.

(10) The truce, as established at Worms and decreed at the recent Imperial Diet at Speier, shall be firmly maintained, and it shall be lived by and complied with. If, however, contrary to such a serious imperial commandment and peace, new outrages, riots, and rapes should occur and happen, then the next in line shall give the person or persons who have been raped the right to demand that they be released.

1) Walch: "more daily"; but it is to be read "more compliant" according to No. 818, § 8.

or would be burdened, appear on demand, and also, if they realize this for themselves, with immediate help and rescue, as also otherwise the Speierische Abschied shows such according to the length 1).

818. the Diet of Speier, to which the Imperial Constitution or Statute, how brother's or sister's children of their father's brother or sister shall divide among themselves abandoned inheritance, and the Constitution or Mandate against the Anabaptists is incorporated. April 22, 1529.

This Reichstag resolution was printed in folio in Mainz in 1529 and is found in its entirety in Lünig's Reich Archives, pari. Zen. cont. I. x. 480 The date we have set is the day on which the farewell was signed. The draft of it was made on April 7, 1529; on April 12 the Protestant estates had their counter-script read. On April 18 they were denied a further hearing by a decree, and on the day following this the draft was approved as a formal Reichstag treaty and signed on April 22. On April 25 they drew up their protest against it. See Document No. 820.

We Ferdinand, by the grace of God, King of Hungary and Bohemia, infant of Hispania, Archduke of Austria, Duke of Burgundy 2c., Governor of the Holy Roman Empire. And by the same graces, we Balthasar, bishop of Malten, orator genralis of the convent of Constance. Frederick, Count Palatine of the Rhine, Duke of Bavaria; William, Count Palatine of the Rhine, Duke of Bavaria. Erich, Duke of Brunswick and Lüneburg, and Bernhard, Bishop of Trent, of the Most Sublime, Great, Highborn Prince and Lord, Lord Caroli the Fifth, elected Roman Emperor, to this Imperial Diet here at Speier specially appointed Commissaries 2c., hereby declare and manifest: Since the Roman Imperial Majesty, our most gracious Lord, out of great necessity, for the advancement of the Holy Roman Empire, and especially the honor, benefit, and welfare of the German Nation, has once again ordered a general Imperial Diet to be held here at Speier, and has proclaimed it on several necessary points, such as the discord between our holy Christian faith; item, how and in what manner the Turks may be met with speedy aid and persevering resistance, and also how the regiment and court of justice may continue to be maintained, and other necessary matters, in accordance with Her Imperial Majesty's invitation and instruction 2c., to act, to deliberate and finally to conclude. However, due to highly important and public concerns and hindrance, Her Majesty was unable to appear on such a day in her own person, and on account of Her Majesty provided us with emergency powers and instructions: So we have, according to and by virtue of the same, our authority and command, as well as the princes, princes, prelates, counts, and estates of the Holy Roman Empire, who have personally appeared there in brave numbers, and have taken the absentees' messages, the above-mentioned and other points and articles with timely and brave counsel, and have thereupon all united in a parting of the same counsels and compared them, as the same follows from article to article.

1. And first of all concerning the article of the discord of our holy Christian faith: because hitherto at many held imperial congresses, and also now after brave counsel, nothing more fruitful and better could be found or considered for Christian unification and settlement of such conflict, than to hold a free general council in the German nation; as then imperial majesty hitherto requested and requested by the estates to promote the same by papal sanctity 2c., and the Princes, Princes and Estates have heard from the Instruction now handed over to their Imperial Majesty that their Majesty is not only pleased to hold the Council, but that it is certain that their Imperial Holiness will not refuse to hold the General Council, and that their Imperial Majesty also wishes to promote it, so that it may be announced by their Papal Holiness in addition to their Imperial Majesty: So the princes, princes and estates of her majesty have once again written, requested and reminded her most humbly that her imperial majesty, as the supreme, head and bailiff of Christendom, will graciously take to heart, be involved in and promote such a grave case and concern of the common German nation, and that the trades may no longer suffer a long delay, so that, first of all, a free, Christian general council may be held, and without danger, within a year of the date, and then, for the longest time, within a year or a year and a half, and held in the German nation, in the places determined beforehand, as at Metz, Cologne, Mainz, Strasbourg, or in some other place in the same nation, so that the German nation may be able to live in the

The question is whether the two faiths should be united and the pending conflict discussed.

(2) If, however, at an appointed time, the General Council should ever fail to proceed, either through the accidental prevention of Papal Holiness or otherwise, then Her Majesty would have a general assembly of all the estates of the German nation, and others, if the need should require it, to be convened in Germany at an appointed time and place. And that her Majesty, as the head, would also want to be present at such an assembly, for the benefit of all things, and promote everything in such a way and bring it into actual execution, so that it achieves its certain progress without some prolongation and refusal, as the highest necessity requires.

3. And after an article has been included in the proceedings of the Imperial Diet held here at Speier, stating: that the princes, princes and estates of the empire have unanimously agreed and united, in the meantime of the Council with their subjects, to live, govern and keep in matters touching the edict made by the imperial majesty at the Imperial Diet at Worms, as each one hopes and trusts to answer for such against God and his majesty.

4. And the same article has since been drawn and interpreted by many in great misunderstanding and as an excuse for all kinds of frightening new doctrines and sects, so that such things may be cut off and further apostasy, strife, discord and discomfort may occur: We, together with the princes, princes, prelates, counts, and other estates, have decided that those who have remained with the aforementioned imperial edict until now, should and will remain with the same edict until the future Council, and hold their subjects to it. But in the case of the other estates, among which the other doctrine has arisen, and in part cannot be averted without noticeable revolt, trouble, and danger, all innovation shall be prevented as far as possible and humane until the future Council.

(5) And especially some doctrines and sects, so much as are contrary to the reverend sacrament of the true Corpus Christi and blood of our Lord JEsu Christ, shall not be accepted by the estates of the Holy Roman Empire of the German Nation, nor shall they be allowed or permitted to be preached thereunto;

1) "great" put by us instead of: "greater" by Walch. So it is to be read, both after No. 816 and 817 and after No. 821. Likewise the offices of the holy mass are not to be taken away, nor is anyone to be forbidden to hear the mass in the places where the other doctrine has arisen and is held, nor to be prevented from doing so, nor to be urged to do so.

6. Since a new sect of rebaptism has recently arisen, which was forbidden in common law and condemned many hundreds of years ago, which sect, by imperial mandate, is increasingly breaking in and gaining the upper hand, and since her Majesty, in order to prevent such grave evils and what may follow, to preserve peace and unity in the Holy Empire, has established a lawful constitution, statute, and order, and has proclaimed it everywhere in the Holy Empire, thus reads: That all and every Anabaptist and rebaptized, male and female, of understanding age, from natural life to death, shall be judged and put to death by fire, sword, or the like, according to the occasion of the persons, without the preceding of the ecclesiastical magistrates' inquisition. And those who break the peace, the main fan, the runner, and the agitated rewinders of the touched vice of rebirth, even those who persist in it or fall down another time, shall by no means be pardoned in such, but shall be dealt with seriously with punishment by virtue of such statutes. However, those persons who immediately confess their error, either for themselves or after instruction and admonition, are willing to recant it, accept penance and punishment for it, and ask for mercy, may be pardoned according to their status, nature, youth, and all other circumstances. That every man also, according to Christian order, custom, and usage, should have his children baptized in youth. But whoever despises this and does not do so, as if the baptism of such children were nothing, that he who insists on it is considered an Anabaptist, and is subject to the above-mentioned imperial constitution, and none of them, for the above-mentioned reasons, shall be pardoned, relegated to other houses, but shall be condemned and bound to remain under his authority, which then shall have a diligent supervision, lest they fall away again.

(7) Likewise, no one shall abstain from, subdue, or postpone another's subject or kinsman, who has departed and left their authority because of the departed person's rebirth, but the same authority, under which the departed person abstains, shall immediately take possession of such transfer or be transferred.

he shall act strictly against the same who escaped, according to the above-mentioned imperial statute, and shall not suffer or tolerate them to do so, all with penalty of eight 2c., that 1) thereafter we, also princes, prelates, counties and estates, unanimously agreed to live, comply with and execute such imperial constitution, order and statute, in all the above-mentioned points and articles, faithfully and diligently.

8. And when at Nuremberg, at the two last imperial congresses held there, two articles, especially concerning preachers and printing, were passed and approved, we, together with the princes, prelates and counts, have agreed and united that the same shall again be followed and complied with, namely, that every prince, prelate, count and other estates in the empire shall order and decree with all possible diligence in their authority, that all preachers be spoken to and acted upon in a proper and proper manner, to avoid in their preaching anything that might give rise to the agitation of the common man against the authorities, or to lead Christians into error, but that they alone preach and teach the Gospel according to the interpretation of the Scriptures, approved and accepted by the holy Christian church. And as for controversial matters, to abstain from preaching and teaching the same, and to await the decision of the said Christian Council.

9. To this end, we, as well as the princes, princes, and estates of the realm, shall take every possible precaution in all printing works and with all bookkeepers of every authority, in the meantime of the Council, that nothing new is printed, and especially that defamatory writings are neither publicly or secretly written, printed, sold, or displayed, but that whatever is written, printed, or sold for this reason is first inspected by every authority by persons appointed for this purpose, and if it is found to be defective, it is printed or sold under great penalty, or roped, that is to be inspected beforehand by every authority through reasonable persons appointed for this purpose, and if deficiencies are found therein, that the same is not permitted to be printed or sold with great punishment, but is thus strictly forbidden and kept, and the poet, printer and seller, who transgresses such commandment, is punished by the authority, under which they sat or entered, according to opportunity.

(10) We, also princes, prelates, counts, and estates, have unanimously agreed, and have promised and pledged to each other in good and true faith that no one of spiritual or secular rank shall be able to take advantage of the other for the sake of faith.

1) With Walch: that.

The king shall not rape, invade, or encroach upon, nor deprive of his rent, interest, tithes, and estates. Likewise, none of the other subjects and relatives, for reasons of faith and other causes, should nor want to take them into their own protection and shield against their authorities; all this under penalty and punishment of the imperial peace established at Worms, which all its contents shall remain in dignity, be firmly held and enforced.

11. And that there may be no lack of such execution: We, princes, prelates, counties and estates, have further agreed and united, if it should come to pass that one estate, contrary to all that has been reported, wants to overrun the other with military force or otherwise violently, that then the Imperial Court of Appeal, from the request of that or those estates, who are concerned about the overrun and have duly offered to do so, shall have complete command, power and authority over them, who are concerned about the attack and have duly offered to do so, shall have full command, power and authority to order those who are in arms and armor, with the penalty and the penalty of eight, to refrain from such a violent attack and attack, and to be content with it.

(12) But if he, or they, who are so commanded, should disobey, the Imperial Fiscal shall immediately proceed and proceed in the most expedient manner against such disobedient person, or persons, for the declaration of the above mandates; and such disobedient persons shall be declared by the Court of Chancery to be subject to the penalties of the peace of the land, as may be proper. And in addition to these, the Court of Appeal shall nevertheless make a common demand against all and every helper, the one or ones who, as mentioned above, are in armor and are in charge of the mighty attack, with penalty of the eight, also for the most beneficial outcome. The other neighboring states of the empire are also to demand and exhort to handle everything, as mentioned above, with a fine of eight, and to draw to the rescue of the one or ones who want to be so covered or attacked with a goodly shell.

(13) The rapist shall also be obliged to pay off and reimburse the war expenses incurred by those who are required and conscripted to do so, and shall be at the will of the assistants to enable the rapist to pay the costs of the crime as soon as possible, or, upon the moderation of the court of appeals, with the penalty of eight, to bring this about from him, for which purpose the court of appeals shall also assist him and refuse to do so.

(14) The Article of the next Imperial Diet held here at Speier, made for the sake of the rebellious subjects, shall also exist and remain in force. Namely, if some subjects of some authority, spiritual or secular, are gathered together, again arouse rebellion and insurrection, then the next-joining electors, princes, counts and other authorities shall, at the request of the same authority in which the rebellion arose, petition, from hour and in view, also at the earliest, on horseback and on foot, to draw in, save and help; And if the same help, so requested, would be too weak for the riot that has arisen, then the other next-sitting princes, lords and estates shall, upon request, as aforesaid, in the same manner as is strongest possible for them, also go to silence the disobedient, the rioters again, to bring them into obedience and to punish them. And all of us, one against the other, shall show and hold ourselves in this no differently than if such rebellion and insurrection had occurred and happened in each of our own principalities, dominions, and territories, and in moderation each would have liked to have done and take from the other.

15. In order that no confusion or misunderstanding may arise between the helper and the one being helped, the help of the princes, prelates, counts and estates, who are called upon to rescue and help others, shall be given, the authorities in whose principality, dominion or territory the rebellion has arisen, on horseback and on foot, as strongly as possible, and if necessary, at their own expense and damage, for one month against the disobedient subjects. However, in such a month 1) the collection and withdrawal shall be counted. If, however, such assistance extends over a month and is delayed, the person to whom the assistance was rendered shall then unite and settle with the assisting party for the assistance which he will render and show over the month. For this purpose, the helper against whom he has rendered assistance shall be kind, friendly, and neighborly in his attitude toward such assistance, as he would like others to be and do in the same case.

(16) Secondly, as far as the point or article of urgent assistance is concerned, having heard from the imperial instruction that the Turk is making a supreme bid, intending and intending to overrun the crown of Hungary and the common Christendom this spring, electors, princes, prelates, counts, and others

1) With Walch: "mandate" instead of: Month.

The states have considered how the Turk of the next year 1526. year, had violently overrun the Crown of Hungary, had retained the victory, and had thereby at this time violently held the greater part of the best castles, passes, and fortifications against Hungary and Germany, and that there was no power and authority in the Crown of Hungary to resist the Turk alone; for which reason the matter has now grown to such an extent that where the Crown of Hungary does not receive substantial assistance in resisting the Turk, he would like to bring the entire kingdom of Hungary, including the adjoining principalities and dominions, under his control, and draw promoters into Germany. Should the Turk then once again gain his will against the Crown of Hungary (since the Almighty God is in favor of it) and advance against other bordering principalities, it would be easy to see what noticeable trouble would ensue for the entire German nation, what fright, pusillanimity and apostasy would result everywhere. And therefore we have all and unanimously resolved not to abandon the Christian Kingdom of Hungary, considering that it will bring honor, benefit and welfare to the common Christianity, especially to the German nation, and comfort and salvation to itself. For this reason, and in order that the urgent mission may be carried out all the more effectively, we, as well as the electors, princes and estates, have granted and approved that the quarter and a half, three months, and half a quarter, six months, on foot, and the four thousand on horseback, which are still left over from the aid granted above, be used for the march on Rome and against the Turks, and are to be used against the Turks, are also to be put up at one money, made half at Worms by virtue of the attachment of such granted shells, and together with the aforementioned two-fourths on foot are to be sent to the Crown of Hungary or to the adjoining principalities, where it will be most necessary, against the help of the Turks and are to be used.

17. And so that such a noble and brave help is not undertaken in vain or unfruitfully, nor is it used anywhere else but only to counter and resist the Turk, and not before the Turk undertakes a mighty military campaign on Hungary or the subsequently named principalities of the German nation: So much has been done with the Electors and Princes, who are in the process of parting at Esslingen, that they should and will at all times make certain announcements as to the state of the Turk's actions and undertakings. And that each of the six princes or princes inquires about this and certainly learns about it, or otherwise becomes aware of it for himself, that one of them should inform the other.

to be known and informed at all times. And if they find that the Turks are in such a condition that necessity would require them to advance and render the above-mentioned aid to the Crown of Hungary: They shall then, together with the four regimental councils, for themselves, or at the request of the Crown of Hungary, require and receive the money, which has already been paid by the two fourths, and which is to fall and be paid from now on, from the one who has collected it, The king shall take and appoint captains and men-at-arms on horseback and on foot, as they may most usefully and profitably unite with the royal dignity of Hungary, or consider and decide for themselves the best, and shall have power and authority to send the same people of royal dignity to Hungary. Even if one or more of them do not appear due to matrimonial impediment, or if no one else decides on their behalf, those who are present shall nevertheless continue unimpeded in all this, and shall give a clear account of all their expenditures, revenues, and other actions at the next Imperial Diet of the princes, princes, and estates of the empire.

(18) In this matter, too, it has been especially unanimously considered and deemed good, if, through some hindrance, things turn out that the Turk will not make his move or attack on Hungary, but on Poland, Saxony, or Brandenburg, then the Electors of Saxony and Brandenburg shall, for the sake of urgent help, require the other four princes, namely, Austria, both Dukes of Bavaria, and Augsburg, also the four in the regiment, ordered according to the farewell at Speier and Esslingen, to go to Regensburg. If, however, the Turk should march on Austria or Bavaria, Austria, Bavaria, and Augsburg shall require the Electors of Saxony and Brandenburg, together with the members of the regiment, to march on Augsburg as well, and the six Electors and Princes, as well as four appointed councillors of the regiment, shall have the power to accept competent captains, and to attack and use the money, as mentioned, solely to resist the Turk where it will be most necessary.

(19) The above-mentioned Electors, Princes and four Regimental Councillors shall also have the power, if the greatest need and urgency requires it, to extend such urgent assistance for six months to three, four or five months, depending on the occasion and the nature of the matter, and thus to turn the sum of the above-mentioned request into more or less men-of-war, on horseback and on foot.

(20) For this purpose the above-mentioned princes and lords are to send and place themselves in brave armor and readiness, so that one part may come to the rescue and aid of the other and be able to shoot.

(21) And the deposit of the money, now touched and granted, on horseback and on foot, which is due to each estate, in consideration of the great urgency and necessity, on St. James's Day [July 25] next coming, shall be done without delay to Augsburg, Nuremberg or Frankfurt, 15 batz, 60 kreuzer, 21 Meissen groschen, and 26 albus for the florin, and against the disobedient shall be strictly proceeded with and acted upon by the Fiscal.

22. And because the two-fourths of the twenty thousand on foot, which have been laid up in four places, namely Strasbourg, Nuremberg, Augsburg, and Frankfort, and the necessity of the things requires that the same be brought all together to one place, situated for the war trade: We have all unanimously agreed that the two-fourths of the money, as well as that which has been deposited by means of the above-mentioned order, shall be delivered most advantageously to two places, namely Augsburg and Regensburg, by proper means and channels, through the collectors of the above-mentioned three places.

23. And after the imperial treasurer had reported many estates that had not yet paid the two-fourths of the granted Rome tax, nor part of the one-and-a-half-fourths that had been used in Hungary before, his manifold petition and lawsuit against them was held before the imperial chamber court; and in the Worms Decree it was declared, among other things, that no one is to be exempted from the same horse and foot charges laid according to the Worms Decree, and that for this reason no one is to apply to the Imperial Majesty or be processed, and that no one is to be spared the confiscation of the same, that the imperial treasurer shall bring in all the deficiencies, which are everywhere and also the two fourths, together with the whole of the granted Rome campaign, now ordered to the Turkish Help, as reported above, and that the court of appeals shall assist him in this.

(24) And although at the other Imperial Diet held at Nuremberg a special article was set forth in the agreement, that princes, rulers, and estates shall not consent to the remaining part of the twenty thousand on foot and four thousand on horseback that are to be sent, nor shall they give anything for this purpose, unless such proposals are diminished and appropriate according to each state's opportunity and fortune. 2c. But because this is a needful, mild, and

Work, to which each one shall also be reasonably inclined to help and advise with his disadvantage, and where now some wrangling is to be undertaken and take place, that the same would give birth to a great prolongation and delay of this undertaking, in addition to a noticeable break and wringing of the attack and help. In addition, the decree at Worms clearly states, for the sake of the aid granted, that no wrestling shall be done in any way by anyone. Accordingly, so much has been said and done with those who complain about the attacks and have therefore supplicated, for the reasons indicated, that they alone want to be patient this time for the promotion of such good work, but that in future attacks due consideration will be given to them.

(25) If it should happen that it is not necessary to use such urgent aid against the Turks, it is considered good that the same money should nevertheless be collected with the greatest diligence and kept together in a safe place until the future Diet.

26. Furthermore, we, also princes, prelates, counts, and estates, have judged the article of persistent resistance against the Turk to be of the highest order, so that in our opinion not only the high, unavoidable necessity requires and demands that we act against the Turk with urgent help, but also that, with timely counsel, ways be found by which the Turk may be driven by force behind him again, also that which he brought under his power some years ago may again be conquered, and common Christendom may at last be restored to peace and quiet for the sake of its hereditary enemy. Accordingly, we have taken before our hands the counsels and agreements made before the Imperial Diet held for the sake of such persevering help, as well as the writings that the six princes and twelve princes made to Imperial Majesty at the Imperial Diet in Esslingen, inspected and considered them, and found that the time had been most carefully considered when such a persistent move against the Turks should be made, that first of all it would be necessary to have a certain peace in the Holy Empire. That the wars which have arisen between some Christian leaders and potentates may first be brought to peace, or at least to order. Because such brave actions are not only in the hands of the princes, princes, and the German nation, but also in consideration of the Turk's power and authority, other Christian leaders and potentates, who concern this matter no less than the German nation, may be helped and supported.

The assistance in this will also be necessary, as then governors and regimental councils, also the twelve princes and princes, have indicated and reminded all this to Imperial Majesty in the above-mentioned writing, issued at Esslingen, with humble request that Her Majesty, as the head, act as much as possible for the benefit of all potentates and move them so that the latter, in addition to Her Majesty and the empire, may persevere against the Turks, to her hereditary kingdoms and lands, as well as to all potentates, to act in the most beneficial way, and to move them so that the latter, in addition to her Majesty and the Empire, will provide persistent aid and assistance against the Turks, as is just, and as they are obliged to do out of Christian love. Since, however, the above-mentioned causes have not yet been accepted, and the Turk's power has increased and strengthened, nothing definite has been done about it here, but princes, princes, and estates have indicated such a cause to Imperial Majesty in writings, with the most humble request that they alone appear with the most gracious help and counsel.

27 Furthermore, as previously ordered at other imperial congresses, the imperial government is to consider and deliberate on proper means and ways for the constant maintenance of the regiment and the court of review; which has been done, and seven different points and articles have been handed down by the governor and the regiment for this reason. But since we, also princes, prelates, counts and estates, after diligent, brave and necessary advice and consideration of these articles, have found that the court, which is in part due to movable causes, as was also considered at previous imperial congresses, is highly burdensome, and in part also due to the fact that the court is not only a court of law, but also a court of justice, and in part extensive, so that this time may not be fruitfully acted upon and deliberated by one or more, and the Imperial Regiment and Court of Appeal have therefore undertaken to preserve peace and justice in the Holy Roman Empire. Accordingly, and as a courtesy to the Roman Emperor's Majesty, and for the honor and good of the Holy Roman Empire, and for the maintenance of peace and justice in the Empire, it is hereby granted that the Regiment and Court of Appeal be maintained for two more years, approximately at the rate of half of what has already been paid, and that the first year shall begin on the first day of the next month of May, and that half of the payment of the same year shall be made at the next Autumn Fair in Frankfurt, and the other half at the following Lenten Fair. The payment shall be made in the same manner in the following year, and shall be deposited at any time in the place and at the place designated and indicated beforehand. And nevertheless, in the meantime, such two years shall be considered in other convenient ways, as the

The maintenance of the Regiment and the Court of Appeal shall be carried out by the Estates without complaint.

28. And after an article had been written in the farewell of the next Imperial Diet held here, stating that the Imperial Regiment and Court of Appeal should have been visited and reformed, and that this had no progress for several reasons, and that we, also the Princes, Princes and Estates, subsequently judged and found that due inquisition, visitation and reformation of the same Regiment and Court of Appeal was necessary: So we have united and agreed that we, Ferdinand, King of Hungary and Bohemia, Governor 2c., and the imperial orators and commissaries, instead of and on account of imperial majesty, also our hosts, lords and friends, Mr. Albrecht, Cardinal and Archbishop of Mainz and Magdeburg 2c., Mr. Ludwig, Count Palatine of the Rhine, Duke in Bavaria 2c., both Electors, our each a Council; and Mr. George, Bishop of Speier, and Mr. Hans, Duke in Bavaria, cousins, both Palatines 2c., of their own persons; our friend, Mr. William, Bishop of Strasbourg, Landgrave in Alsace, and Philip, Margrave of Baden 2c., each of them to appoint a council for such inquisition, visitation and reformation, all of whom will certainly appear here at Speier on the first day of June, and will have complete authority and command from us, the imperial governors and commissaries, as well as from princes, princes and estates, which we also give them here with this farewell, Both the Regiment and the Court of Appeal with the highest diligence of necessity on them now all here by us placed and handed over mandate to investigate, to visit, and to reform to the most diligent and best, according to their discretion, in persons and other defects and infirmities and to put in a good, useful order. But whoever among them refuses and resists such inquisition, visitation, and reformation, or is otherwise found or deemed unfit by them, to remove him or her, and to write to the Electors and Princes, as well as to the districts from which such removed persons would be taken, and to request that other suitable persons be presented in due time in the place of the same removed persons.

(29) The governor and the councillors of the regiment shall also appoint some skilful and prudent persons from the regiment and the Court of Appeal, and order them to draw up the rules of the Court of Appeal from all the decrees, to omit what is superfluous, and to put in order, establish, and rubricate in its place what has been improved. And when this has been done, then to the Cardinal and Archbishop of Mainz, Electors, as the Archchancellor, to inspect and measure the same, and by the same order have it printed and published in the realm, so that everyone may receive the knowledge.

(30) It is also considered good and decided, for highly mobile and brave reasons, and especially in view of the present time and events, that the Imperial Regiment and Court of Appeal shall remain here at Speier for the above-mentioned two years.

31. Item, as hitherto doubted by the jurists, whether a deceased brother's or sister's children should divide the inheritance of their father's or mother's brother's or sister's estate among themselves into the heads or tribes: and therefore in such doubts among the subjects of the Holy Roman Empire many disputes, repugnances and justifications may arise, to their subjects' not inconsiderable disadvantage and harm, and therefore the Roman Imperial Majesty, for the common good, has prevented such quarrels for future justification and the resulting mischief, with our, the Holy Roman Empire's, Electors, Princes and Estates' timely, preceding council, set and ordered: If a person dies intestate, and leaves no brother or sister after him, but his brothers' or sisters' children in unequal numbers, then those children of his brother or sister shall inherit into the heads, and not into the tribes, and shall so succeed to the deceased of their father or mother's brother or sister, and be admitted. And in order that further confusion and judicial quarrels may, as far as possible, be cut off, and that equality may be maintained in this respect throughout the Holy Roman Empire and among the members and subjects thereof, their Imperial Majesty has thereby cassified, abrogated and repealed all and every statute, special charter, custom, usage, ancient usage and liberties, which in some places were found to be contrary to their Imperial Charter, except in the above-mentioned case; but with the following moderation, viz: If in some places in the Holy Empire there has been a special statute, order, or custom that in the above-mentioned case the estate of the deceased shall be divided into the tribes, and not into the heads, by virtue of the now-mentioned statute, order, or custom, and in the same place an inheritance is now to fall, or between [and] the first day of the month of August, coming at the earliest, omitting the same day, by any person's death shall fall, the inheritance shall, after the expulsion of the same, be divided into the tribes, and not into the heads.

In such a case only, and between the first day of August now mentioned, without hindrance of such order of Her Imperial Majesty, the statutes, ordinances, or customs shall be divided. If, however, a case of inheritance in places and ends where no special statute, freedom, order, or custom has yet come to pass in the aforementioned case, or if it has not yet been adjudicated in the first and second or third instances, or if the division has not yet taken place, or if it has come to pass between then and the aforementioned first day of August, or if it will take place thereafter, the distribution and adjudication of the same case shall be governed by the above-mentioned imperial statute. 2c. That therefore we, also Princes, Princes, Prelates, Counts and Estates, unanimously united and agreed to live, comply with, keep and execute this Imperial Constitution and Statute in all its contents; also to proclaim and make known the same to all our subjects before the said first day of August, according to Her Majesty's command, so that each may know how to judge and keep himself according to it.

Item 32: When the imperial government, by virtue of an article in the proceedings of the Imperial Diet held at Worms, inspected the punitive court order, as a form was set up for the time, and has now handed it down to us, we have considered that this matter and order affects human honour, life and property. We have judged and considered that this matter and order affects the honor, life, limb, and property of man, and requires great, brave, and important counsel, and especially because the articles are many, item, the customs and conventions in many places are unequal, and that it should be a perpetual, permanent constitution and statute, and therefore not to be hurried, but to be undertaken with good forethought, sufficient experience, and timely counsel: Accordingly, we, also princes, rulers and estates, have deemed it necessary that each estate take a copy of the same letter, which will examine and assess the necessity, and that each of the six districts, from Our Lady's Day of Purification [2 Feb.Feb.], shall send two skilful, learned, understanding and experienced persons with their advice and discretion to Speier to the imperial government and order them all to submit to and compare with the government such court order, according to opportunity, and to publicize it later.

33 And after the imperial government, for the sake of the coinage, has set up a council on the order made here before at Esslingen, and has now presented the same council to us here. But because such a council is part of every estate

Since the necessity requires good consideration, we have agreed, as well as princes, lords, and estates, that each of us should take a copy of the same advice, consider that of his necessity, and each estate that has to coin should order its mintmaster or other coin experts to act and take advice on St. Jacob's Day at Speier to the imperial regiment for the settlement of a permanent coin in the holy realm. And in order that such an action may be the more fruitful and stately, princes, counts and others who have gold and silver shall first of all, in the meantime of such a day, be subject to the settlement of a permanent gold or silver purchase, and from such appointed day shall dispatch their envoys with full power, to unite with the said Imperial Government and the other envoys for the same gold and silver purchase, so that at least for some years a regular, constant, correct and true coinage may be established and maintained in the realm.

(34) Since the monopolies and large companies, a selfish and unpleasant action, are forbidden in the common imperial laws with heavy penalties and punishments, the imperial treasurer shall proceed and act seriously against the same, as is due in law, so that such is stopped and the common benefit is promoted.

35) And when, in the parting of the recently held Imperial Diet here at Speier, an article was placed to the effect that, by the order then made on behalf of the subjects, nothing shall be taken away or broken from the treaties and orders made by the Swabian Confederation on account of the Bavarian outrage, 2c., is once again our unanimous resolution, will and opinion that the same article, made for the sake of the subjects in the touched parting, shall be unbreakable for the treaties and orders made by the Swabian Confederation for the sake of the Bavarian outrage, and that no court shall act against the same confederate treaties.

36 Item, after Doctor Batt Weidmann, Hans Melchior, and Hans Heinrich von Morsheim, brothers; Anna von Hagen, Doctor Reinhard Tiels, about kaiserl. Fiscals, abandoned widow; count Bernhards von Eberstein son, count Christoffel von Tengen, doctor Jakobs von Landsburg, doctor Johann von Dockheim, called Fries; Augustin Lösch, Sebastian Schilling, doctor; Caspar Mar, imperial Fiscal, and master Hans Leser, for some outstanding pay, touching from the chamber court, requested, and for Entrich-

We have asked for the payment of the same. If we now deem it fair that each one pays his due wages, but at this time there is nothing available to satisfy them: therefore we have directed them to the old back-digit Chamber Court notices for their payment, and thereupon it is our opinion and order that the Imperial Fiscal shall proceed and act conduively for obtaining and issuing such old back-digit notices, for which purpose the Chamber Court shall also assist him. And what he thus produces shall be paid to the plaintiffs concerned by the collector for the payment of their debt.

37. Item: When at the beginning of this Imperial Diet some princes, prelates and other estates erred in the session and enquiry, which led to a prolongation of the realm's actions and affairs, so that princes, princes and estates, at our friendly request of the governor and commissioners, kept the Imperial Diet's session and enquiry harmless and without any order, We, by the authority of the Imperial Majesty, wish that each of the Princes, Princes, Prelates, and Estates shall not be prejudiced, harmed, or violated in any way in their customary use and justice by such a survey and session, which is not dangerous to this Imperial Diet, nor by the subscription made at the end of this parting.

Imperial Constitution and Statute, how brother's or sister's children of their father's brother or sister's deserted inheritance shall be divided among themselves.

We Carl the Fifth by the Grace of God, elected Roman Emperor, at all times Major of the Empire, in Germania, Hispania, both Sicily, Jerusalem, Hungary, Dalmatia, Croatia 2c. King, Archduke of Austria, Duke of Burgundy 2c., Count of Habsburg, Flanders and Tyrol 2c., to all and any princes, princes, ecclesiastical and secular, prelates, counts, freemen, lords, knights, servants, captains, governors, stewards, administrators, bailiffs, mayors, judges, courts, councillors, burgesses, municipalities, and otherwise to all other of our and the empire's subjects and faithful, in whatever dignity, state or being they are: As it has hitherto been doubted by the jurists whether the children of a deceased brother or sister should divide the inheritance of their father or mother's brother or sister among themselves into heads or tribes, and therefore in such doubt among our and the Holy Roman Empire's subjects and faithful they should be divided up into tribes.

The fact that we, as Roman Emperors, have graciously seen to it that such disputes, future justifications, and the resulting mischief are to be prevented, is for the common good: That we, as Roman Emperor, for the common good, have graciously seen to prevent such quarrels, future justification, and the resulting mischief, and with our and the Holy Empire's Princes, Princes, and Estates' timely, preceding counsel, have established and ordered it, as we also by Roman Imperial power hereby knowingly order and establish in the above-mentioned case, thus: If a person dies intestate, and leaves no brother or sister after him, but his brother's or sister's children in unequal numbers, that then these children of his brother or sister shall inherit into the heads, and not into the tribes, and shall be allowed to succeed the deceased of their father or mother's brother or sister in such manner. And so that further confusion and judicial quarrels may, as far as possible, be cut off, and equality in this respect be maintained throughout the Holy Roman Empire and among its members and subjects: We herewith, out of our imperial authority and right knowledge, want to condemn and abolish all and every statute, special statute, custom, old conventions and liberties, which in some places have been found contrary to our imperial statute, only in the above mentioned case, which we also herewith condemn, abolish and abolish, but with the following moderation: namely, whether in any place in the Holy Roman Empire there has hitherto been a special statute, ordinance, or custom that in the above-mentioned case the deceased's estate, and by virtue of the statute, ordinance, or custom now mentioned, should be divided into the tribes and not into the heads, and in the same place an inheritance should now come to pass, or between now and the first day of the month Augusti, the inheritance shall be divided according to the special statutes, ordinances, or customs of that place, only in such case, and between the first day of Augusti now named, without prejudice to this our ordinance. If, however, an inheritance in places and at ends where no special statute, freedom, order or custom now applies, has not yet been adjudicated in the first and second or third instance, 1) or the division has not yet taken place, or has fallen between then and the first day of August, or has lapsed thereafter, it shall be held with judgement and decision of the same case contents of this our imperial statute.

1) "geurtheit" set by us, according to § 31 of the Reichsabschied, instead of: "getheilt".

2. So that no one may be excused for ignorance of our imperial statutes in decisions, judgments, or otherwise: We herewith order the princes, prelates, counts, lords, estates and all other subjects of our and the empire's spiritual and secular state, who have some authority and subjects in fief or property from us and the empire, or in the empire, seriously to observe this imperial statute of ours, between now and the above-mentioned 1st day of August, for the benefit of everyone. That they publicly proclaim this imperial charter to the best of their ability to all their subjects, dependents, landsmen or backers, and if any of the authorities fail to publish and openly proclaim it between now and the first day of August, or fail to do so between then and thereafter, that nevertheless, on the above-mentioned first day of August, and thereafter, this imperial charter of ours will be considered publicized, opened, and proclaimed by all men, and will also be faithfully observed by all men, and that it will be complied with everywhere without any hindrance. In this you have our earnest opinion. Given in our and the Holy Roman Empire's city of Speier, on the 23rd day of April, after the birth of Christ in 1529, of our Roman Empire in the 10th year and of all others in the 13th year.

Constitution or mandate against the Anabaptists.

We Carl the Fifth by the Grace of God, elected Roman Emperor, at all times Major of the Empire, in Germania, Hispania, both Sicily, Jerusalem, Hungary, Dalmatia, Croatia 2c. King, Archduke of Austria, Duke of Burgundy 2c., Count of Habsburg, Flanders and Tyrol 2c., do to all and any princes, princes, ecclesiastical and secular, prelates, counts, freemen, lords, knights, servants, captains, bailiffs, governors, stewards, bailiffs, mayors, judges, courts, councils, citizens, municipalities, and otherwise to all other of our and the realm's subjects and faithful, in whatever dignity, station or nature they may be, our friendship, grace and all good.

(1) Reverend and honorable, highborn, dear friends, nephews, grandfathers, princes, well-born, noble, honorable, devout, and faithful! Although it is ordained and provided in common law that no one who has once been baptized some of them, and especially in imperial laws, to do so is punishable by death. Therefore, at the beginning of the next twenty-eighth year of the lesser number, we, as Roman Emperor, supreme bailiff and protector of our holy Christian faith, by our open mandate, earnestly command all of you, together and especially, to protect your subjects, relatives and dependents from the same insanity and sect of rebaptism that has recently arisen, and their unwilling, seductive and seditious followers, by your commandment, and otherwise in the pulpits by Christian, learned preachers, faithfully and earnestly to remind, admonish, reject and warn them of the penalties of justice in such a case, and especially of the great punishment of God which they have to expect. And against those who are thus declared, found, and entered into such vice and error of resurrection, to proceed with punishment and penance of the law, as is due against each one according to his fault, and therefore not to be tardy, so that such evil may be punished, and other mischief and further development, which otherwise arise from it, may occur and be prevented: We find daily, however, that beyond the common law, even our past mandate, such an old, condemned and forbidden sect of rebaptism, condemned many hundred years ago, is breaking in and getting out of hand the longer and the more troublesome. To prevent such evil and what may follow from it, to preserve peace and unity in the Holy Empire, and also to abolish all disputation and doubt that might follow the punishment of rebaptism: We therefore decree, decree, declare, and declare the foregoing imperial laws, as well as the mandate we have issued and proclaimed thereupon, by imperial authority, perfection, and right knowledge, that all and every rebaptizer and rebaptized person, male and female, of reasonable age, shall be judged and put to death by fire, sword, or the like, according to the occasion of the persons, without first being subjected to the inquisition of the ecclesiastical judges. And the same preachers, captains, countrymen, and seditious agitators of the touched vice of resurrection, even those who persist in it, and those who fall down another time, shall by no means be pardoned in this, but shall, by virtue of this our constitution and statute, be dealt with seriously with the punishment against them.

002 But which persons have their error for themselves?

(1) If any of them, either by themselves or through instruction and exhortation, immediately confess to recanting the same, and are willing to accept penance and punishment for it, and ask for mercy, they may be pardoned by their authorities, according to their station, character, youth, and all circumstances. We also desire that every man shall have his children baptized in youth, according to Christian order, custom, and usage. But those who despise this, and will not do it, as if infant baptism were nothing, shall, if they insist on it, be regarded as Anabaptists, and shall be subject to our Constitution. And none of those who are pardoned for the above-mentioned reasons shall be relegated and expelled to other places, but shall be confined and bound to remain under his authority, who shall then take diligent care that they do not fall away again.

(3) Likewise, no one shall contain, subdue, or deport another subject or relative who has departed from his authority for a declared reason, (2) but as soon as the authority under which the departed person is held becomes aware of such transfer, he shall take strict action against him who has thus departed, according to our statutes, and shall not suffer or tolerate him to do so, all with a penalty of eight. Hereupon we also command all and every one in particular, whatever his dignity, standing or nature, to avoid our severe disgrace and punishment, in the duties and oaths, so that you may be devoted and related to us and to the holy kingdom, and we want all of you, and each of you in particular, to keep such our constitution and statutes of reconstitution strictly, firmly, in all matters and points, to judge, to act, and to execute them negligently; You will also show such obedience in this as you are obliged to do, and the necessity of things for yourselves requires; of this, therefore, we will provide ourselves without doubt, and you will also do our part in this. Given in our and the Holy Empire's city of Speier, on the 23rd day of April, after the birth of Christ, 1529.

Given and done in the holy imperial city of Speier, on the 22nd day of April, after the birth of Christ, in the year 1529.

819 Luther's and Melanchthon's concern about Speier's farewell, drawn up on the prince's orders.

From Müller's "History of the Protestant Estates Protestation 2c. Wider den Reichs-Abschied zu Speier", lib. I, cup. 4, s. 15, r. 47, printed in the Leipzig Collection, vol. XXII, p. 24.

(1) First of all, it must be stated how great abuses of the clergy have been, as the Imperial Majesty himself well knows, and against which the Estates of the Empire complained at Worms, and His Majesty promised to abolish them; as Pope Adrian VI himself announced through his "Orator" at Nuremberg that all this evil had come from the abuses of the clergy, and promised to help change them.

002 But since such abuses were so much and so great, and were not changed by those who ought to do them justly, they began to fall from themselves everywhere in German lands, and the clergy to be despised for it; but when the unskilful scribes wished to defend and maintain such abuses in addition, and yet could not raise anything righteous, they made it worse, that the clergy were everywhere thought to be unlearned, unprofitable, even harmful.

People held, and their thing and defence mocked.

3. Such a falling away and perishing of the abuses was already the several part in the pregnancy, before Luther's teaching came; For all the world was tired of the clergy's abuses, and it was to be feared that, if Luther's teaching had not come to teach the people the faith of Christ and the obedience of the authorities, a miserable ruin would have arisen in the German land, for people no longer wanted to suffer the abuses, and wanted a change immediately; so the clergy would not give way or let up, that there would have been no resistance. It would have been a disorderly, tempestuous, dangerous mutation or change (as Muenzer also began it), if a consistent doctrine had not intervened, and without doubt the whole religion would have fallen and the Christians would have become pure Epicureans.

(4) Because such a change came about by force, which no one could resist, and the clergy stubbornly insisted on it and did not want to let up, my most gracious lord nevertheless did so much in the process that he could not nor did he know how to preserve the abuses, and had to suffer, as well as the clergy themselves, that they were despised and fell to the point that his C. F. Grace did not allow any unchristian doctrine to be torn down. For this his C. F. Gn. with a good conscience and with truth, that the cause and guilt of the fallen abuses and despised ecclesiastics on earth is no one but the ecclesiastics themselves, who, although they well knew that the estates of the realm at Worms were complaining about it, and no longer wished to suffer, nevertheless they defended the same with outrage and violence, by much tyranny and clumsy scribes, so that they made the people's displeasure the greater, and sought their own misfortune; This is certainly true, and all Germany knows that it is so.

(5) In such a desolate, wild state and fall of abuses, my most gracious lord has let happen and fall what fell there, and let it be kept for future improvement in H. F. G.'s country, which he meanwhile loves for Christian, as much as he always could, and because H. F. G.'s conscience knows no other way than to be Christian. conscience knows no other than that it is Christian.

If they are divinely ordered, they cannot in any way in good conscience reprove and condemn such things.

6th But now the Speierische Abschied demands that the estates of the realm should leave this doctrine, which H. F. Gnad considers Christian and has also experienced as comforting in this time: so it will not be in good conscience of His F. Gnad that they should grant the "above-mentioned" Abschied: firstly for the reason that H. F. Gnad would thereby act against H. F. Gnad's conscience and condemn the doctrine, which she recognizes as Christian and wholesome before God. conscience, and condemn the doctrine which they know to be Christian and wholesome in the sight of God.

007 Secondly, H. F. Gn. would make himself liable to all those who, according to his example, also condemned such doctrine against their conscience, and thus, over their own sin, complain of innumerable, cruel, foreign sins 2c.

008 Thirdly, neither hath the Lord's grace power to compel any man to raise up the abuses which are fallen, or to receive them, as the Lord's grace hath not been the author or cause of their beginning to fall, 2c. but it is upon every man's own conscience.

(9) Fourthly, it is not possible for H.F. Grace to grant beforehand, or to urge, that the abuses should be restored, for with this H.F. Grace confirmed the unpleasant complaint of the clergy, which was reported and complained of at Worms by the estates of the empire, and thus such H.F. Grace would finally advise against such complaint of the empire at Worms, and to the strength of the complaints of the clergy, which were not in the hands of the emperor. The Emperor's Majesty himself at that time was the only one to have the power to decide against the complaint of the imperial estates at Worms and to strengthen the grievances of the clergy. Majesty himself promised at that time to abolish the same and not to believe that H. F. Gnad. His Grace's opinion, to reestablish or maintain them.

(10) Fifth, that His Grace has not done anything unchristian, His Imperial Majesty can sense from the fact that the Estates of the Realm have not condemned this doctrine, but have put it on the Council, which they would not do if they considered it unchristian. Majesty can sense from this that the estates of the realm have not condemned this doctrine, but have pushed it onto the Council, which they would not do if they held it to be unchristian.

11. so that H. F. Grace, Imperial Majesty please that H. Imperial Majesty does not want to be burdened with such heavy things. Majesty does not want to burden S. F. Grace's conscience with such grave matters. Conscience, unheard matter, which is, however, due to such interrogations and hearings of S. Imperial Majesty. Majesty's interrogations and examinations.

The other estates of the empire also know about this, and because all estates of the empire are waiting for a council, and His Imperial Majesty has also put them off the same. Majesty has also put them off the same: so His Imperial Majesty wants to advise and help that the Majesty would advise and help that Christian peace be promoted in a just and orderly manner, and that the matter be condemned to interrogation, and not so unrecognized, which would be a violent and forced peace, and not a cordial and willing peace.

Hase äs uim parto, seit, ätz eoustzusu.

12) As for the other part, that S. F. G. should be obedient to the imperial majesty's commandment against the Anabaptists and Sacramentarians, this S. F. G. does willingly and justly, for S. F. G. neither has nor suffers any of the forbidden teachings in his F. G. lands, nor do they want to have or suffer them, and may S. F. G. well boast with God that such teachings are most powerfully resisted in S. F. G. lands, that, of course, nowhere else are they so strongly resisted. F. G. may well boast with God that such teachings are most powerfully resisted and increased in S. F. G.'s lands, that of course nowhere else is resisted so strongly, and perhaps no one could have resisted; as all the estates of the realm must well know and confess.

820 Instrumentum Appellations, objected by the protesting imperial estates at the Imperial Diet at Speier Anno 1529, April 25, 1529.

This document was printed soon after it was written. From a print in the Weimar archives reproduced in Müller's Historie, eup. 5, p. 52, and thereafter in Lünig's kpid. ewiek. p. 777

In the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, Amen. And after the birth of our dear Lord and Saviour, a thousand five hundred, and in the ninth and twentieth year, in the other Roman number, called Indiction, in the reign of the most noble, most powerful prince and lord, Mr. Caroli the V., elected Roman emperor, at all times ruler of the empire in Germania, Hispania, both Sicily, Jerusalem, Hungary. , elected Roman Emperor, at all times Major of the Empire, in Germania, in Hispania, both Sicilies, Jerusalem, Hungary, Dalmatia, Croatia 2c. King; Archduke of Austria, and Duke of Burgundy 2c., of our most gracious Lord, and at the Imperial Diet, which was proclaimed in the name of their Imperial Majesty against Speier, on Sunday after Reminiscere, in the early part of the year, are the most illustrious, high-born Princes and Lords, Mr. Johannsen, Dukes of Saxony and Electors 2c., Mr. Georgen, Margraves of Brandenburg 2c., Mr. Ernten, Dukes of Brunswick and Lüneburg, Mr. Philippsen, Landgraves of Hesse 2c., and Wolfgang, Princes of Anhalt 2c., of our most gracious and gracious lords decreed councillors and commanders, on Sunday Cantate, which was the 25th day of the month Aprilis, in the worthy Mr. Petern Mutterstats, Caplans in the Sanct Johanniskirche there at Speier, dwelling, in now reported St. Johannesgasse, down in a small room, have been gathered together: who, in place of their electoral graces, have hereafter summoned both of us written notaries and witnesses before and to them, and with the presentation of a document, written on several sheets of paper, have told how many excellent and noticeable burdens their electoral and princely graces have suffered, also all of theirs, who now and in the future are related to the preaching of divine word and truth, and with the abolition of ungodly customs, and the re-establishment of Christian ceremonies, would have encountered at the indicated Imperial Diet. Therefore, and on account of such complaints and causes, which their electoral and princely graces have had brought in the touched document, which the aforementioned councils currently have in their hands, their electoral and princely graces are highly and unavoidably urged to appeal from the same actions and the supposed new departure (as noticeably aggrieved) to the highly thought of Roman imperial majesty and a free, Christian concilium 2c. to appeal, as they should and want to do herewith in the best, most constant and strongest way, form and shape, as their Electoral and Princely Graces should and want to do by right and equity, before us aforementioned Notaries and Witnesses (since their Electoral and Princely Graces before and in the presence of Royal Serenity, Imperial Majesty Orators and Commissaries, also of the other princes, princes and estates of the realm, for causes which should be deduced at the appropriate, convenient time, so much need, that the same at present could not nor would not do so), have also requested, requisitioned and desired such of their electoral and princely graces appeal, letter of apostle and farewell, together with lawful appendix and adherence. With reservation, condition and protestation to reduce and increase such their given appeal, also to do and undertake everything else that would be necessary for their electoral and F. G. necessity. And after such report and account, the above-mentioned counsels of their Elector and F. G. have decreed the same appeal, drawn up on several sheets of paper (as touched upon above), delivered and served to us two Notaries, which, from word to word, follows hereafter:

Appellation.

Since in all the rights described above the means of appeal and remedy for the stay of those who have been complained of, or fear to be complained of in the future, is suspended, and is due to every one, it is also exempted to such an extent that it shall not be resisted by any authority, nor shall it be proceeded against, or acted contrary to, nor attested to.

Therefore in will and opinion, on account of some much high, brave and important complaints, which we, by the grace of God, Johannsen, Duke of Saxony, Archmarshall and Elector of the Holy Roman Empire, Landgrave in Thuringia and Margrave of Meissen, Georgen, Margrave of Brandenburg, of Stettin, Pomerania, of the Cassuben and Wenden 2c. Dukes, Burgraves of Nuremberg, and Princes of Rügen on Oderburg 2c.. Ernsten and Franciscen, brothers, Dukes of Brunswick and Lüneburg; Philippsen, Landgraves of Hesse, Counts of Katzenelnbogen, of Dietz, Ziegenhain and Nidde, and Wolfgangsen, Princes of Anhalt, Counts of Ascanien, and Lords of Bernburg, in general and in particular, and our Christian subjects, also in general all those who now and in the future are related to the holy Word of God, at this Imperial Diet, which is taking place in the 29th year of the few number, at this time. The following is a list of those who have met and conceded at Speier in the 29th year of the present Reichstag, by and against the most illustrious, great, venerable, high-born, well-born, noble and worthy Lord Ferdinand, King of Hungary and Bohemia, and Roman Imperial Majesty, our most gracious Lord, Governor of the Empire of the German Nation, Prince and Prince in Hispania, Archduke of Austria 2c., our special dear lord, uncle and gracious lord, together with the most reverend Roman imperial majesty orators and decreed commissioners, also princes, princes and estates, who have been assembled at this imperial diet at Speier (of whom all dear ones and others' names we hereby wish to have expressed and named in advance) to appeal, provoke and summon, also to do everything and anything else that the rights in the case give us and permit:

We publicly protest and condition at the outset before God and men, to whom this appeal and calling is to be read or heard, that our will, mind, and opinion is not otherwise, nor is it, but only the honor of our people.

To seek the salvation of God Almighty, of His holy Word, and of our souls, even of men, and to do nothing else by it, except what conscience shows and teaches us, and that which we owe to do before God Almighty, but male disparagement, reproach, or contempt, and do justly,

For since the laws, from the fact that nature has wrought a more natural relationship between all men, permit that one should take care of the other, who is condemned to temporal death, even without authority, and should appeal to him on his behalf and do his best: How much more are we, as members of a spiritual body of the Son of God, our Saviour JEsu Christ, and spiritual children and siblings of one of our spiritual and heavenly Father, entitled, due, and fitting to do the same in such a highly important matter, for the prevention of our and our neighbor's eternal judgment, and for the enjoyment and use of this legal protection of ours 1) by our neighbors. And we say to the above-mentioned Royal Serene Highness and Imperial Majesty, Orator and Commissaries, also to the Princes, Princes and the others of the Estates, that they are aware of the noticeable and courageous complaints made by us and ours on our behalf, almost from the beginning of this present Speier Diet to the end, that it has been subjected to, as also (although with the deed alone) happened, the parting, which was decided unanimously at the previous Imperial Diet, for the preservation of peace and unity in the empire in the middle time of the future Concilii or National Assembly, out of many constant and high concerns all here at Speier in the next 26th year. The Council of Europe has unanimously decided, carried out and established, as far as the article of the pending discord in our holy religion is concerned, to change it, even to abolish it completely, and to conclude on several articles and points, so that, if we were in agreement, we would be against the Christian, divine and evangelical doctrine, divine and evangelical doctrine, which we preach and have preached in our principalities, lands, dominions and territories, according to the holy divine Scriptures, and which we recognize and undoubtedly also firmly believe to be God's word and truth, we would be acting, confessing and doing in principle ourselves; Which aforementioned complaints we have presented in writings, also publicly read out, and subsequently had answered to the imperial acts and deeds, and to the following content thereafter:

Domini [12 April 1529].

1st Most worthy, reverend, high-born, venerable, well-born and noble, dear lords, grandparents, cousins, friends and special ones! Your love and you bear in good remembrance, without doubt, how at the beginning of this Imperial Diet, as Roman. Imperial Majesty, our most gracious Lord, 1) and a document in the form of her Imperial Majesty's Instruction, 2) presented and read to us and all the Estates, that for this reason it has been unanimously deemed necessary and good by your love, us and the said Estates, to decree and establish a committee for the furtherance of the affairs, which committee shall deal with the article touching the discord in our holy faith, 3) should first take it in hand, consider it, and talk about how peace and unity between the estates in the empire could be preserved in the meantime of a conciliation, but to the extent that the first one, namely the help of the Turks, is concerned, as your love, we and other estates, are all well aware of it.

2. So also your beloved, and you others, who besides some of us have been appointed to the committee, know that in the same committee it has been especially considered and held for this: If a measure is not made of the first article mentioned, concerning the discord, that without it peace and unity in the realm would hardly be preserved, that it would also be difficult for the estates of all parts to consent or agree to some help or other, which touches the other two articles written in the instruction, unless each one knew beforehand how he would sit with his neighbor, and how he would have peace with the same; And that therefore the common resolution was in the committee, while it was spoken, and the Instruction also made some report of it, as if the next agreement drawn up here at Speier had been led into a misunderstanding, that on account of such misunderstanding a mitigation and explanation should be made, and understood.

3rd Now we would have completely and undoubtedly provided, touched actions would therefore be to indicated goal (namely, to preserve

- 2) Document No. 816.
- 3) "the other," that is, as the second.

We have found that the articles of peace and unity, in the middle time of the Council, and on the other hand by way of mitigation or explanation, since misunderstanding would have occurred in the next parting, have been judged and promoted in committee, and subsequently by your love and the others, as the estates of the realm; But we have hereafter found that your love and some others of the estates, on such articles as have been brought into a term and now for the second time read to the estates, about all that has been indicated by some of us from the first in the committee and hereafter among the estates to noticeable and unpleasant complaint and inconvenience of this part, as far as the substance of the same is concerned, we think to persevere, notwithstanding that such articles, partly for the aforesaid reasons, are not useful for the preservation of the peace and unity in the realm, and partly also, where otherwise not all, are not a declaration of the next parting made here at Speier, but rather a complete annulment and abrogation of the same.

(4) And although we know that in all this, in order that we may keep ourselves out of due and obligatory obedience to the late, and present, Roman Imperial Majesty, or what we owe to her Imperial Majesty, we shall not be held responsible for the consequences of our actions. Majesty 2c. to keep, or what we have done to her kais. Majesty, as well as the honors, welfare and best of the realm, that we have always done so with completely faithful, willing and ready subservience, so that we know how to precede no one in the special things, even without male diminishment; as we then, to our end and pit, by the grace of God, in all things due and possible to the Roman Imperial Majesty, our most gracious lord, our most gracious lord, our most gracious lord, our most gracious lord, our most gracious lord, our most gracious lord, our most gracious lord, our most gracious lord, our most gracious lord, our most gracious lord, our most gracious lord, our most gracious lord, our most gracious lord, our most gracious lord, our most gracious Lord, body and estate unsaved, obediently and willingly, and also towards your beloved, as our dear lords and friends, kindly, and graciously to the other estates, willingly and inclined, so these things, as your beloved and you others know, concern and affect God's honor and our souls' salvation and happiness, in which we, for the sake of our consciences, are obligated to regard God above all, that we are completely undoubted, Your beloved and you (as we have also kindly asked, and have graciously and favorably willed) will know ourselves to have apologized to you for not having agreed with your beloved and you, for the sake of the above-mentioned articles, nor for the sake of the majorities, as has several times been the case at this Imperial Diet, to the effect that we, for many brave and moving reasons, may not be guilty of the same.

(5) And that your beloved, and you others, may hear our complaints once more and actually, it is not to be denied that for the sake of doctrine there has been a discord in our Christian religion in many articles for some time; but whence the same arises, we wish to have placed before the judgment of God, to whom all things are knowable, at this time; for only that at the Imperial Diet held at Nuremberg, in the advertisements made at that time by the papal legate, there was a notice of this, which we leave at this time.

6. And although all kinds of ways have been considered and pondered, in the end it has been unanimously agreed that it would not be more convenient to find a measure for the matter on all sides than to make and write out a common, free, Christian council; and this we kindly and in good opinion now indicate, that your beloved and you others, also masculinely, are to take from it, and to remember yourselves, since a part's distance or condemnation of the doctrine, which he leads as Christian and lets lead in fine lands and territories, before such a concilio, might have been considered convenient, tolerable, useful or good, that by princes, lords and estates, together with imperial majesty, every time decreed by the emperor, a concilium should be held. Majesty's orators and commissioners, had not so often been spoken of and acted upon at the previous Imperial Diet.

(7) That on this part, according to the opinion and content of the points, so the discord and peace article half now put, such distance and condemnation meet us and want to be imposed silently, is to be heard from the following statement:

(8) For the entrance understands this opinion, as if princes, princes, and estates had resolved on such a parting, in which resolution we stand like your love and you, and must be meant, as namely, that those who remained with the imperial edict at Worms until now, should and would now also remain with the same until the future Concilio, and hold their subjects to it.

009 Now in the sight of God, for the sake of our consciences, it would be very grievous to us that any one, of high or low estate, should be separated by our joint resolution from the doctrine which we hold to be divine and Christian, and be arrested upon the edict which has been drawn up.

010 Though it be true that it is not ours to plead, neither are we at all inclined to do so, as, out of the said our concurrence, every one of you, according to your love and yourselves the edict or otherwise, for themselves or with their own. For after the doctrine, wherefore now the disagreement is, in many things against each other, should we be of the opinion with conclusive, then it will be done, and to be laid to our charge, also against our own conscience, to be true, either that we now already judge the doctrine, which we regard as Christian, to be unjust, as then the same from the next following point in these words: 1) "and yet among the other estates, among whom the other doctrine has arisen, and in part cannot be averted without noticeable turmoil, complaint, and danger 2c." from the absurdity of such words; or else we must silently admit and confess that they are rightly founded on both sides, and therefore are not necessary articles or points in the faith, which we do not know how to do at this time (we shall be instructed otherwise in a future Concilio with Scripture).

(11) Thus it would have been such and much more grievous, for the sake of the point touching the mass, for we are in no doubt, your beloved, and you, have heard before this time to the necessity, in what manner our preachers have supremely challenged and laid down the masses, as they have been used and kept for some time, with divine holy scripture. Should we now fall into such a concept, as it is conceived in the case of the masses mentioned, 2) it might be understood differently, as if we were now again opposed to the doctrine mentioned, which we hold to be Christian and constant, and wanted to judge it to be unjust, which, after all, through the bestowal of God's grace, is not at all our mind, nor can it be done with conscience.

012 But that by your love, and you others, the masses mentioned, as they have been kept and used for some time, are meant, and that the term must be understood of them also, we have easily to infer from the fact that the term mentioned is directed to the other, when the other doctrine (as it is called) arose.

13. And yet it is not unreasonably strange to us that your love, and you, have undertaken to put us and others to this doctrine in the measure of our subjects, which your love and you, in return, would not willingly (nor, we respect it, not at all) suffer for theirs, even if we had provided for it, we should not have been considered unfairly in this, nor should we be considered again, as perhaps your love, and you, in their sovereignties, among their subjects, only on account of the descendants of the people.

1) See Document No. 817, § 6.

2) "geyellen" - to consent.

Walch:

To permit the use of both masses, namely the sacrificial and the Christian supper masses, makes it more difficult for us, for the sake of Christ our Saviour's revealed institution, to permit his mass and supper, something which is contrary to this divine institution and which may be based only on custom and the laws of men.

14. Since the doctrine in our part of the world is so founded on divine Scripture that it has been Christian for some time, and the Scriptures have been publicly opposed to such masses, and such articles and doctrines are, for the sake of the piece, not the least thing to be acted upon in a future Christian council: We would not have provided (in view of the fact that the invitation to this Imperial Diet was issued in the name of the Emperor's Majesty, and that the instruction read does not mention this or any other such article) that our previous notice should have been so insisted upon.

15. Although we may publicly preach and hold in our countries and principalities, on account of the sacrament of the body and blood of our Lord and Saviour JEsu Christ, there is no need to make a wide announcement of this: Nevertheless, we know (as we have been told before) that for many reasons it is not convenient or tolerable that for the sake of doctrine (if such a decree, as the term implies, is now made at this Imperial Diet), and especially because His Imperial Majesty's decree does not require anything to be done about it. It is easy to consider that, for the sake of doctrine (if such a decree is now being made at this Imperial Diet, as is possible), and especially because His Majesty's decree does not report anything about it, nor have those who are concerned with this matter been required or questioned for this reason; it is easy to consider to what advantage this may be interpreted by all of us, because it has been made unheard and outside the future Council (we do not want to mention any other inaccuracies that may occur because of this).

16. But that also the much reported concept did not want to serve the preservation of peace and unity in the empire in the meantime of the Concilii, is to be taken from this clearly, because the touched concept is able in the first point, that those, who until then stayed with the edict of imperial majesty, now also want to stay with it and no difference would be made how far and whether such obligation should extend to the penalty of the drawn edict or not, should and want to remain so, and no difference would be made how far and whether such obligation shall extend to the penalty of the drawn edict or not, as it cannot be heard otherwise because of the common words, so that the article is written.

017 Forasmuch then as our several ecclesiastics of other sovereignties are ready to keep the said edict.

(after it would not be held by them as they suppose according to the edict) that they subjected themselves and about the next Speier farewell to let them restrain and withhold their pensions and interests: So it is to be considered what would be subjected to the same pretence, which would serve little or nothing for the preservation of peace and unity; which, however, is prevented by the next decree made here at Speier, so that no one is allowed to carry out such or the like oft-reported edicts, because the penalty of the same is "that every authority should live and govern with its subjects in the meantime of the Council, in matters concerning the edict, in such a way as it trusts to do so towards God and the Imperial Majesty. Majesty", has been suspended.

18. From this it is clear to hear that the next parting is more conducive to peace and unity (as it has also been considered to be, by virtue of the Instruction issued to the Roman Emperor's Majesty next to it, by Princes, Princes and Estates), for, as indicated above, this has not remained about the next parting, since it was not due at all, for the sake of our clergy: What do we want now, if the parting is to be judged on the opinion of the term, and we are to be obliged on this part, in the indicated matters, touching the edict, to keep it in such a way, as we do such against God the Most High and in his court, also here in time against Roman. Kais. Majesty, as our ordinary temporal sovereignty. Which also, as now indicated, are not such words as will be passed on in the next parting, thereby being permitted to everyone (as will be spoken by some, to whom the matter is higher, than indeed the necessity is always to the mind), in the meantime of a council to do and carry out everything according to his own discretion or liking, whoever therefore abuses and acts against the next Speier farewell with indicated withholding of the interest, we ourselves give to your love and you others to consider.

19) Item, it is also to be noted from this sufficiently, where the much touched words: "that there is every authority in the meantime of the Concilii, in matters concerning the Edict" 2c. should now be left out, and in the same place such words, as stand in the present term, namely: "And but with the other estates" 1) 2c., should be placed, that such

The parting made would not be a declaration, but a complete annulment of the substance of the next parting, as far as the discord is concerned, in which we are to be granted, since the next parting by Imperial Majesty's governors and commissioners, by virtue of Imperial Majesty's power and authority, is also unanimous. Majesty's Governors and Commissioners, by virtue of Imperial Majesty's power and authority, and also the Princes, Princes and Estates unanimously, as the letter clearly states, with the obligation to keep the same firmly and unbreakably, and also not to do anything contrary thereto, or to carry it out, or to let it go out, granted, and fastened with signets, will not be unreasonably highly burdensome.

220 And moreover, that we are not afraid to give answer, where it shall be laid upon us, as if the next parting of us should have been drawn into a misconception, and thereby abused: yet we cannot judge, even in ourselves, that the necessity is, or requireth, for the sake of the attracted misconception, to do this now reported annulment of the next parting. For although we have no knowledge of what form such a farewell should have taken to a cover of new doctrines since then: so shall, in our discretion, the same have been mitigated for the time being by such a declaration as is in part set forth in and upon the opinion of our delivered article, which we now wish to have sent and delivered to your love, and to you others, once more to consider, 1) in that the authorities in their superintendencies, and that henceforth further innovations or sects of faith should, as much as humanly possible, be prevented, and that providence should be opposed to them, and that there should be no need whatsoever to rescind the next parting for this reason as touched.

(21) Since we are then also confident of the Roman Imperial Majesty, our most gracious Lord, without doubt and in full, that Her Imperial Majesty is aware of the things as they are now partly told by us. Majesty of the things, as they have now been partly told by us and otherwise further reported, moreover that her Majesty's The Imperial Council, which is newer and more recent on the date, together with the imperial power. 2) which was presented at the beginning of this Imperial Diet by her Majesty's governors and commissioners, our special dear and gracious lords and friends, your dear ones, to us and to all the estates, as we do not know any other way, clearly bring that it should be talked about, acted upon and judged how peace and unity may be preserved in the realm; whereupon also your love, we and the others of the estates, have taken all action, as far as the said peace is concerned; For if it had been the opinion that it might have been considered useful, good or more convenient to leave it at the read instruction of the article half, then such consultation and consideration would not have been necessary at all, the High Roman Imperial Majesty would not have been moved at all to what the read instruction of the article half is able to do.

22. And after all this, to your love, and to you others, as our dear lords, cousins, grandparents, friends, and special ones, is our friendly request and favorable and gracious intention, that the same, and you, take again the opportunity of the things to mind, and the same together with the above-mentioned and the like of our complaints, which we have in the aforementioned points and articles in the adopted agreement, and especially set ourselves on the way that it remains with the next agreement, as the same was unanimously approved, decided, accepted and executed at that time; or on opinion, as your love and you have understood before and have to hear further from this our writing, kindly and good-willingly dismiss, and settle with that, as if your love, and you others, should have the more 3) touched next allhie from imperial. Majesty, made for the sake of your love and all of us, as we do not know, nor in our opinion are we obligated, to grant this action, which affects the conscience and the salvation of souls, for the reasons indicated and others, and beforehand according to form and opportunity.

223 For as to the other articles which have been considered and understood concerning Anabaptists, preachers, and pressures, and the like, for the sake of peace, and also concerning the other two principal articles, we desire and hope to compare ourselves with your love, and with the rest of you, in such a manner, that in none of them, which shall be of benefit, welfare, and good, and especially of peace, to common Christendom and the kingdom of the German nation, shall we be found wanting in equity.

224 All which your love, and you, to our great need and equity, deign also kindly and good-willingly to observe therein.

3) "The more," that is, the majority.

We are inclined to earn your love with special, friendly diligence in all ways, and to recognize you in favor, graces, and all good. And we kindly request and favourably desire your love and your other's immediate, friendly and fruitful answer, and therefore, according to our need, let us further 1) be heard.

25. Although we would have provided ourselves to princes, princes, and estates in a most unwarranted manner, they would have taken our important and significant complaints into consideration, and that no one would have made an unobjectionable, reasonable, and Christian change in the matter, if it were against his conscience, and if it were to be imposed outside, even before a future common and free Christian concilio or national assembly: Their loved ones and they have insisted on their intention, only that the committee which their loved ones and they had appointed for this purpose has subsequently indicated to us how their loved ones and they consider that the articles of Royal Serene Highness, as Imperial Majesty's governor, and of the Holy Roman Emperor, are to be rescinded. Majesty's governor, and her Majesty's appointed orators and commissioners, should be presented, whether her Serene Highness and dear ones might find means for a convenient settlement; which we, and that royal Highness together with the orators and commissioners acted thereon for a convenient settlement, neither displeased nor resented, in friendly confidence that such action would be conducive and prompt and would have been taken.

(26) Nevertheless, and beyond the fact that it was not the opinion at the beginning of this Imperial Diet, the other articles, as expressed in the document which was read and presented in the form of an Imperial Instruction at the beginning of this Imperial Diet, have been proceeded with. Since, however, after several days nothing was announced to us by Royal Serenity and Imperial Majesty's Orators and Commissars as to whether and when we should wait for further action, as mentioned above, we have at the very least twice petitioned Royal Serenity through some of our own to have it proposed and reminded. But when we, by virtue of the aforementioned farewell, which we took with the appointed committee, princes, princes and estates, have provided ourselves with further negotiation and discussion, Royal Serene Highness, together with the orator and commissioners, have on Mondays

1) Here "have" is erased from us.

after Jubilate fifteenth of April, next variously, before princes, princes and all estates, outside and without all further negotiation, also without regard to all our above-mentioned highly urgent complaints, have their opinion publicly read out of a document, without doubt of the opinion, as if their royal Serene Highness and dear ones thereby wanted to have announced and given us a final decision, as hereafter follows:

The alleged decision which His Royal Serene Highness, Imperial Majesty's Orator and Commissaries, had publicly read in the Assembly of the Imperial Estates on April 19.

[illegible]

(2) And although in such a document presented to the said princes and princes and the other estates the three articles, the said imperial governor, orator, and commissarii have been presented for the fulfillment of their duties. The three articles have been presented by the said Imperial Governor, Orator and Commissarii, for the fulfillment and satisfaction of the said Imperial Majesty, our most gracious Lord. Majesty, our most gracious Lord, will and opinion, would be well-founded and sufficient plea: so consider the Imperial Governor, Orator and Commissarii. The Imperial Governors, Orators and Commissars, that Princes and Princes, also other estates of the Holy Roman Empire, and of the other absent 2) embassies, on such their presentation, the articles understood one after the other, according to the timely council held, on account of the occasion of the present lurking and time, according to their highest understanding, to praise and honor God Almighty, and to the said Imperial Majesty for the most submissive obedience, and first of all for the preservation of our Christian faith, also peace and unity in the Holy Empire, have Christianly, reasonably, wisely and well put and written, which also confidently, and especially to those who are without God and the Holy Spirit, have been the most important of all.

2) "Absent" put by us instead of: "Present".

have the imperial majesty before their eyes, understood for it, and would not act contrary to it.

(3) And accordingly the said Imperial Governors, Orator and Commissarii, accept the concept of the three articles of their part. 3. And the said Imperial Governors, Orator and Commissarii, accept by all means the notion of the three Articles of their part given to them by the same Princes and Princes, also the other Estates, accept also in the name of the said Imperial Majesty and for themselves the same Articles, want to have such, content of their power, in place of the said Imperial Majesty, also for themselves, that they are thus brought in the proper form of a farewell, hereby granted; and say from the said Imperial Majesty, also for their own sake, to the same Princes and Princes, and to the other Estates and Messages, their Christian, faithful, and loyal support. Majesty, also on her own account, to the same Princes and Princes, and to the other estates and embassies, for their Christian, faithful, and diligent actions, but, rather, diligent, friendly, and gracious thanks, and wish to praise all of this to Imperial Majesty, who is the only one who has the right to do so. Majesty, who would undoubtedly recognize this with grace towards all the estates, and they, the imperial governors, orator and commissary, would be pleased. They, the imperial governors, orators and commissaries, will also kindly and graciously owe this to themselves.

The same governors, orators, and commissioners have heard the writing that the Elector of Saxony 2c., Margrave George of Brandenburg 2c., Landgrave of Hesse 2c., Prince of Anhalt, and the Chancellor of Lüneburg have handed over to the common imperial assembly against the first article, concerning our Christian faith, and let this writing remain in its value. For since such a document was presented and read to the large committee, then to the Electors and Princes, and to the other estates of the Holy Roman Empire, and since the common assembly, according to the old and laudable custom and usage, and also according to their conscience and conscience, decided on it in the article concerning the faith, which rather was done with their votes, and since they, the imperial governors, orators, and commissars of the Holy Roman Empire, have not yet decided on the matter, they have not yet decided on the matter. The Imperial Governors, Orators, and Commissaries, on their authority, in the place of the most illustrious Imperial Majesty, have also accepted for themselves, as members of the Holy Roman Empire, such an article (as above). The said Elector of Saxony and the other princes and embassies, reported above, who have hitherto sought objection in the resolution of the article indicated, will, reported above, take leave of it, nor refuse that not only (as above) by much the more part of the princes and princes, also other estates of the realm, according to old laudable usage, have acted honestly, properly and as befits, at this imperial diet.

and proceeded; but that also the imperial governors, orators and commissarii have not brought forward and acted otherwise. But that also the imperial governors, orators and commissioners have not brought forward and acted anything else, nor do they continue to do, act, approve and decide, except that they, in virtue of their above-mentioned authority, have good reason, power and right, and know how to answer well and sufficiently against the said imperial majesty. Accordingly, the imperial governors, orators and commissioners, princes and princes, and the other estates of the empire have not wished to act in a friendly and gracious manner in response to this document.

5th And when we did not provide ourselves with the same, and therefore escaped to a short conversation with each other, and did not at all suppose that their Royal Highnesses and Commissaries would not have tarried a little while with the said Orator and Commissaries, so that we could have held a short conversation and again presented our need to their Royal Highnesses and Lords, also Princes, Princes and Estates: yet their Royal Highnesses and much-reported Orators and Commissaries are still not satisfied. However, their royal highnesses and much-reported orators and commissioners, our unexpected, have risen, and from the assembly of the kingdom's estates, have suddenly departed from the house. Although we have also asked their Royal Highnesses and Lords most kindly, through some of our counsellors whom we have sent to their Highnesses and Lords, to be unburdened, next to Princes, Princes and Estates, to hear again our need for the read lecture, their Highnesses and Lords did not want to give it to the Orator and Commissars, but the answer fell to ours that the articles had been decided 2c. Are therefore against the supposed decision, which was taken by the above-mentioned estates by virtue of a presumed and yet quite unofficial, insignificant and non-binding majority, and what with royal highness, also of the orator and commissioners, the above-mentioned read opinion and answer to it further took place, to publicly protest before princes, princes and estates, and to hand over the same in writs; which protestation of harmless content follows hereafter expressed:

Protestation before Electors, Princes, and Estates, publicly read and delivered to the species of the realm.

1. your dears, and you dear cousins, grandparents, friends and others, know what complaints we have made orally and in writing during the past days of this Imperial Diet against several points in the article on the preservation of peace and the protection of the people.

Conciliation, on account of the pending discord of religion in the realm, meanwhile of the Concilii, have had presented, and although we, considering that we have indicated NOTHING, but what our conscience for God's honor, praise and sanctification of his name, also of said peace and conciliation on account of the highest unavoidable need in the realm, the highest unavoidable necessity would have provided us, your love, and you others, would have made the ways, that we could have compared ourselves with your love and you others for explanation of the next Speierian farewell, where the same should have been abused by unequal understanding, with good conscience and without burden; so that the reported next farewell would otherwise remain in esse and its substance, as it had been decided unanimously before; As then also we Duke John, Elector of Saxony, at the proposal of the great committee, have conceived and thereupon again delivered to the reported committee a different opinion, concerning the claimed abuse and preservation of the reported peace, and let it be handed over to your love and you next elsewhere, in the confidence that the same concept would have been considered and accepted by your love and you for an equal and different explanation.

2. 1) But because we have found that your love and you seem to persist in their intention, and because of the brave causes and complaints which we have now and everywhere again raised and renewed, both of us want to do so because of our consciences, also that such of your love, and your, nobility, on account of the above-mentioned pending discord, for the preservation of peace and unity, in the meantime of the Concilii, does not in any way want to comply, nor to do, that we should heal or consent to it; To that, that we, after the form of the bargain, and before about the above touched next Speier farewell, the same are not obligated, especially without our consent, from reported next allhie at Speier made and sealed farewell, by reason of the hereafter described strong binding clauses and words, so at the end of the same farewell are written, namely: 2) "Thereupon we, Ferdinand, Prince and Infant in Hispania, do speak and promise" 2c., "And we Princes, Princes, Prelates, Counts.

1) This paragraph was included by Elector John and Landgrave Philip of Hesse in their letter, by which they made the protestation known in their lands. See Document No. 822, § 3.

2) Towards the end of the 818th Documents, U 4 and 5.

and gentlemen" 2c.: We therefore consider that, for the sake of the much-touched grievance, our high and unavoidable necessity requires us to publicly protest against your love and yours, as null and powerless on account of the reported next parting, and to publicly protest our, and also ours and our men's, unallied undertakings, as we also do herewith at present, and that, for the aforementioned reasons, we do not know, cannot nor may heal, but consider the report of your love and your intention to be null and unallied, and you, and nevertheless wish to keep, live and govern ourselves in the matters of religion, in the meantime in the aforementioned common and free Christian Concilii or National Assembly, by means of divine help, by virtue of and in accordance with the much touched next Speierian farewell, in our sovereignties, also with and with our subjects and relatives, in such a way as we have done in the face of God, the Almighty, and the Roman Emperor, the Holy Roman Emperor and the Holy Roman Emperor. Imperial Majesty, our most gracious Lord. What also concerns the ecclesiastical interest, rent, validity and tithe, and the peace, and is written and expressed in the much reported next Speierische Abschied, we also want to show and keep ourselves in all ways unobjectionable. Thus, as far as the following points are concerned, such as the reopening and the printing, as we are all understood at this Imperial Diet, we want to be in agreement with your love and you, and know how to keep to the contents of the same points in all respects.

3. And after all this, to your love and to you is our friendly request and gracious intention that you note this protest of ours for our unavoidable necessity, and that you remember it, and especially that you be mindful of where such an opinion, as your love and you have made, is to be placed at the end of this Imperial Diet, as we have not provided for it at all, so that the content of our protest as indicated may be included and placed next to you; and are caused to submit our present protestation, together with our complaints, which we have submitted in writings against such article, to the Imperial Majesty, and also to have it otherwise publicly issued, so that men may have and receive knowledge that we and why in such opinion have not been resolved, but have publicly protested against it before your love and you; we also reserve the right to further extend our complaints and protestations, and to let us hear of the same against your love, and you others, also otherwise for our need.

004 All this your love and you others desire in the best, and as reported, to our great need, and not otherwise understood: we are kindly deserving of your love, and inclined to recognize towards you others with favorable and gracious will.

5. And that the Royal Serene Highness together with the Orator and Commissars, also Princes, Princes and Estates, may be reminded of our complaints once again and in abundance, whether their Royal Serene Highness and dear ones, also Princes, Princes and Estates of the Realm, would have wanted to be softened and moved once again to consider the matters further and to that end, so that we on all sides may come to a fair and unencumbered settlement of the conflict that has occurred: So we, the above-mentioned, have had our complaints, with further necessary extension and attached protestation, drawn up and put in writing, and have dispatched some of our counsellors to present them in writing to Royal Serene Highness, and to the much-affected Orator and Commissars; as then happened. But the same our deputies have reported to us on their return, although Royal Serene Highness indicated that she had taken our necessity, written in writings, in the first instance into her Serene Highness's hands: so she would not have wanted to send it to them again, and to keep it for the indicated further approving movement with her Serene Highness and the Orator and Commissars. Also, since ours complained to take back the much reported document without and outside of our command, but deposited it in the king's chamber, it was nevertheless sent back to us by several royal sovereigns for previous complaints. What we have also reported and objected to in such writings is to be heard from the contents of the same writings subsequently recorded.

The complaint and protestation otherwise drawn together, and delivered to royal highness, the imperial orator and commissaries.

1. noble king, also most reverend, reverend, highborn, venerable, wellborn and noble, dear, gracious lords, grandfathers, cousins, brothers-in-law, friends, and special dear ones! After we have, at the request of the Roman Emperor's Majesty, our most gracious Lord, and in addition to your Royal Serene Highness' friendly description, to her Majesty's submissive obedience, and to your Royal Serene Highness' friendly and official favour, also for the benefit of common Christendom and the Holy Empire, here to this Imperial Diet, and now, besides your beloved ones and you the others, hear the read Instruction together with the Letter of Authority in Imperial Majesty's name (placed on your Royal Serene Highness and other Commissaries ordered by Her Imperial Majesty), and in addition to this, we have diligently examined the Imperial Majesty's writ of summons of this Imperial Diet and have found that the matters have been directed by inconvenient practices to the effect that the article in the decree of the Imperial Diet held before us, concerning our holy Christian faith and its religion or ceremonies, should be set aside, and against it other, quite burdensome articles should be placed.

(2) However, since Your Royal Serene Highness, and others assigned to Your Royal Serene Highness, as Imperial Majesty's Governors and Commissars, also all Electors, Princes, and Estates of the Realm Serene Highness, as Imperial Majesty's Governors and Commissaries, also all Princes, Princes and Estates of the Realm, and of the said Article, at the Imperial Diet held here at Speier, for good Christian reasons, for the preservation of peace and unity in the Holy Realm, have unanimously agreed and united, the contents of which, as hereafter follows: That in the meantime of a General Council or National Assembly, every Prince, Elector, and estate of the Empire may live, govern, and hold with his subjects "in matters which the edict issued by the Imperial Majesty at the Imperial Diet of Worms may concern", as each one hopes to do against God and the Imperial Majesty. Majesty hopes and trusts to answer for. And now Your Royal Serene Highness, as at that time and now Imperial Majesty's Governor, together with other co-commissioners assigned to her aforementioned, in virtue of her then transferred (signed and sealed with Imperial Majesty's hands) power, have spoken and promised in the resolution of the above-mentioned farewell on account of Roman Imperial Majesty, to keep and perform all and every thing written in the said farewell and which may touch the Imperial Majesty, firmly, unbrokenly and sincerely, to comply with it and live it straightforwardly and without refusal, not to do anything contrary to it, to carry it out, and to act or let it go out, nor to allow anyone else to do anything on their account, except all danger. Likewise, your beloved, we, and other princes, sovereigns, Prelates, Counts and Lords, also of the Electors and Princes, Prelates, Counts, and of the Holy Roman Empire free and imperial cities sent embassies and rulers, named in the parting, therein publicly confess that all and every written points and articles are made and decided with all our good knowledge, will and counsel, that also we all have agreed to the same together and especially in virtue of the letter, and in right, good, true faith have spoken and promised to keep and perform all the points and articles written in the parting, as much as to each his lordship or friend, by whom he is sent or trusted, concerns or may concern, true, steadfast, firm, sincere, and unbroken, and to comply and live to the utmost of our ability without danger. As then the several times reported agreement of the last held Imperial Diet is thus documented and sealed by Imperial Majesty's Governors, Princes, Princes and other Estates of the Realm, holds such with clear, expressed words in itself, wants and is able.

(3) Thus, in consideration of this previously established, obligated, documented, and sealed parting, we have, also for the following reasons (which are then indicated to your Royal Highnesses and to you in writing on the twelfth day of this month of April), declared that we are in agreement with you. Dear Sir, and to you the others, on the twelfth day of this month of April, partly also indicated in writings), we neither can nor may consent to the abrogation of the preceding article unanimously granted and obligated to be kept, nor to the mitigation thought to have been made therefor (and yet in itself none).

(4) Namely, first, for the well-founded reason that we undoubtedly believe that Your Imperial Majesty, as a noble, just and Christian Emperor, our most gracious Lord, also Your Royal Serene Highness and other of your fellow Commissioners. Majesty as a laudable, just and Christian Emperor, our most gracious Lord, also your Royal Serene Highness, and other of your fellow Commissioners, the same also the several part of your and the other dear ones, are nothing less than we, of the Imperial and Royal, Electoral, Princely and honorable, sincere, constant mind and will, and honorable, sincere, constant mind and will, what all of them (as above mentioned) have once and with us unanimously granted, obligated, committed and sealed, thus according to the letter, to keep steadfastly, firmly and unbreakably, to carry out, and therein not to brood at all, nor to be contrary to it with intent, nor to do it, in which we now not only agree with our, but first of all with Your Imperial Majesty, but also with Your Royal Majesty. Majesty, and also of your Royal Serene Highness, dearest and all our honour, praise, glory and favour.

005 Secondly, we also know such things, as is reported before and after, with good reason. We do not know against God the Almighty, as the one and only Lord, Ruler and Sustainer of our holy, Christian, beatific faith, nor against Imperial Majesty as a Christian Emperor. Majesty, as a Christian Emperor, in no way.

6th For although we know that our forefathers, brothers, and we, in all that we owe and are bound to obey the late and present reigning Roman Imperial Majesty, or to obey her Imperial Majesty, we do not know that our forefathers, brothers, and we, in all that we owe and are bound to obey the late and present reigning Roman Imperial Majesty, or to obey her Imperial Majesty. Majesty, or to her Imperial Majesty and the honour of the Empire. Majesty and the Empire's honour, welfare and best, that our forefathers, brothers and we have done so with whole, faithful, willing and ready subservience, so that we know how to give preference to no one in nothing, even without male diminution, for our glory, as we do now to our end and pit, with the help of divine grace, we are willing and inclined to be obedient and willing in all things due and possible to the Roman Imperial Majesty, as our most gracious lord, of unsaved body and estate, also to your Royal Serenity and love, as our dear and gracious lords, grandparents, cousins, brothers-in-law, friends, and other estates of the Holy Roman Empire, in a friendly, gracious, and unanimous manner: These are such things, as your Royal Serenity, beloved, and you, the others, know, which concern and pertain to the glory of God and the salvation and blessedness of every soul, in which we, by the command of God, for the sake of our consciences, declare the same our Lord and God to be the highest King and Lord of all lords, in baptism and otherwise by his holy divine word, we are obligated and indebted above all things, in the undoubted confidence that your royal majesty, beloved, and you, the others, will (as we have also kindly requested before) kindly graciously and benevolently that we do not agree with your Royal Serene Highness, dear ones, and you others, for the sake of the above-mentioned articles, nor do we want to obey the majority of them, as has been done several times at this Imperial Diet, in consideration and respect that we want to obey this, due to the previous Speierian imperial treaty, which especially in the mentioned article clearly shows that such article was decided by a unanimous union (and not only the several parts); Therefore, such a unanimous resolution shall not, can not, or may not be changed, otherwise than by unanimous consent, for reasons of honor, equity, and right,

Together with this, that even without this, in matters concerning God's honor and our souls' salvation and happiness, each one must stand before God for himself and give an account; so that no one can excuse himself from this place on the basis of another's doing or deciding, and are not obligated to do so for other honest, well-founded, good reasons.

7. And so that your Royal Serenity, dear ones, also you, the others, and other men, to whom this action may reach, may have our complaints, also reason and causes (why we cannot compare ourselves in touched matters with your Royal Serenity, dear ones, and you, the others, this time) again and actually heard: it is openly in the day, and not to be denied, that for the sake of doctrine in our Christian religion, on account of many pieces and articles, there has hitherto been discord, but whence such discord has been caused and flowed, that God knows first of all, of which court we also set all things at home, and has been partly done and handed over at the Imperial Diet at Nuremberg by the Papal Legate, according to his advertisement and instruction, 1) at that time, and also otherwise known by many Princes, Princes, and other estates of the Empire, which are also partly yours; as then at the reported Imperial Diet at Nuremberg the secular imperial estates recorded all our complaints in eighty articles, 2) and handed them over to the said papal legate, which also went out publicly in print before, as then the same complaints and abuses are not yet over, and many more are before us.

8. And although at the same time and afterwards, also now, all kinds of ways were thought of here, it was nevertheless always considered at all imperial congresses that no more convenient means and measure could be found for the matters on all sides than that a free, common, Christian concilium, or at least a national assembly, would be made and announced as soon as possible; and this we now point out to no other than faithful, Christian, friendly, official good opinion, and therefore that your Royal Serene Highness, dear ones, and you the others, also manly, may take from it and remind yourself, when it is proper or due, to lead a part distance or condemnation of the doctrine (belonging to God's glory and the souls' salvation and blessedness), which he considers to be Christian, and in his lands and countries to be a part of it.

2) St. Louis edition, vol. XV, no. 722.

3) before a free Christian general concilio, that by imperial majesty decreed governors, commissaries, oratores, also princes, princes and other estates of the empire would not have been and still would not have been so often and stately set and acted by reported concilio to interrogate and act the ambiguous (as doubtful doctrines and things), of which they themselves are not certain.

(9) That we have now encountered such a thing in our part, according to the content and opinion of some points and articles (which are set up for the sake of this discord in faith and peace), and that it was not only silent but also evident that it should be laid down, is enough to be noted and understood from the following statement:

10. For so some in the committee, in their first proposed, and on the tenth day of this month of April, again overlooked, and also in some other pieces changed, have set that princes, princes, and other estates (among which we are understood and meant to be the same as your beloved ones, and you the others) have now decided with each other that those who have remained with the (preordained) imperial edict until now, now for the sake of this also remain with the same edict until the tenth day of this month of April, have now decided here with each other that those who have remained with the (preordained) imperial edict until now, should and want to remain with the same edict until the future concilio, and keep their subjects to it 2c., that we, as those who cannot keep or execute such edict in all things with a good conscience, as was considered at previous imperial congresses, not only with us, but also with more other imperial estates, would be extremely burdensome and could not be justified before God, to separate anyone of high or low rank, by our joint decision, from the doctrine which we, from a thorough report of God's eternal Word, undoubtedly consider to be divine and Christian, and against our own conscience, as if it were obvious, to penetrate under the edict which has been drawn up.

(11) But we are not at all disposed to dispute how your Royal Highness, or any of your loved ones, may hold it. 11. But we do not at all submit to dispute how your Royal Serenity, or any one of your loved ones, and you the others, will hold it, outside of our settlement or resolution, according to the edict or otherwise, for themselves and with theirs; only that we daily and cordially pray God that his divine grace may enlighten us all to his and our own right, true knowledge, and give his Holy Spirit to guide us into all truth, so that we may come to the unanimity of a right, true, loving, beatific, Christian faith.

3) in the old edition of Walch: "gladly", which will be read from "geen" (to go). In the parallel passage Col. 292, § 6: "lead".

Faith come through Christ, our one and only mercy seat, mediator, advocate, and Saviour, amen.

(12) For after the disagreement has been made public, and, as stated above, has been made known in part by the opposing party, that it has arisen from their cause, that it has also been admitted and not denied by the reported opposing party that the doctrine is just among us in many respects (which the imperial edict also touches upon), and only in some points and articles is in conflict with one another, it is easy for the manly and honorable mind and spirit to judge that if we should decide upon your royal sovereignty, your love, and your opinion of the others, with your royal sovereignty, your love, and you the others, that this should be the result and that we should decide upon it with your royal sovereignty, your love, and you the others. If we, your royal majesty, your love, and the opinion of the others, should decide with your royal majesty, your love, and you, the others, that it would result and be imposed upon us that we, against our own conscience, now judge the doctrine, which we have hitherto undoubtedly considered Christian, and still consider to be so, to be unjust, because we have decided that the imperial edict shall stand against it.

(13) Which is still more clear from the appended point of contradiction, which thus reads: 1) "And among the other estates, among which the other doctrine has arisen, and in part cannot be averted without noticeable uproar, complaint, and danger, yet for this all innovation shall be prevented, as much as possible and humanly possible, until the future Council. How then it may be argued and said that we have confessed by such a parting, that our Christian doctrine, opinion, and attitude are so wrong and so formed, if they want to be stopped without noticeable turmoil, trouble, and danger, that it should be done justly, or at least we must tacitly admit and confess that we do not have rightly founded or thus necessary points and articles in the faith: which, however, (for we shall be directed otherwise by holy, pure, divine, biblical Scripture at a future Council,) we neither know how to confess nor to do at this time.

014 What else could this be, but to deny, not only implicitly, but publicly, our Lord and Saviour Christ, and his holy word, which we have without doubt pure, clean, pure, and right, and to give the Lord Christ cause to deny us also before his heavenly Father, and not to confess that he hath delivered us from sins, death, the devil, and hell; as then he hath delivered us from all them that believe him and his holy word?

not freely and openly confess before men, the gospel dreadfully threatens; so the right confession is not only in mere words, but in deed, as may be further explained for the sake of necessity.

15. To what noticeable and condemnable annoyance and apostasy such a thing would be, not only among our Christian, but also among our good-hearted subjects, if they heard that we had decided with your Royal Serenity, dear ones, and you, the others, that you should persevere with the edict, and that your subjects should also keep to it; Thus, although God Almighty enlightens someone to the knowledge of his holy and only saving word, that he or they should not or may not accept the same, it is not difficult for every Christian man of good character to consider and recognize this; as some of the authorities of your part would also like to presume against their subjects that we have decided on such a thing with your royal majesty, dear ones, and you, the others, therefore they must keep and do it.

16. Where we also decide with your Royal Serene Highness and you, the others, that those who have so far remained with the Edict should also remain with it until a future Council, we confess, as reported before, not only that your part's opinion is just, but also that the Edict would and should still be in force, which has been suspended and repealed by the previous Speierian Imperial Decree, as is evident from all actions; so that in such matters, touching the edict, each imperial state may hold, live and govern for itself and its own, as it hopes to answer first to God and Imperial Majesty. Majesty; therefore, we can no longer be burdened with such a yoke of the edict that is not our fault. We are also in no doubt that it is Imperial Maj. Maj.'s will, mind, or opinion, as we then have to do, live, govern, do, and leave our teachings, life, and actions, in such a way against God Almighty and Her Imperial Majesty as a Christian Emperor. Maj. as a Christian Emperor, on a true and thorough report of the matter.

(17) Thus, for the sake of the article concerning the Mass, it has such and much more difficulty, for we have no doubt that Your Royal Serenity, beloved, and you, the others, have heard and heard before this time, to the necessity of it, in what way our preachers and teachers have used and said the Pontifical Masses, as they have been used and said for some time, with holiness,

The Lord has also set up the noble and delicious supper of our dear Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, which is called the evangelical mass, according to the institution and example of Christ, our only Master, and also according to the use of his holy apostles. If we should now approve or consent to such a concept or resolution, as the one in the committee, for the sake of the Mass, again no other thing would be understood, than that we would be contrary to our preachers' teachings, which we nevertheless consider to be Christian and constant, in the piece as well as in previous ones, and would help to judge them as unjust, which, after all, by the bestowal of God's graces, is not at all our mind, nor can it be done with a good conscience. Your Royal. Your Serene Highnesses, dear ones, and you, the others, yes, men, may well think if we were to have two mutually repugnant masses celebrated in our cities, towns, and territories, although the papal mass would not be against God and His holy word, which may never be preserved, that nevertheless, among the common man, especially among those who have a right zeal for God's honor and name, "nothing less than repugnant preaching," repugnance, rebellion, indignation, and all unhappiness would follow, and would serve neither peace nor unity.

(18) But that your Royal Serene Highnesses, dear ones, and you, the others, mean the touched Papal Masses, as they have been held and used for some time, and that the term must be understood of the same, we have to assume easily from the fact that the reported term is directed only to the places where the other doctrine (as it is called) originated, and not at all to your Royal Highnesses, dear ones, and your, the others, authorities and territories; and therefore we are not unreasonably disconcerted that your Royal Highnesses, dear ones, and you, the others, do not understand the term. Serene Majesty, beloved, and your, the other, authorities and territories; and therefore we are not unreasonably disconcerted that your Royal Serene Majesty, beloved, is the one who is responsible for it. Serene Highnesses, dear ones, and you, the others, are noble to set us and others, who adhere to this doctrine (that is, the pure, unadulterated Word of God), in the one measure, for the sake of our subjects, and to make order and regiment in our cities, towns and territories, which your Royal Highnesses, dear ones, have done. Your Serene Highnesses, dear ones, and you, the others, would not like to suffer in the opposite case, even if we respect it, so you should consider the equality and be much less against it, that we join with ours in our towns, villages, authorities and territories of the supper of Christ, as the evangelical and only in divine Scripture.

The Holy Mass, according to the revealed and irrefutable institution of our Saviour Jesus Christ, shall be unanimously used by you. For you would not like or tolerate that your loved ones, and you, the others, in their cities and towns, should be prevented from celebrating the papal masses, or anything else of the kind, which is contrary to the divine institution, as well as to the use of all his holy apostles, and which is based solely on human poetry and invention, or that you should prevent it in any way.

19 Because of this, and because the doctrine on our part in our lands and authorities is founded on divine, unconquered Scripture, against the papal masses, as mentioned above, and because such an article is not the least that is necessary to be acted upon in a Christian council, we would not have allowed ourselves (in addition to the fact that the invitation to this Imperial Diet was issued in the name of the Emperor and went out, which is also more recent in date than the forewarned Letter of Authority and the Instruction, nor do the Instructions read to us report anything about these or other such articles). Maj.'s name, which is also more recent in date than the aforementioned Letter of Authority and the Instruction, nor the Instruction read out in the same way, report anything about these or other similar articles), we would not have provided at all that our notifications and Christian reminders made many times before should be adhered to in such a way.

20. Although it is publicly evident what we preach and have preached in our countries and authorities on account of the holy sacrament of the body and blood of our Lord and Saviour Jesu Christ, that for this reason it is necessary to make a wide announcement: Nevertheless, we know once again, as we have had it said before, from many misgivings and good Christian causes, that it is not convenient or tolerable that for the sake of doctrine (so contrary to it) such a decree should now be made at this Diet, and especially because the Emperor's decree does not allow anything to be done about it. Maj.'s letter does not report anything about it, that even those who touch the same matter have not been required nor heard; and it is truly to be moved and considered, if such grave and important articles were to be made outside of the future Concilii, or were to be subjected to a finding or order therein without a necessary and due hearing of all those who touch the matter, to what harm and injustice such a decree would cause Imperial Maj. Majesty, Your Royal Serene Highness, Dearest, and to us and other estates of the realm.

Item 21, as further set forth in the committee's term, 2) that the preachers should preach the holy gospel.

1) In Walch's old edition: "unseemly".

If we were to agree in all parts as to what the true holy Christian church is, we should preach and teach the gospel according to the interpretation of the Scriptures, approved and accepted by the holy Christian church. For this reason, however, there is not the slightest dispute, and no certain sermon or doctrine, except to remain solely in the Word of God, as also, according to the command of God, nothing else is to be preached, and since one text of holy divine Scripture is to be explained and interpreted with the other, as also this same holy divine Scripture is found in all things necessary for the Christian people to know, in itself clear and loud, to enlighten all darkness: We intend, then, with the grace and help of God, finally to abide by this, that only God's Word and the holy Gospel of the Old and New Testaments, written in the biblical books, be preached purely and unadulterated, and nothing contrary to it; For in this, as in the uniform truth and the right guide of all Christian doctrine and life, no one can err or be lacking, and he who builds on it and remains there will stand against all the gates of hell, even though all human additions and trinkets must fall and cannot stand before God.

22. But that the aforementioned concept is neither conducive nor conducive to the preservation of peace and unity in the empire, in the middle of the time of the Council, but rather strictly contrary to it, is also clear from the fact that, as reported above, in the first point it is stated that those who until now have remained with the imperial edict are now to remain with it, that those who until now remained with the imperial edict shall and want to remain with it, and no distinction is made therein as to whether and to what extent such obligation shall extend to the penance of the cited edict, as, according to the common words, it cannot be understood otherwise.

(23) When some of our clergymen were already encountered by other authorities, under the pretense of the edict mentioned, because they, for the sake of their conscience, based on the Word of God, did not comply with the edict, they were permitted to take and hold against them, by force and against the law, their tithe, rent, interest, debt, inheritance, and other things, located in other jurisdictions and territories, belonging to our subjects, over the previous Speierian imperial treaty. And it is to be well observed what further such things, under the same assumed pretence, might be done, and give cause for counteraction; that ever little or nothing might prosper for the preservation of peace and unity, to say nothing of it, if anyone of your part would dare, in the pretence of the edict and supposed We are not to be careful and disregarding, as a punishment for acting violently against ourselves or against others of our part, and for supposedly doing what is against God, His holy Word, our souls, and our good conscience. But everyone can well consider what is due to a Christian authority in such a case, for the preservation of God's word, honor and name, as well as for the pacification, protection and protection of themselves and their subjects' souls, bodies, lives and goods, for which reason it is only right in such cases to remain with the article written in the previous Speierian imperial treaty, which suspends and revokes the edict for the sake of peace and unity, as well as for other good Christian reasons.

(24) And from all this, it is now noted and publicly proven that the previous Speierian imperial treaty is more conducive and conducive to peace and unity than the concept of the aforementioned article; as such a treaty, by virtue of the Instruction then issued to the Imperial Majesty, has been considered by the Princes and all other estates of the realm to be a treaty of peace and unity. Majesty, by Princes, Reigning Princes, and all other estates of the realm: And if, in spite of such a previous legal agreement, in which the imperial edict, as mentioned above, was suspended, it did not remain, or was omitted, in the supposed appearance of the same, to take and hold back ours by force, or without counsel, in other territories of authority; What would now happen to our repugnants, who, in part, without this, seek displeasure, quarrels, strife, and no peace, if the door of the edict were opened to them again, as the term set forth would have it, and the former peaceful Speierian farewell were taken.

(25) Nor can Your Royal Serene Highness and you, the others, be sustained if the words, understood in the previous Speierian imperial decree, that each imperial estate may live, govern and hold with its subjects, in the meantime of the Council, in matters concerning the edict, as it hopes and trusts to do against God (the Most High and in His court), also here in time against Imperial Majesty (as our ordinary temporal sovereignty), are not now set forth. Majesty (as our ordinary secular sovereignty), but that the points or articles notified above be set so that the previous imperial decree is not thereby abrogated, but declared alone; for it would be publicly a complete abrogation of the previous article, and all Christian imperial estates would no longer be permitted to keep themselves in all things according to God's word and their right good conscience, as they may well answer for such against God and Imperial Majesty. Majesty, and may not be justified by any reason.

that they are such words as should allow each one, in the meantime of a council, to do everything according to his own discretion and pleasure, as some (who no doubt do not think or know much of God's courts and strict judgment, to which such responsibility belongs in the first place) speak of it.

(26) So is it touched whoever has abused or acted contrary to the Speierian Treaty. We may also suffer justice and all fairness against anyone who thinks that we have abused the often reported imperial treaty, at all ends to which we properly belong. Nor is it contrary to us if one should ever be concerned that the article touched by more than one person should be drawn into a cover of new un-Christian doctrine, that the same, inasmuch as we have, at your love and the others' allowance, ingenuously made a Christian declaration and given it in large committee, be declared, and not, as your concept is capable of, have its right substance so completely removed, but remain according to the letter with dignities and powers.

(27) And because we are confident of the Roman Imperial Majesty as a Christian Emperor and our most gracious Lord. Majesty, as a Christian Emperor and our most gracious Lord, are of the most undoubted and consoling confidence, where her Imperial Majesty has reported the things now partly told by us, and otherwise with just cause. Majesty of the things, as partly now told by us, and otherwise further with right reason would have been reported, her Imperial Majesty would have been in favour of that which has been said by us. Majesty would not have been moved to do so, as the read Instruction, for the sake of the article touched upon, is able to do, as then from Her Imperial Majesty's letter and authority, the Constitution of the Holy Roman Empire is to be found. Majesty's decree and authority, as we do not know otherwise, that it should be spoken of, acted upon, and counseled in all ways, so that peace and unity may be preserved in the realm, upon which we, in addition to Your Royal Highness, Your Serene Highness, have the right to demand that this be done. In all our actions we have sought nothing but the glory of God above all things, the salvation of all our souls, Christian peace and unity, and still desire nothing else; this we can and will testify with God, the almighty and unanimous Searcher and Knower of all hearts. Therefore, and if it had been the opinion that, because of the much reported article, it should have remained in the read instruction in a proper and convenient manner, it would not have been necessary for this case of the committee, nor for such a deliberation, movement and action, so that you could also have taken your part of the presented or read instruction, as well as of the other Imperial Majesty's notices, and also of the other instructions. Majesty's instructions.

(28) After all this, we wish to present ourselves to your Royal Highness, dearest. Serene Majesty, dear ones, and to you, the others, as our dear and gracious lords, grandparents, cousins, brothers-in-law, friends, and special loved ones, as we again kindly ask and kindly request that you will and will again take the opportunity to consider the matter and diligently consider our complaint, also its cause and reasons, and diligently consider the grounds and causes thereof, and not allow yourselves to be moved or to act contrary to the unanimously agreed upon, obligated, securitized, and sealed parting, as no one has the power, authority, or right to do so for the reasons suggested or otherwise justified, which we refrain from reporting this time for the sake of the best.

029 And where ever this third report of our noticeable grievances, with your Royal Serene Highness and you the others, would neither take place nor be accepted. Serene Majesty, dear ones, and you, the others, would neither find nor have any place: we hereby publicly protest and testify before God, our united Creator, Sustainer, Redeemer and Beatificator (who, as foretold, alone searches and knows the hearts of all of us, and will judge accordingly), and also before all men and creatures, that for ourselves, ours, and for the sake of all men, in all actions and supposed departures, as aforesaid, in the aforesaid or other matters against God, his holy word, the salvation of all our souls and our good conscience, and also against the aforesaid Speierian imperial treaty, we do not agree nor consent, but consider it null and void and unbinding for reasons of intent and other honest justified reasons; that we also let our necessity go out publicly against it, and to the Roman imperial majesty, our all-night majesty. Majesty, our most gracious lord, a thorough and truthful report in this matter, as we had it publicly heard yesterday after the alleged parting of the ways, immediately by our protestation made in haste, which we also hereby renew, and have offered to do so, that we nevertheless, in the meantime, with the help of divine assistance, by virtue of and with the content of the much-touched previous Speierian imperial treaty, keep, live and govern ourselves in our sovereignties, also with and with our subjects and relatives, in such a way as we have done in the face of the Almighty God, and Roman Imperial Majesty, our all-important God. Majesty, our most gracious Lord, as a Christian Emperor, as we hope and trust to answer for; which also concerns the ecclesiastical rent, interest, validity, tithes, and peace, as it is written and expressed in the previous Speirian Imperial Decree, that we also adhere to and show ourselves to be faithful to it. And in the same way we also want to agree with Your Royal Serene Highness and you, the others, on the following points, as touching rebaptism and printing, as we have always understood at this Imperial Diet, and also know how to keep the contents of the same points in all due respects. We also reserve the right to further extend our complaints and protests, and whatever else our further need may require in all this, and will doubtlessly take care of all this and be comforted that the Roman Imperial Majesty will not take any action against us. Majesty, as a Christian, God-loving (above all things) Emperor, and our most gracious Lord, will graciously keep and show himself in regard to our Christian, honorable, honest and unwavering mind and owed obedience. In which we would like to do and prove to Your Royal Serene Highness, dear ones, and to you, the others, as our dear and gracious lords, grandparents, cousins, brothers-in-law, friends and special dear ones, otherwise friendly and good-willed service, favourable and gracious will, which we are willing and inclined to do out of friendship, also good-willed obedience, graciousness and Christian love and duty.

(30) And when we now had to provide ourselves with no more change or relief of our complaints, it is not without reason that nevertheless the Royal Serene Highness, together with the orators and commissioners, also princes, princes and estates, made some of their counsels to us on the Thursday after Jubilate, the 22nd day of April, with verbal advertisement, which we have understood to be harmless in the following opinion:

Request of Royal Serene Highness, Imperial Majesty Orator and Commissaries. Majesty Orators and Commissaries, also Princes, Princes, Estates and Skilled Persons re.

(1) On Monday next [April 19] our most gracious and gracious Lords of Saxony, Brandenburg, Lüneburg, Hesse, and Anhalt have kindly requested the Royal Serene Highness, Imperial Majesty, Orators, and Commissaries, with notice that their Electoral and Princely Graces desire the Royal Serene Highness and the Commissaries to be admitted to the Senate. Majesty, orators and commissioners, with notice, as if their electoral and princely graces desired to be with their electoral and princely graces, thereupon an hour was appointed for the following day at six o'clock, and their electoral and princely graces had disposed themselves together with the orators and commissioners, trusting that their electoral and princely graces would come to their electoral and princely graces and the others.

but their graces would have apologized to their Royal Serene Highnesses at the same hour, requesting that another hour be set, which the Royal Highnesses did in the confidence that their Electoral and Princely Graces would come themselves. and princely graces would come themselves: but since it was not convenient for their electoral and princely graces to come themselves, they did so. Since it was not convenient for their electoral and princely graces to come themselves, they have ordered theirs with a document to royal highness, the orator and commissioners. However, since the royal dukes considered that nothing fruitful could be done by writing, the royal dukes and commissioners have notified our most gracious and gracious lords that they want to be at hand in the house today between eight and nine o'clock, and have asked that the many noble princes and princes also want to dispose of them there, so that on account of the disagreement that has occurred, 1) and otherwise, action should be taken to reach a decision, so that the royal dukes and princes as well as the imperial dukes and princes can decide on the matter. Serene Highness, as Imperial Majesty's Governor, together with the Commissars, Princes, Princes and Estates, should be compared with each other on all sides, and not thus divided.

(2) However, their Electoral and Princely Graces had been excused, and had ordered theirs to hear the same from the Royal Highnesses; but after the Royal Highnesses had considered that it would be unfruitful to deal with the envoys, therefore their Royal Highnesses, together with the orators, commissioners, also Electors, Princes and Estates, had sent them off to their Electoral and Princely Graces, and ordered their Electoral and Princely Highnesses to hear the same from their Royal Highnesses. and ordered to report the following opinion to their electoral and princely graces. Their Electoral and Princely Graces the following opinion:

(3) After this Diet had been somewhat protracted, and much dispute had arisen on account of the faith, but had been decided by the majority on one opinion, the royal sovereigns and commissaries, on account of the imperial majesty, also the electors, princes, and estates, wanted to take care of each other. Majesty, as well as Princes, Princes and Estates, will, in the movement of all kinds of action, and as it is customary that the lesser part always follows the greater, also show themselves in such a way, and accept that which the greater part has decided, so that no discord appears.

(4) Nevertheless, their Electoral and Princely Graces had also made a protestation, in which they had complained most strongly about the parting, and had requested that such a protestation be included in the parting of this Diet; for if that were not done, their

1) "half" put by us instead of: have.

But their electoral and princely graces knew that until now no such thing had been done, although one part had protested that such a protestation had been put into the decree, and if it should now be made, it would give birth to an entrance that would cause much trouble. Therefore His Royal Serene Highness, by reason of His Roman Imperial Majesty, will by no means provide for it. Majesty, did not want to provide for it at all, but rather that the Electors and Princes would again accept the parting, as it was decided by the several parts; If, however, the said Electors and Princes should be obliged to do the same, it would still not be possible, as requested, to insert the protestation into the treaty, since it is not customary to do so, but rather to refrain from inserting their Electoral and Princely Graces into the said treaty, and not to insert their Graces into it: If now their electoral and princely graces would further extend and write out their given intention about it, then it would be the wish of the Imperial Majesty, our Allies, to have this done. Majesty, our most gracious lord, to a noticeable burden and to the detriment of her Majesty's Highness, and in addition to this to a noticeable disadvantage for royal sovereigns and commissaries, also for princes, princes and estates; but so that no unfriendliness should result from this, royal sovereignty and the commissaries would have to be informed of this. Serene Highness and the Commissaries, also Princes and Estates, and the other official requests, that the Princes and Estates of the said extension, and that the protestation should go out publicly, wanted to abstain, so that Serene Highness, together with the Commissaries and Estates, would not also be caused to go out for this reason, which would give unfriendliness.

(5) And so that their electoral and princely graces would not think as if this act were directed to something more severe, or would carry an unfriendly opinion, their royal highnesses, together with the commissioners, have also given orders to continue this, as follows, and to inform their highnesses, as well as those in authority, whether their electoral and princely graces want to keep peace with their royal highnesses, the commissioners, and all the estates for the sake of faith and all temporal acts. If their Serene Highnesses, the Commissioners, and all the Estates wish to keep peace for the sake of faith and all temporal acts, then their Serene Highnesses, the Commissioners, and the Estates would also keep it that way, and would not make any discord because of it; for their Serene Highnesses would be of the final mind, and the Commissioners, and the Estates of the Church, would be of the same mind. princes, princes and the estates to stand in peace and unity with many touched princes and princes until a concilium, in the confidence that thereafter it should turn out for the better and good, and peace should be made with all elders, with final request that they, the princes and princes, royal highness, and the others, with friendly, and for their sake, the skilled ones, with gracious answer want to be heard.

From this, however, it is easy to hear how we have been further and more adversely affected, and especially in that our protestation has been refused to be brought to and lodged at the supposed session of this Diet, and, on the other hand, that we have wanted to be held in contempt, if we were to let our protest go out in public, when our high and unavoidable necessity requires it, and rightly, 1) also otherwise justifiably, unreprimandable, especially for reasons which, together with what we have further and more on the above-mentioned royal, imperial, and imperial sovereignty, are not to be found. Serene Highness, Imperial. Majesty, orators and commissaries, also princes, princes and the others, sent by estates, advertisement and request to answer, and what has been indicated by us on both sides furthermore against each other in writings, which everything is found afterwards also recorded, is to be heard actually and after the length.

Answer of the Protestant Princes to the Remonstrances of the Royal Dukes of Hungary and Bohemia, as Imperial Majesty's Governor, Orators and Commissars. Majesty's governors, orators and commissioners, as well as princes, princes and estates, made to them yesterday.

(1) We remember that on Monday next we sent some of our own to the royal sovereign, and asked them to appoint an hour on Tuesday next, so that we might inform their sovereign and imperial majesty's orator and commissaries of some of our complaints and needs. Majesty's Orator and Commissars some of our complaints and needs; but that we could not send our counsellors to the Royal Sovereign and her dears early on the aforementioned Tuesday to request the need in question, was due to an impediment that had occurred, as ours, which we had ordered at the same hour in the Royal Sovereign's Court, could not do. You, Mr. Jörgen Truchsess, have reported this to us, and you have also brought it to the Royal Sovereigns, and it may not be without reason that you, Mr. Jörg, have brought it back to us for an answer, three Royal Sovereigns together with Imperial Majesty Orator and Commander. Majesty's orators and commissaries would be excused.

We are satisfied with the agreement, but Their Serene Highnesses and Sweethearts would suffer well if it were convenient for us to appear at two o'clock in the afternoon with our own persons at Their Serene Highnesses and Sweethearts; but after the matters were concerned, on account of which Their Royal Highnesses and Sweethearts, together with the Imperial Majesty's Orator and Commissars, had set a date for a certain Monday (about which we would have had no other means, for Their Royal Highnesses and Sweethearts would have been in disagreement). Majesty's Orator and Commissars on a certain Monday (about which we would have had no other means, for their Royal Highnesses and Sweethearts would have resorted to a convenient and inexpensive settlement on account of the discord that has arisen between Princes and Princes, as well as others of the Estates and ourselves, just as the trade with their Royal Highnesses and Sweethearts is not different from that with their Royal Highnesses and Sweethearts). and dear ones) have their opinion from a writing, almost in the form of a presumed instruction, publicly read out before the said princes and princes, also the estates, and thereafter have it answered to the affairs of the realm, and since their royal princes and dear ones, when we responded to this, had their opinion read out in public, they had their opinion answered to the affairs of the realm, and since their royal princes and dear ones, when we responded to this, had their opinion read out in public. and dear ones, when we then declined to hold a short conversation with each other, unexpectedly withdrew our request, even over our friendly entreaty, which we had some of ours make to their Serene Highnesses and dear ones on that account, and, as if such a deal had been decided, did not want to hear us: It is therefore not without reason that we deem it useful and convenient to have her Serene Highness and dearest answer our protestations, complaints, and necessities in writing in the same manner as was previously done with the Electors, Princes, and Estates; At the appointed hour our councillors to the Royal Serene Highnesses Orators and Commissars have also dispatched them with this, but with regard to previous complaints, which we have encountered in these actions in more than one way, Their Serene Highnesses and Loved Ones have not accepted our written protest and necessity, but have wanted to send it to our councillors again, and after they have refused to accept such a document for lack of their command, and have asked for it, it was brought back to us by her Serene Highness and dearest envoys, and nevertheless, what we have indicated with constant reason, also out of unavoidable necessity, therein, we do not want to be considered or regarded at all, that we, and that in the place of the Roman Imperial Majesty, our most gracious Lord, should have encountered such a thing, less than not at all, know also with special glory that we did not give cause for this, and do not doubt that the Roman Imperial Majesty, the most gracious Lord, would not have given us a reason for this, and that we do not want to be considered or regarded at all, that we, and that in the place of the Roman Imperial Majesty, our most gracious Lord, should have encountered such a thing, we do not want to be considered or regarded at all. Imperial Majesty, as a most gracious, noble Emperor, had been present at this Imperial Diet himself, we would have graciously tolerated it or the like.

2. It is also not without reason that Royal Serene Highness sent to us, the Elector of Saxony, on the next Wednesday evening and let it be known that Her Serene Highness would be willing, together with Imperial Majesty's Commissaries and Orators, to be at the house of the Electors on the following Thursday between eight and nine o'clock, with request of imperial majesty that we and the rest of our friends then also appear, then your majesty together with the orators and commissioners would be inclined to act for the sake of the protestation made and for the resolution of this imperial diet; Thereupon we gave the same sent ones among other things the answer, and especially because we heard that they had no order to request the others, our friends, so we wanted to talk with their loved ones about it afterwards, and Royal Serene Highness, for this reason, before the decision of this Imperial Diet. Serene Highness a reply before the time. Thereupon we have sent all our councillors to your Serene Highness, and have had your Royal Highness reminded, among other things, that in response to the letter sent to us in the name of the Roman Imperial Majesty, we have sent a letter to your Imperial Majesty, our most gracious Lord, our most gracious Lord, to obediently attend this Imperial Diet in our own person, in the opinion that, along with other Princes, Princes and Estates, we would help to act and conclude in such a way as to promote the glory of God, and also to bring peace, welfare and all good to the Empire. But how the matters concerning the discord of faith, peace and unity in the realm in the middle time of the Concilii have occurred here, have been dealt with until the sixth week, and what we have encountered of manifold complaints would not be concealed from His Royal Serene Highness himself. However, since we have encountered such complaints about all of our established submissions, and that we now know how to provide ourselves with little more beneficial action, and our uncle and cousin, Duke Henry of Brunswick, and Margrave Philip of Baden, have suggested negotiating with us on account of the aforementioned discord, we have reported our feelings to their loved ones as much as we could have done in conscience; ...and since their loved ones would deal with princes, sovereigns, and estates.: We would await their reply, with this appendix, if their loved ones were to take action with the aforementioned princes, princes and estates, that we would leave the matter, by virtue of our next protest, with the agreement made at the previous Imperial Diet here at Speier, but if it were other matters, of which the royal decree would have been the most important, then we would have the right to take no action at all. By-

If we were to talk to us, or if we were to talk to us, we would be untroubled by their illustriousness.

(3) In addition, we, the Elector of Saxony, because His Royal Serene Highness has informed the Councillors in deviation that His Royal Serene Highness would have to speak to us about matters, and especially concerning this Imperial Diet, in which there is noticeable and much interest 2c., some of our counsellors, to his royal Serene Highness at the above-mentioned hour, with orders to apologize kindly to His Serene Highness that we do not wish to come up ourselves, and also to indicate where His Serene Highness wishes to report matters to them, that they should report the same to us; But how fruitful and useful it would have been if we had gone up again in our own person, about which we had previously taken our leave with the Electors, Princes and Estates after making our protest, and also how further action might have been taken, because beforehand, for a convenient settlement, so that we on all sides do not depart from this Imperial Diet in such a divided manner, we do not now wish to dispute any further, but let the decision and the answer of the same be pointed out and said, which the above-mentioned our uncle and cousin of Brunswick and Baden yesterday afternoon, for the sake of their action, let us know what they might have obtained from the Royal Serene Highness, the Orators and Commissars, also the Princes and other Estates, on their proposals, which we had made for the prevention of an ambiguous parting.

(4) There is also no small confirmation of our present statement, as you have also advertised, among other things, that because the majority decided on account of the discord: if Royal Serene Highness, together with the Commissaries, also Princes, Princes and Estates wanted to provide themselves, we would also accept the same 2c., if their Serene Highnesses, dear Sirs, and the others of the Estates have often heard at this Imperial Diet, for what high, brave, and well-founded reasons we do not know, nor would we be obliged (for which we again respect it without any doubt), to grant it, as if a greater one should, beforehand, in such matters, and on the ways, and on the ways in which the inferior part will face the eternal wrath and destruction of God and of many of God's chosen souls, to decide against the inferior, and to bind and ensnare the latter to God's disobedience to man's obedience, if in man's actions and things the multiple does not want to prevail against the inferior, since the matter is not in the hands of God.

But that these are things which are of special concern to each one, no one will doubtless contradict, for the divine Scripture says that each one will bear his own burden.

5. And we hold that, even if we had consented to such acts, or had consented to them, we should nevertheless, in the sight of God and the world, not do otherwise than to refrain from them in furtherance of our obligation and without delay, and to abide by his divine word; These are matters in which there are not the least points of disagreement, which are now before us, but which are to be dealt with in a future, common, free, Christian concilio, and if such a presumptuous pressing forward of the majority of our discretion were to be the case, there would be nothing else, of our discretion, would be nothing else than if princes, rulers and estates, outside of the aforementioned council and the opinion, therefore to carry out the same considered necessary, should have to judge contrary to the aforementioned articles and especially as the one and counterpart.

(6) It would be contrary not only to law, but also to all natural equity, if two parties to a transaction were in dispute, that one party should be the judge and arbiter of the other, and should prevail over the other with the greater or otherwise, and there would be no doubt, if the matter were to be thoroughly considered, that the minds and opinions of their loved ones and of the estates would not be so.

7. We also want to think that, if at this Diet the consolation had not been so complete, our divine, constant, and well-founded statement, which we have made many times on account of the burdensome articles, would have been better received, and would have caused less such discord on the other side; To which part also, if a quarrel should arise in the realm, it would be most reasonable to interpret that it was the cause of it, we want to have placed, after all, as indicated, in our own conscience and that of every one of us; Nor would we have provided that the royal highness, together with the commissioners and the estates, should have refused to grant our protestation, if we had done so out of great and pressing necessity; For although we are not to be placed in the treaty, as you have indicated, since it is thought to be possible to adhere again to the several, by virtue of your advertising, and then such more can easily be noted from the names of the estates which have been signed and which have consented to it:

...so have you, and first of all your Royal Serenity.., together with the Commissars, also Princes, Princes and those of the Estates, to consider easily for ourselves how we would be provided for our need thereby.

(8) Item, it might also be said and reproached by our unfavorable ones, who do not have knowledge of the form and occasion of the matters, that we have refused to consent to the much touched burdensome articles unfairly and without due and constant causes, from which then noticeable annoyance, unhappiness and imposition would follow us, which it is our duty to prevent as much as possible.

9. So also our mind, will nor opinion is not to give anyone cause for unfriendship with it or to diminish it, and before that to act contrary to the Roman imperial majesty, our most gracious lord, highness, but only to seek the glory of God, his holy word, and the salvation of all our souls, also not to do anything else with it than what our conscience knows; and since we would have been discharged of the burdensome cause, there should have been no lack of us to refrain from the same or the like.

(10) The Royal Highness and Orator, together with the Commissars, also the Princes and Estates, know the nature and character of the protest. Serene Highness and Orator, together with the Commissars, also Princes, Princes and Estates, what the nature and quality of the protestation is, also why the same has been invented and in Imperial Majesty's rights has been providentially done, that we hope we are not to be blamed for it, it is also unreprouvable to us by Imperial Majesty and masculinely to all equity, whether we will let our protestation, and with narration of necessary and knowable occasion of the trade that has taken place, go out in such a way.

11. But when finally and lastly you advertised, lest we should think that the advertisement made was a little sharp, and carried an unfriendly opinion: so royal Serene Highness, together with the commissaries, also princes, princes, and the other estates, would have given you orders to speak further, and to inform you as skilful ones: If we keep peace with their Serene Highnesses, beloved ones and estates on all sides of faith and all temporal actions, then Royal Highness and the Commissaries, also the other Princes, Princes and estates, will also keep peace with us and will neither undertake nor act anything offensive against us until the future Concilium, in the hope that then God would give better peace and unity than has been the case up to now. To this we give you this answer: that we are as high as anyone in peace and harmony.

We are inclined to unity, and in all our actions here we seek nothing more than the glory of God and the salvation of all people, peace and unity; and because we now note from the Imperial Majesty, our most gracious Lord, the invitation to this Imperial Diet and elsewhere, that Her Imperial Majesty would like to see and know peace and unity maintained in the Empire, and Royal Serene Highness and the other Imperial Majesties, Commissaries and rulers, as well as all other Princes, Princes and Estates, have promised us through you peace with us for the sake of faith and all temporal matters. Majesty's Commissars and Rulers, as well as all other Princes, Princes and Estates, have promised us through you to keep peace and unity with us for the sake of faith and all temporal matters: For this reason, and since we, together with ourselves and all the men who are related to this part and to the Gospel, and who have authority and government, have and obtain peace on account of the faith and also on account of those things which are included in the articles which are to be dealt with in the future council, and which are dependent on and related to the same, or which flow and result from them, and also on account of all other temporal things; We herewith wish to have promised and consented to the peace of the Royal Serene Highness, the Imperial Majesty, the Commissioners decreed, and also the Princes, Princes and all the Estates, and to keep ourselves peaceful and moderate, as we all do in such a case before God, also the Roman Imperial Majesty, our Allies, and the Holy Roman Emperor. Majesty, our most gracious Lord, we owe and are obligated to do so, for we are willing and completely inclined to show friendly and benevolent service, favor, grace, and goodwill to the High Imperial Majesty, and to the Royal Serenity, Commanderies, and all Princes, Princes, and Estates of the Realm, and hereupon request a written answer.

Final Conclusion of Imperial Maj. Governors, Orators and Commissaries, Princes and Estates.

Kaiserl. Majesty Governor, Royal Durchl. of Hungary and Bohemia 2c., and her Majesty's Orator and Commissaries, Princes, Prelates, Counts, Free and Imperial Cities, are finally resolved and of mind that they keep to the Holy Empire's orders and to the Peace of the Land established at Worms, as well as to the Imperial Treaty now made here, and against the Elector of Saxony, the Duke of Lüneburg, Margrave Georgen of Brandenburg, the Landgrave of Hesse, and the Princes of Anhalt, for the sake of the faith, they will not take any action against the Council,

The above-mentioned princes and princes will in turn show themselves obedient, peaceful and friendly towards Imperial Majesty, princes, princes and the common estates of the empire for the sake of peace and faith. Maj., Princes, Princes and common estates of the Empire obediently, peacefully, friendly and neighborly, and not to do anything unpleasant with the deed, and also to refrain from further tendering or spreading of their protestation, which could then lead to further disputes, and to be content to keep the reported protestation with the imperial action now practiced, and to send it to Imperial Maj. Maj. may be content and let it remain.

The Electors and Princes, Saxony, Brandenburg, Lüneburg, Hesse, and Anhalt, final answer to the writing of the Royal Serene Highness, Imperial Majesty, orators and commissioners, also Electors, Princes, and Estates of the Empire, handed over today at one hour.

(1) To issue a protestation, on opinion, as heard from the above-mentioned Electors and Princes yesterday's writing, they cannot refrain, also want to know to hold themselves harmless of the charge with it, and to provide that the Royal Highnesses together with the Imperial Majesty will be able to take care of the protestation. Maj. Orator and Commissaries, as well as Princes, Princes and Estates against them and theirs, also masculine, related to their part and to the Gospel, and having authority and government, for the sake of faith, also for the sake of those things which are included in the Articles to be dealt with in the future Council, and which are pending and related to the same or flow and result from them, will keep unhindered, also for the sake of all other temporal things, peaceful, neighborly and friendly; and the above-mentioned Electors and Princes, Saxony, Brandenburg, Lüneburg, Hesse and Anhalt, Imperial Maj. Maj., for the sake of their most gracious lord, to all dutiful obedience submissively, against royal highness, kais. Orator, Commissaries, and all other Electors, Princes, and Estates of the Empire, by virtue of Imperial Majesty's Land Peace, and in particular of the previous and next Speier Farewell, as also touched upon in their protestation, to again show themselves peaceful, neighborly, and friendly, and also not to do anything in bad faith or in fact.

(2) Although now also (to be understood as such from the above-mentioned writings) the Royal Serene Highness, Imperial Majesty and Commissaries, also Electors, Princes and Estates, and we with and against each other, agree and commit ourselves in the meantime to a future Council of Faith. Maj. Orator and Commissaries, also Electors, Princes and Estates, and we with and against each other consented and committed ourselves, in the meantime of a future Concilii, for the sake of faith in evil and with that not to do anything on any part, but to keep us on all sides neighborly, peaceful, and friendly toward each other, to which end we are most inclined, and provide ourselves again without doubt. Since, however, it is in accordance with justice and all equity that the main matter (as faith is in this case) is set in peace and decency, everything that is dependent on the main matter, or arises from it, should also rest, and the main matter's advantages and freedom should also be shared; If, however, (as the above-mentioned writings indicate) we have not received a definite answer on account of such accessions, we shall be caused, wherefore, whether in or out of law, anything shall be done between us and the above-mentioned Council, to take such for our sake, and for the sake of all our present and future adherents, now as then, and then as now, for a valiant grievance which we thereby encounter, as we also hereby do, and from such grievance we hereby also wish to protest.

3. After all this, we, the above-mentioned Electors and Princes, protest, recuse, provoke, appeal, supplicate, and call for ourselves, our subjects and relatives, also present and future supporters and adherents, in and with this present writing, in the best form and measure as we should and may, from all the above-mentioned complaints, which we have met with from the beginning of this Imperial Diet to the end and with the supposed parting, also of all actions and all other grievances, as may arise therefrom, or be drawn or followed hereunder, be they named herein or not, reserving their unsuitability and nullity in all ways, to and before the Roman Imperial and Christian Maj. ...and Christian Majesty..., our most gracious Lord, and to that end, at and for the next future free, Christian, common Concilium and Assembly of Holy Christendom, before our National Assembly, and to that end, a convenient, impartial and Christian judge of each of these matters; and submit ourselves, our principality, dominions, lands and people, body and goods, also all present and future adherents to this our appeal, to the Imperial Majesty and a Christian Concilium. Majesty and of a Christian Council. We hereupon request and ask from the Royal Serene Highness, the Imperial Majesty, the Princes, the Princes, and the rest of you of the Holy Roman Empire, as well as from both of you notaries public, or whoever has the power to do so, for the first, second, and third time, diligently, more diligently, and most diligently, to give us testimony of such our appeal, recusation, provocation, and supplication,

We also reserve the right to increase, improve, diminish, or change such appeals, provocations, and supplications, and to file them anew, as soon as the usual form has brought and permitted them.

4. Since the embassies sent by the honorable and free imperial cities named below, as Strasbourg, Nuremberg, Ulm, Costnitz, Lindau, Memmingen, Kempten, Nördlingen, Heilbrunn, Reutlingen, Ißni, Sanct Gallen, Weißenburg, and Windsheim, as the above-mentioned Electors and Princes Appeal, The same embassies have, at the time of the above-mentioned appeal by princes and rulers, adhered, indicated and stipulated that they and their lords and rulers adhere to the same appeal, nor do they wish to adhere to or be associated with or oppose any authority (so that and by this means they do not want to be attested to and innovation made against the appealing princes and princes or against their appeal), and as councillors soon appointed by the aforementioned princes and princes, in place of their princes and princes they do not wish to be associated with or oppose any authority, in place of their electoral and princely graces, the above-mentioned free and imperial cities' appeal, which they have done or will do in the future for the sake of more affected matters and grievances, again also adhered to, and conditioned to adhere to the same, and to act nothing against it, without all danger.

5. And from both of us after written notaries, together with the witnesses of such made appeal, also attachment of the same, condition, protestation and reservation, letters of attestation or testimony, also one or more instruments, as much as would be necessary to their electoral and princely graces for that reason, we have not to refuse their electoral and princely graces, out of requirement of our notarial office, letters of attestation and these our open notices to know.

From Müller's History 2c., p. 42.

And as the same article 1) has since been misunderstood by many and has been used as an excuse for all kinds of new doctrines and sects: so that such things may be cut off, and strife, discord and discomfort prevented, and peace, unity and obedience of the subjects may be maintained between all the estates in the meantime of the above-mentioned Council: So Princes, Princes and other Estates have resolved that the above Article in the Speier Agreement shall be amended 2) with the following moderation and declaration, namely, that the aforementioned Princes, Princes and Estates, who have hitherto kept and adhered to the traditional customs, ceremonies and other practices of the common church, may now also remain and remain in the same until the future Council, without male hindrance, violation and entry; Likewise, the other princes, rulers, and estates, among whom the other doctrine has arisen, and thus the above-mentioned traditional customs have come to an end, are also to be left without the other part's and beneficial prevention, violation, or entry, until the Concilio in question, but for now all further innovation or sectarianism in the Christian faith is to be prevented as much as possible and humanly possible until the future Concilio, and is not to be permitted by the authorities of any place. 822. letter 4) of the Elector John of Saxony, by which he announces the protestation in his lands and indicates its true causes. Dated. Weimar, the

May 9, 1529.

This document appeared in 1529 both in quarto and octavo under the title: "Des Churfürsten zu Sachsen Johannis Abschied auf jetzt gehaltenem Reichstag zu Speyer 1529." Reprinted in Hortleder, "Von den Ursachen des deutschen Kriegs", vol. I., enp. 4th, p. 43, and in Müller's Historie von der evangelischen Stände Protestation rc., lib. I, enp. 6, K 2, p. 126. in the Collections: in the Eisleben one, vol. By the Grace of God, we John, Duke of Saxony, Archmarshall and Elector of the Holy Roman Empire, Landgrave of Thuringia and Margrave of Meissen 2c., declare and declare all men to know: After and as the Roman Imperial Majesty, our most gracious

3) Maybe: penetrate?

4) The letter of Landgrave Philipp of Hesse, according to words and things, completely agrees with this.

Lord, a short time ago a common Imperial Diet was announced, and Princes, Princes and Estates are required to meet at Speier on Sunday Reminiscere [21 Feb. We then, in obedience to their Imperial Majesty, have ordered ourselves in our own persons, in the opinion of other Princes, Princes and Estates, to act in the matters expressed in the above-mentioned Imperial proclamation, to consider the same, and to help to deliberate. And by some of the aforementioned princes, princes and estates, for the sake of the article, how on account of the pending discord in our holy Christian faith, to maintain peace and unity in the meantime of a common, free and Christian concilii or national assembly, to act on the ways. Also subsequently, with the assistance of Imperial. Majesty's Governor, our special dear lord and uncle, Royal Serene Highness of Hungary, Bohemia, and the orator and commissioners decreed by their Imperial Majesty, by which the agreement, which was unanimously established and decided upon at the previous and next Imperial Diet held there at Speier, in respect of the article in question, has been more changed than declared. In addition, for many brave and important reasons, which concern our conscience and duty, so that we may be devoted to God our Creator, and that we, at the Imperial Diet now held, in addition to other friends of ours, namely, the Highborn Princes, Mr. Georgen, Margrave of Brandenburg 2c., Mr. Ernsten and Mr. Franciscen, brothers, Dukes of Brunswick and Lüneburg, Mr. Philippsen, Landgrave of Hesse 2c, and Prince Wolfgang zu Anhalt, our dear grandparents, cousins, cousins-in-law, have been presented, in the above-mentioned now taken leave have not been able to approve or grant, and especially, because by the same leave other states were obliged to join, not to accept the doctrine, which we know and believe Christian, right and necessary, also in our lands and territories hold and preach.

(2) That we have therefore publicly protested, together with our friends, against such a supposed change made to the previous Speier agreement and the other burdensome articles appended to it; to which protest several embassies sent by the honourable and free imperial cities have also adhered, and the words of our protest, which we have also sent in writing to the imperial cities, are the same as those of the other imperial cities. have had laid, among others, these which follow, namely: 1)

(3) But because we have found that your beloved and you persist in your intention of trust, and because of the brave causes and complaints which we have now raised and renewed, both for conscience' sake, and also that such your beloved and your nobles, on account of the above-mentioned pending discord, do not in any way comply with or wish to do anything for the preservation of peace and unity in the meantime of the Council, we have decided that we will not do anything for the preservation of peace and unity. We are also aware that, because of the above-mentioned pending discord, it will not be conducive to the preservation of peace and unity in the meantime of the Council, nor will it be possible for us to agree or consent to it. In addition, according to the terms of the treaty, and before the above-mentioned next Speier treaty, we are not obliged, especially without our consent, to leave the next reported treaty made here at Speier: We therefore consider that, because of the many difficulties involved, our great and unavoidable necessity requires us to publicly protest against your dear ones, and yours, as being void and powerless on account of the aforementioned next farewell, and ours, as well as ours and our male representatives, as being united. As we do herewith; and that we do not know, nor can, nor may, for reasons aforesaid, heal, but have reported your loved ones, and your intentions, to be null and void. We have hereby protested against your beloved and you. And we nevertheless want to keep, live and govern ourselves in the matters of religion in our authorities, also with and with our subjects and relatives, by means of divine help, by virtue and content of the mentioned next Speierian decree, also in and with our subjects and relatives, as we trust to answer for it to God Almighty and Roman Imperial Majesty, our most gracious Lord. What also concerns the ecclesiastical interest, rent, validity and tithes, also the peace, and is written and expressed in the much reported next Speierische Abschied, we want to show and keep ourselves in all ways also unobjectionable.

4th Because we now reserve the right, in addition to our protest, to take the same, together with our complaints, which we have presented in writings, to the Roman Imperial Majesty, our most gracious Lord, and also to have it publicly issued, so that men may know and receive that we have neither agreed nor consented to the above actions:

1) The following is § 2 of the Protestation in No. 820.

We therefore wish to have made our announcement in this open document, so that all men and everyone may be aware of it, and that we remained at the end of the previous Speier Diet, held in the twenty-sixth year, as we also do herewith. And with the help of the Almighty, in matters concerning our faith, for ourselves and with our subjects and relatives, we wish to live, govern, and hold ourselves accountable to God Almighty and to the Roman Imperial Majesty, our most gracious Lord, in the meanwhile of the common, free, and Christian Concilii or National Assembly. In witness whereof, with our decree hereunto printed, sealed and given at Weimar, on the Thursday after Exaudi [May 9] Anno 1529.

823 Emperor Carl the Fifth's Letter of Warning to the Estates of the Empire, which refused to accept the Imperial Treaty. Given at Barcelona, July 12, 1529.

In Müller's Historie 2c. p. 208 and in LUnigs ReichsArchiv, xurt. A6N. oont. Walch lets this be addressed in his superscription "to all imperial estates".

We Carl the Fifth, by the Grace of God chosen Roman Emperor, at all times Major of the Empire 2c. Dear Faithful! We are saddened by the farewell which was given at the next Imperial Diet at Speier by our decreed Imperial Majesty, Governor, Orator and Commissar. We are reminded by the agreement made at the next Imperial Diet at Speier by our decreed Imperial Majesty's Governor, Orator and Commissars with the Holy Empire's princes and chieftains and other estates of the Holy Empire.

that you have not granted the leave made in such articles concerning our holy Christian faith, which we dislike not a little from you: Considered that by the much greater part of all estates unanimously decided in such articles on means and measure, in which you should have sought no refusal; And because it is an old custom what is decided in a common imperial assembly with the majority, the lesser part should not resist, but, because it is placed to maintain peace and unity in the holy empire, obediently live up to it, so that neither you nor yours do or act anything against it, as you are obliged to do out of your duty, so that you are related to us and the holy empire: We will not refuse to do this to you, for if you continue to be disobedient to our gracious warning, we do not wish to avoid it, but would and must, in order to preserve your obedience to the holy kingdom, inflict serious punishment on you; 1) that it would be good for no one but yourselves, if you were to be obedient as mentioned above, if we did not want you to behave, and you do so in our sincere opinion. Given in our city of Barcelona, the 12th day of July, Anno 2c. 29, of our Roman Empire in the 12th year, and of all others in the 14th year.

First paragraph.

Of the Mainzian Council and the so-called Pack Alliance.

824 Aurifaber's report of the Mainzian council against the followers of the Lutheran doctrine. Anno 1526.

In the Eisleben Collection, Vol. I, p. 273; in the Altenburg, Vol. III, p. 520 and in the Leipzig, Vol. XIX, p. 555. Aurifaber here mixes both, the Mainz Rathschlag and the later, so-called Packsche Bündniß into one another.

In this 1526th year, a secret meeting is said to have been held in Mainz, where it was discussed how the Elector of Saxony, Duke Johannsen, and Landgrave Philip of Hesse could be attacked by war and how the Lutheran doctrine could be eradicated. But who was in this alliance and unity relatives, is reported later in the short report, what happened with Doctor Martin Luther and fine doctrine Anno six and twenty.

(2) But when by one of the nobility, called Pack, this practice and proposal 1) was first revealed to the Landgrave of Hesse, who then attributed it to the Elector: then both Electors and Princes in the following 1527th year entered into a stately armament, which, however, by negotiation has again been settled peacefully.

3. there Doctor Martinus Luther has been in the intention to write a serious, sharp booklet 2) in the

1) Still in 1527 Pack informed the Landgrave of Hesse that on May 13, 1527, an alliance had been concluded by the Catholic princes at Breslau. It was not until March 1528 that the Landgrave made a counter-alliance with the Elector. See St. Louis Edition, Vol. XIX, Einl., p. 175f.

2s This again goes to the Mainz Rathschlag. The first "printed sheet" is included in No. 826, perhaps even the whole "booklet".

The booklet was printed against this Mainzian alliance, and one sheet of it had already been printed; but due to the abolition of the Elector of Saxony, the booklet was withheld and the single printed sheet was taken away from the printing press, so that it was not published. However, N. Georg Spalatinus has marked with his own hand a short extract or excerpt from the same printed sheet, which was found in his Liberei, and has therefore been printed in this work, so that the Christian reader may learn of the Mainzian Covenant, which is very often found in D. Luther's books and writings. Luther's books and writings, could have a brief instruction and teaching.

(4) In such matters, too, some of Martin Luther's objections, subsequently printed, will be set down, from which the laudable Elector of Saxony's godliness will be felt that he did nothing in high secular matters, for he had also consulted Os Domini beforehand.

825 Luther's account of this in a letter to Spalatin, at the same time reporting that he already has a writing against the Mainz Rathschlag under the press.

See Vol. XV, Appendix, No. 128.

6 Luther's intended rebuttal to the Mainz Rathschlag. March 1526.

This writing, published only recently by Seidemann in Nieders Zeitschrift für die historische Theologie, Jahrgang 1847, p. 663 ff. from a manuscript, has been published in older editions under the title: "Titel des Büchleins, so Lutherus wider das Mainzische Bündniß aus-to let go, together with Georgii Spalatini Extract from the first printed sheet of this booklet." First in the Eisleben Collection, vol. I, p. 274; then in the Altenburg, vol. III, p. 520; in the Leipzig, vol. XIX, p. 536, and in Walch. The so-called "Extract" is limited to individual sentences taken out of context and individual expletives, which, however, we believe, are not, as Aurifaber states, limited to the first sheet, but encompass our entire writing, for the last sentence of the extract is also the last sentence of the writing as we communicate it here according to the Erlangen edition, vol. 65, p. 22 to 46. However, it seems to us that this is not only the first sheet, but almost the complete booklet, which contains the entire Rathschlag together with Luther's preface and epilogue. The latter will have been somewhat lacking in print, since Luther writes (after March 27, 1526, De Wette, Vol. III, p. 99) to the Elector: "Where it pleases E. C. F. G. to abstain altogether and not to express it fully, I would be well pleased with half of it." But Luther says in the same letter, not of the first sheet, but of the "nearest printed quatern," which is also still contained in our writing.

Against the Right Seditious, Treacherous and Murderous Counsel of the Whole Mainzian Popery Instruction and Warning

M. L. 1526.

To my dear lords and friends, all pious Germans, I wish, M. Luther, much grace and peace from GOD our Father and HERN JESu Christo, our Saviour.

Satan has not had enough of the fact that he has caused such great misery in German lands this past year through the peasants' rebellion, and still daily attacks the holy divine word (which God, out of unspeakable grace, has let shine again for us after the horrible, miserable darkness under the troublesome papacy) both with the sword of worldly supremacy and with the sects of many wild enthusiasts, blasphemes and defiles, but has it in mind to attack the same with all his might, as he would gladly thrust it to the ground in a moment. For this he needs his servants, namely the idolaters of the whole Mainzian mob and priesthood, who have made a council out of his suggestion, in which they have also undertaken the two knavery, first, to blaspheme the gospel as a seditious doctrine, and second, to incite the princes of German lands into one another, and to drown all Germany in blood, only to preserve their belly and blasphemous evil life and unchristian splendor. For this

This treacherous advice gives everyone enough to understand that they do not care, even though no prince would still be lord in German lands, and everything would flow in blood, if they would only lead their tyranny, godless, shameful lives. Notice and take hold of the fact that in the whole council they do not think with a single letter how they can improve their lives and beings, as if nothing but vain holiness were with them, or how they could do away with the burden and displeasure that was done against them at Worms, but they call the food bad and insolent, and everything is to do with the belly.

However, for my own part, I would like to watch and be quiet, as such advice, even if it were to take place, since God is for it, cannot harm him, because it would all happen without my knowledge and will, and would even go against me; for which reason my conscience would be innocent before God of all that follows from it, moreover, that he could do no more to me, if he committed the highest thing against me, than to take away my life, which is the least harm from God's grace, which by God's grace is the least harm that can be done to me, and indeed the greatest service, because I am such a person who until now has always been doomed to death and who is miraculously preserved in life solely by God's power, in defiance of all the wrath of both the devil and his saints; For here is my defiance, when the prophet saith, Ps. 2, that the nations rage in vain, kings revolt, and princes counsel with one another in vain, and all this against God and his anointed, for the Lord laughs at them, and he that dwelleth in heaven mocks at them; at last he speaks to them in wrath, and terrifies them with his fury. These and such words are my rock, because I know that they are true, that I give not much heed to a little lord; yea, I esteem the wrath of all devils, bishops, and princes, as the foot of a dove.

This, I say, would be enough for my person, and let the devil rage with his own as he would, it must be dead; then it is a matter of a moment that those who are now lords and bishops would like to be our servants, if it could come to that for them; but while I am alive, God has decreed me,

To be everyone's servant as much as I can, to teach, instruct, warn and admonish what is useful and blessed, so that if I wanted to boast, I would still boast about the apostles and evangelists in German lands, even if the devil and all his bishops and tyrants were sorry; For I know that I have learned the faith and the truth, and still teach by the grace of God, which name the devil shall not destroy nor take from me for ever. Of this I am sure, that he may blaspheme, cry, and reproach me with his mouths and feathers, however high and lofty he may be, it will not avail him. For this reason and for the sake of others, especially to answer for my teaching, I should not and cannot stand by quietly, but must expose the devil's behind once again, so that everyone can see how ugly, black and horrible he is, so that he may become even more angry with me. So I will bring to light and expose the counsel of Mainz, which has come to me in a strange way, and have kept it secretly and behind the backs of those whom they mean by it, as traitors and murderers are wont to do without public warning, admonition or complaint, as not only Christian, but also pagan and natural laws teach. I thought the happy episcopal day would add something to the fire, so let the porridge boil, God will tell who is to prepare it and who must burn his mouth on it.

Because they blaspheme my life so shamefully, and I have to be unchaste, stingy, hopeful, or else, I am glad with all my heart, and it is just that the mouths of such great masters, who desecrate God's word, have to feed in my dung heap; For what is such a man different, who so gladly seeks to shake other people's sin, and does this not at all for the purpose of punishing it and making it better, that is, of sweeping it out and cleansing it or covering it up, but only so that it may stink, and [he] may laugh at the stink and be in good spirits, than a foul-mouthed sow's nose, which, if it finds its jelly under a fence, mows in it with all the pleasure it can get and makes a living out of it 2c.? Just for such service I need the devil and his servants, when they are most wrathful and blaspheme my life to the utmost, and so sweetly laugh at this, I speak no more than: Eat, dear sow, it is cooked for you, as the guest is, so is the cake; although I also do not want to leave the defiance in them, because I still did not want to change my life with the most holy Papist. Praise God, no one can blame me for having violated someone's wife or child, or for having been too close to their honors with words or deeds, so I have also taken from no one what is his, except that I was a monk in error, and fed on alms with the damned spiritual life and masses, so I have also killed no one, nor beaten no one, nor helped or advised to kill. But this is my sin, that I eat flesh on the fast days of the fathers, and see no evil, but am merry, that is to say, I feast, and am merry.

But no one can be a pope, he must at least be a murderer, robber, persecutor, for he must consent to do right to him whom the pope and his mob burn, drive out, take away his own, and persecute in all ways, without which they themselves still need all their foundation in the ungodly being unjustly. If then the tree is to be known by its fruit, it is, I think, sufficiently evident where the true Christians are; we neither kill nor drive out nor persecute anyone who teaches differently from us, or causes sectarianism, but only fight against them with the word of God; if they do not want to, we let them go and let them stay in whatever faith they want, but still do them the best we can, let them live and work and live among us; to whom does the pope's mob do this? Yes, they fight with the sword alone, like the Turk, and not with the word of God, and can defend their faith in no other way than by killing, burning, chasing, and persecuting, and yet they want to be called Christians. If then the fruits of their faith are Murdering, burning, chasing away, persecuting, and every one must approve of this who wants to be a papal Christian, it is, I think, clear enough that they are the devil's Christians, and, as I have said, that I did not want to interpret 1) with the most holy Papist, if he would perform miraculous signs; for they are the ones on whom all innocent blood will come, as Christ says, which has been shed since the time of Habel.

I do not say this to justify myself, even if I were still holier, for Christ shall remain my righteousness, but that I do not want to let the papists everywhere be justified in their defiance, neither before God nor before the world, and that, just as our heretical doctrine is in one piece better than all their best doctrine, so also our life, since it stinks most sinfully, is better than all their holiness, since it is like a pure balm. But enough of that this time. Let us hear her praiseworthy counsel, and tell it word for word, as it is delivered to me, and then go on with it.

If the council of the Mainz priesthood follows the articles by a high dignified chapter at Mainz, the twelve Mainz provinces cathedral chapter and common clergy, the decreed and skilful, are to be held, the following measure is to be advised by a common assembly.

First of all, since without the grace of the Almighty God nothing good can be attained, it is the good concern of all of them that through the ordinary offices of the Masses or otherwise, as may be the occasion of the Chapter of the Cathedral, the Almighty should be most humbly invoked and asked to acquire and attain divine grace and this complaint 1) desired and useful endowment.

Item, the following, that each cathedral chapter, for measurable, courageous reasons, of which the authorities here in Mainz have received sufficient report, shall work with archbishops or bishops, princes or rulers, with serious diligence, to withdraw from them those whom they find adherent to the Lutheran doctrine and sect, of ecclesiastical or secular status, in their courts or otherwise in offices, and instruct them to abstain from it; If, however, they do not do so, they shall then suspend them, remove them, and no longer keep them in their halls; they shall also order the same to be done with their subjects.

1) In the original: "weighted down, coveted".

Item, every cathedral chapter, also other chapters, if some person among them would be dependent on or suspected of this seditious sect, shall turn them away from it and avert them; but if they would not leave it or would not purgitate themselves of the suspicion, then they shall no longer tolerate or suffer the same with them.

Item, it is considered necessary and almost conducive to the cause that each cathedral chapter apply to its archbishop or bishop with special diligence, and also decree for itself, as far as it is concerned, without any omission, that the rebellious Lutheran preachers be expelled, driven out, and no longer permitted to preach anywhere in their bishopric, principality, district, territories, and churches, even if a secular authority has ordered these preachers to be expelled in their districts of their bishopric or district, contrary to the Emperor's mandates, edicts, and decrees. Maj.'s mandates, edicts and orders, 2) that the same superiors be described and admonished not to tolerate or hold such preachers any longer, but to take them into custody by Kais. Maj.'s command to take them into custody and to keep them.

Item, for the sake of the grievance and repugnance which the common clergy and ecclesiastical state of the Mainz diocese and province has evidently encountered from ecclesiastical and secular authorities, and which has also been more than deceptively oppressed 3), the Assembly has, for the purpose of averting the same, generally considered with temporal counsel that each cathedral chapter should call upon its archbishop or bishop, admonish and request with the utmost diligence that their Elector and F.G., as it is their duty and obligation to do so, will show and communicate gracious help, advice and support, and as they consider it should be done accordingly:

First, that Archduke Ferdinandus as Governor of the Holy Roman Empire should by no means be circumvented, but should be petitioned with intercessors of reported archbishops and bishops for 4) intercession and promotion to Kais. Maj., because his F. G. has little consequence or obedience with the secular sovereigns.

2) advance - advance.

3) "oppressed" put by us instead of: afflicted. It would also like to be read "oppressed".

4) "in order to" put by us instead of: and.

Item, that thereafter two embassies would be ordered and chosen in the most beneficial way, which with the advice and help of the archbishops and bishops from the common of the ordinaries and capitulars together with the common clergy of the Mainz monastery and provinces would be sent to present, bag and board the improvement to a papal holiness, to which the common clergy of the German nation and especially the Mainz monastery and provinces are entitled, and to ask for gracious paternal guidance, counsel, and consolation, and because at this time and in the course of the see of Rome the jurisdiction, supremacy, and authority of the German nation is unfortunately held in low esteem, humbly request that His Holiness write to our most gracious Lord, the Roman Emperor, and paternally admonish him as Supreme Bailiff and Protector of the Roman Church, and enable him to appear with gracious assistance to the common clergy and the German nation, and especially to the province of Mainz, and to decree by serious mandate that the complaints, harassment and oppression inflicted on the clergy of the German nation by secular and ecclesiastical authorities, and which they were obliged to inflict daily, be completely averted, refrained from and abolished.

That also another embassy be ordered and sent to Kais. Maj. in Hispania be ordered and sent, with sufficient instruction, to attract in the most submissive and movable manner the trouble, affliction and repugnance so common clerics encounter and are daily inflicted by the sovereignty of the temporal and ecclesiastical state, and for this reason to request assistance and counsel and gracious provision in the most submissive manner; and for improvement and temporal counsel the deputies of the committee observe that the instruction is to be put in this form, as follows:

Instruction, what the deputies of the cathedral chapters and common clergy of the archdiocese and other monastery churches and bishops of the provinces of Mainz should request from Kais. Maj., our most gracious Lord, what they are to request, solicit, and most humbly request:

First of all, they shall announce to Kais. Maj., our most gracious Lord, our subservient, guilty and entirely willing services in all obedience, with the wish that the Almighty God may grant His Kais. Maj. blissful government, and against their enemies and the enemies of the Holy Roman Empire, as well as the enemies of the Christian name, with joy and gladness, and with the offering of our humble prayer to God.

After that they shall tell Kais. Majesty and most humbly state that we have no doubt that His Imperial Majesty has knowledge of what one, called M. Luther, of the Augustinian Order, has been doing for some years now. Maj. has knowledge of what one, called M. Luther, of the Augustinian order, has now for some years been stirring up in Christian doctrine and writings against the holy Christian orders and faith, previously condemned and rejected by common conciliation, thereby seducing many pious and also great violent hearts and making them adherent to his heretical, stirring doctrine, for which reason H. K. M., at the Imperial Diet held at Worms, issued public mandates and edicts against Martin Luther, his doctrine and followers at high penalties. Luther, his doctrine and followers public mandates and edicts have been issued at high penalties. But, these mandates and edicts notwithstanding, the common clergy in the archdiocese of Mainz and its provinces were viciously harassed by the secular authorities out of Lutheran doctrine and teachings with unmistakable difficulties, led to ruin, and were obliged to be completely driven out and exterminated. For this reason we, the clergy, declare to S. Kais. Maj., as the supreme protector and protector of the Holy Christian Church, of the common clergy and of all Christendom, to appeal for help and to ask most humbly and diligently for rejection of the inflicted grievances, "most humbly" trusting, S. Kais. Maj, ...out of innate Christian virtue, which His Majesty... of the most noble, most powerful Roman Emperors, of the House of Austria and Burgundy, also Christian Kings of Hispania, Jerusalem and Sicily, out of paternal and maternal nature, will graciously move and take to heart such unchristian behaviour, burdening and oppression, and will so see to it and earnestly procure that we common clergy will be relieved of it and, contrary to equity 1) and Christian order, will no longer be burdened or oppressed. So that also Kais. Maj.

If we are to have a clear knowledge and understanding of the harassment and rape, as well as the repulsions, which we of the common clergy encounter every day, H. K. M. the competent persons shall report such harassment and oppression 1) from article to article, as follows:

First, that the secular authorities, adhering to the Lutheran doctrine, contain preachers who preach against all Christian order, that priests take wives, and that monks and nuns are eavesdropped from the monasteries; 2) that baptism and mass are not to be held according to the Christian order, as before, but in German, 2) that they communicate each person under both forms of the sacrament without prior confession, that one should not grasp, not confess, not pray, nor keep vows and oaths made and taken, nor call upon nor honor the Mother of God and other saints, that churches, cloisters and monasteries should be demolished and completely destroyed, and that other heresies should be imagined among the people; If such a thing were to happen and not occur, there would be great concern that rioting, rebellion, and the complete destruction and annihilation of the clergy would ensue, as some secular authorities tore down such monasteries, took out the monks, and drove them away, giving them Victualia for the rest of their lives, and otherwise appropriating to them all rents and estates.

Item, that some secular sovereigns of the ecclesiastical goods, tithe, interest, fee, and other charges are loaded and occupied with secular burdens, unlawful impositions, and encumbrances, which they force and compel the ecclesiastical persons to pay and give by their own force.

Item, that in some places they appropriate and take the tithes and other goods of the ecclesiastics for themselves, and will not give or let them be given to those to whom it is rightly due.

Item, that some secular authorities forbid the giving of small tithes to their subjects, and also burden the large tithes and other estates with secular burdens and impositions to such an extent that it is quite impossible for the ecclesiastics to give them.

is infallible; all contrary to common law, custom, and spiritual liberty.

Item, some secular authorities take the tithes of the new or novelties violently to them and in their use, keeping them for the pastors and those to whom it is rightfully due, own authority.

Item, some secular authorities take to them and to their power monasteries, convents and all incomes and pensions of the same, some inventory and describe all interest, pensions and fees, also jewels of the sanctuary, chalices and other things, in charge of the monasteries, convents and churches, which they decide at their pleasure and partly take away, all for the destruction of spiritual life and reduction of worship.

Item, ut supra, deprive and expel the right pastors and parish rulers and put others there by their own power, dependent on Lutheran doctrine and sect, since it cannot be known whether they have ever been ordained or ordained to pastoral dignities and office, who set, undertake and carry out their sermons and other works to nothing but riots, repulsions and revolts.

Item, the ecclesiastical ordinaries are prevented from keeping the holy broadcast, in which the vices and transgressions are to be punished, as by ancient custom, by some secular authorities, who do not want to permit such a broadcast to be kept in their territories.

Item, some secular authorities impose personal and civil burdens on all ecclesiastical persons in their territories, as with guards, gatekeepers, servants, and all other complaints, which they also impose by force and require against ecclesiastical freedom and custom.

Item, some secular rulers put down and do away with all services and offices, wanting that in a city, even where there is a large population, no more than one mass should be held during the day, which is nevertheless difficult to maintain over time.

Item, the ecclesiastical jurisdiction and restraint are completely suppressed and abolished by secular authorities in that they do not want to suffer, tolerate or permit such jurisdiction in their jurisdictions and territories, urge the ecclesiastical persons, without distinction, to seek, give and receive justice in all matters before their secular courts or tribunals, since the ecclesiastics are helped slowly and no beneficial rights.

Although it is also well provided by common imperial law and the order is that to the right 1) sufficiently prescribed possessions, as law is presented and produced, are considered and held for true title, as if letters and seals were indicated over it, nevertheless such prescriptions are considered and held for void by some secular authorities, who want to have presented and produced letters and seals all the way, and do not judge on the prescriptions founded in imperial law.

Item, some secular sovereigns forbid that their subjects are not allowed to cut or lay anything in the churches, their building and otherwise for the preservation of good works, that also the church courts are not held for this purpose.

Because now everything and anything is done for the suppression and extermination of Christian faith and common spiritual status, and the spiritual persons, where they are deprived of temporal nourishment, would be completely suppressed, and could also no longer abstain, which nevertheless Kais. Maj. and other Roman Emperors, his Maj. ancestors, of high noble memory, have in all respects rendered submissive obedience, and have also been warranted with mature services and other presentations before others, as a common clergy of the German nation is once again obliged and willing to do, and then Kais. Maj. if the clergy of the German nation were thus to be exterminated, not a small part of the obedience would be withdrawn, we also, the clergy, in these remote great adversities and distresses, would have no one else but S. Kais. Maj. as our most gracious Lord, supreme bailiff and protector of the Church and the Christian faith, in whom we place all our comfort, hope and welfare. Maj. our most gracious Lord, most humbly and diligently request-that his Kais. Maj. the common clergy of the German nation, and especially here with gracious assistance, graciously wished to abolish and prevent such harassment, oppression, and rapacious oppression, and for this reason he has seriously issued mandates, orders, and letters of command against some secular authorities, who were to be denounced by the deputies, especially under high penalties, namely with the forfeiture of all their regalia, privileges, dignities, fiefs and rights, also with eight and eight with deputation of some executors, In which the same rulers are commanded with great seriousness to put an end to the complaints, harassment, rape and oppression against the ecclesiastics and theirs, and to decree immediately that they also deprive the ecclesiastics, monasteries, convents and churches of interest, annuities, income, tithes and dues, or otherwise inflict damage, to restore them to their hands and to restore them to their former status and to let them remain there, and also otherwise, as Kais. Ma. out of high intellect and princely mind, and graciously help and see to it that we remain with our spiritual liberties and food and henceforth are no longer harassed or violated by the secular sovereigns. Such for the sake of the Emperor. Maj. we, the common clergy, in all submissiveness and obedience, to the best of our ability, also with humble prayer to God and His Maj. with blessed government and long-lasting health, with desired victories and overcoming of their adversaries and enemies, and otherwise to earn in the most submissive manner, always eagerly, willingly and undauntedly.

Item, it has been discussed by common assembly and deemed good that the skilful embassies name the following 3) Electors and Princes as executors and ask them to give their consent to this matter before Kais. Maj., 4) namely the three Electors on the Rhine, Cologne, Trier and Palatinate, also Margrave Joachim of Brandenburg, Electors, also Archduke Ferdinand-dus, Duke Wilhelm and Ludwigh of Bavaria, Duke Jörgen of Saxony and the Dukes of Eleve.

Because also this rebellious, heretical doctrine originated and began mostly from the four mendicant orders' exuberant 1) freedom, so that they are granted by the See of Rome, called maro maZnum, in which they are exiled and withdrawn from all ordinary jurisdiction, for which reason they are completely subject to no one, have free life, and want to preach, perform and act everything according to their will and pleasure, caused and grown up, as it is obvious and undeniable, even future time, when it would remain so and with timely advice would not degenerate, still greater harm is to be feared: ...let the skillful of Caesar's... Maj. most earnestly request and ask that His Majesty most earnestly and diligently request and exhort Papal Holiness to pass and revoke such privileges of the four mendicant orders, called maZaum nmro, and to completely abolish them, and to make the said four orders subject to diocesanies and ordinaries.

Item, in addition to the given instruction, the skilful shall also work with Kais. Maj. with great diligence that the complaint of a venerable cathedral chapter at Hildesheim by Kais. Maj. will be graciously heeded, and they will be relieved of the burden of Kais. Maj.'s fatigue be graciously shown and communicated, namely that Kais. Maj. has appointed two commissioners or interrogators to hear the matters between the bishop and the monastery of Hildesheim and to hear the cases of the opposing parties, and also to help them to the right with the suspension of the guardianship and defences against the bishop and the monastery of Hildesheim, all according to the content of the information, by means of a venerable chapter of the cathedral of Hildesheim.

Item, for the sake of the prebend recently incorporated by papal sanctity into the University of Ingolstadt in the cathedral chapter of Augsburg; because the seditious heretical doctrine and sects, which in many parts come from the universities, are planted and practiced therein.

let the competent persons report to the Emperor. Maj. and most humbly request that His Maj. through their Oratores make and act upon an appeal to Papal Holiness to revoke and approve such incorporation, and not to further burden the Emperor's Cathedral Chapter 2) of Augsburg with it, and also to further act upon the information of a venerable Cathedral Chapter of Augsburg.

Item, it is decided by common collection that to this sending and other emergency needs a common stop of the archbishopric Mainz and provinces is to be put.

So also both monasteries Bamberg and Basel, although they are partly exempt and do not belong to the province of Mainz, have been dependent on the province in common ecclesiastical complaints and have contributed, it is considered good that both above-mentioned cathedral monasteries be described and be requested by message to hear from them what they want to do about it.

It is also considered necessary that the Instruction to Kais. Maj. in Latin and that the two, namely one in Latin and one in German, be sealed with the insignia of three bishops.

Item, common assembly have also decided and decreed unanimously, in view of the fact that some cathedral churches of this province of Mainz are far from Mainz, that every skilful person shall bring this action and advice to his cathedral chapter, the answer and what they will obtain from their bishops and princes, together with the money which they would be obliged to give, between here and the new year's day shall be sent and delivered to a venerable cathedral chapter at Mainz without delay or hindrance, namely Mainz three hundred florins, Würzburg one and a half hundred florins, Constance one and a half hundred florins, Eystett one hundred florins, Worms one hundred florins, Halberstadt one hundred florins, Verden one hundred florins, Augsburg one hundred florins, Hildesheim one hundred florins, Chur 4) fifty florins, Summarum 1500 and 7 florins.

Well, that is a wise counsel. If the bishop of Strasbourg had been there, who would have thought that the devil could make such wise men? But methinks there is one thing forgotten, which is of some consequence, and if I had been in the council, it should have been there too; But it does no harm, if I report it afterwards, and it is just this, because the spiritual state is everywhere so utterly despised because of its shameful life and seductive doctrine, that even the children in the street make a carnival play out of it, and everyone now understands that they are a useless people, who only feed their bellies and serve no one, and that they are an unmistakable burden and burden to country and people, so that the saying Psalm 105 [Ps. 107, 40.] goes mightily over them: "God pours contempt on princes," would have been considered good, or still almost good, but that two embassies were erected, one to Kais. Maj. complaining how the common priesthood is so miserably despised in all hearts and is taken for nothing but idols, so that even the princes and lords who are on their side do not think anything of him unless they have a good greave on their cabbage [to make it fat], for God's sake they let [them] have everything that the soldiers use to pray. Therefore Kais. Maj. graciously helped that all the world should think no less of them than of St. Peter 2) and St. Paul, regardless of the fact that they are public desperate knaves and murderers, and that the apostles were holy men.

The other one would have to be sent to God in heaven and let him say that he wanted to revoke his word in the above-mentioned psalm, and not pour contempt but honor upon them. To such a message St. Christoffel and the great Carolus would be good, especially if St. Christoffel came with a great, great sack full of masses and rosaries, and Carolus with his great sword, perhaps God would be afraid of such giants and turn back his word and not let it go so brutally over the poor clergy. These two embassies would be more necessary, and all costs and efforts would be to turn. For what good would it be, if the priests had all the good in the world, if they were despised by everyone and kept like dung on the gaff? Let a man rather be a scoundrel than a great rich priest, who must be every man's idol and proverb.

Such would have been my counsel; but they would have thought that I mocked them, and would have burned me as a Lutheran, and cast me angrily into hell, for indeed it is not good to jest with such wise gentlemen. But what shall I do? I would not look upon the priests all in one heap with all their angry patrons, that I should write a word for their sakes, for I despise them ever so highly, as high as they are to me. But because I see that Satan, through them, as through his larvae, so shamefully lies, blasphemes, and is angry, and also likes to cause great misery, I will again mock him and expose him with fine lies behind and in front, so that everyone may beware, and see what kind of boys my ungracious lords are in the skin.

First, this is not to be concealed from me, 3) that they call my doctrine heretical and seditious. For Christ also would not be silent, because the Jews give John 8 his doctrine to the devil, but excuses it. So I also say here that my lords lie, nor is there any honest man who can accuse me of this, 4) that I have preached heretically and seditiously. Nor can anyone teach me that I am justly defiant; God grant that, be it emperor, king, pope, prince, or bishop, it is a lie when they say it. So it is known not only in German lands, but also in foreign kingdoms, that I was freely condemned at the Diet of Worms, even though I appeared there and offered myself for interrogation and justice, but there the power of the priests was exercised and no justice. You have, dear lords, done a piece with me that is written in Adamant and will never be erased, nor will you be silent until you all become dust that the wind scatters. Imperial escort ye left me not altogether, and sat there like the larvae and Idols around the youngest man Emperor Charles, who did not understand such a thing, had to do what you liked, and condemned me without all right, as your consciences are my witnesses, unheard, unrecognized. So many idols had not so much sense all together, that they could have answered or let hear, [let alone 1] report or overcome a single poor beggar, whom they had nevertheless in their hands. Pooh to the eternal shame of all priests and pontiffs!

It is well known that not all the estates of the empire agreed to my doctrine of condemnation, but the best heads, especially of the secular estates, did not sign; But you, the larvae, have joined heads with some lords, like a mob, and have driven the emperor to such a sacrilegious judgment that the noble Duke Friederich of Saxony, Elector, of blessed memory, has said in one place that he had never seen a more childish thing in his life than in such a transaction at Worms, and could now well see how one acts in the churches, namely, that the priests rule. For this reason, although he kept silent, he no longer thought much of the churches. There were also many other great lords who were sorry for such dealings, and yet they could not oppose them, as I have heard myself, so that I may say with joy: I am not condemned at Worms by the Reich's judgment as a heretic; for it was not a common unanimous judgment. It was not a common, unanimous sentence passed and signed by all the estates, as it should have been, because the estates did not agree on which of them was most important in the whole empire, but there was a council of princes and bishops, who needed the emperor for their will. For this reason, the same commandment was not strong, for the consciences were captivated when they knew that it was unlawful and a purely priestly act, so that it was almost alleviated and tempered by another commandment at Nuremberg, for the consciences could not stand such a thing. This also proves the fruit and experience; for soon after this false judgment of the priests, my teaching began to be right, and went on, and became brighter than it had ever been, until monasteries and masses were overthrown, and the piety became such a despised thing, as before the eyes, that one may grasp how God has made my cause righteous, which is condemned by the devil and his idols. This is what I want to say about the lies that they call my doctrine heretical, for they cannot prove that it is condemned by the judgment of human authority (I will keep silent about the divine judgment) as by the unanimous judgment of the kingdom. But that some princes of the Romans and bishops of the Reds have condemned me, I wipe my shoes.

But the fact that they seditiously blaspheme my doctrine is also their pure courageous will to adorn themselves and to receive discredit against me, because they know nothing else to bring up, for they will never be able to prove it, and so they themselves know differently. And indeed, if it were only up to me, I would keep quiet about it, and rejoice in their wanton lies, and be satisfied with their own conscience, which knows otherwise. For the gospel must have the name in the world, that it is called rebellious and blasphemed, although everyone knows that it is not so, so that they may flittingly and confidently sin in the Holy Spirit and be hardened, lest they should repent and be utterly destroyed. So Christ himself also had to be accused of sedition and brought before Pilate, although Pilate knew and found in the interrogation that it was not true; but it did not help, he had to die as a seditionist and be counted among the murderers, so that a seditious title was also written over him. So surely and firmly did they wish to make it known to the people that he was a rebel. But what did it profit the Jews? Elias the prophet also had to be called rebellious, because he preached against King Ahab. St. Paul and his followers were also called rebellious, as Lucas writes in actis. Since our Head Jesus Christ, with his prophets and apostles, had to endure rebellion himself, we should not be dismayed that we are also rebelliously reproached, but be glad that we suffer the same from our Satan that Christ suffered with his apostles, because not only ours, but also the apostles, are rebellious.

even the conscience of the enemy knows well that we're innocent.

But for the sake of others, and to harden the idols the more, I will answer for such blasphemy. For the more the vipers hear the truth, the more blind they become. And this little piece should also calm a blinded and obdurate heart sufficiently, so that they must confess, see and grasp that here in Wittenberg and where I preach, there has been no rebellion, and still by the grace of God it is as quiet as in no other place in the world. Where I now teach, there should be most of all turmoil and unrest, since my teaching goes on most strongly every day, and I myself am present. But that does not help, such public truth and proof is too strong against their lies and makes them ashamed, therefore it does not have to apply, their lies should and must be right. Now now, what such blasphemy will help them, shall come to light in time, as it is written to the Jews. So three years ago I wrote the booklet on worldly authority, long before the uprising came, in which I established and confirmed worldly authority and obedience from the Scriptures in such a way that it alone is strong enough testimony for me against such blasphemy. For I respect that no teacher before me ever wrote so powerfully of worldly authority that even my enemies must have thanked me for it. And if some of the authorities had not been strengthened by this when the riots were raging, they should also have become despondent and continued to concede to the peasants. There are many more books and writings, also with names against the rebellion. So there is still the book to the German nobility, in which I admonish the nobility, and that through prayer to God, for the reformation of the German country. With all this, the mouths of the blasphemers 1) are shut enough and I am amply pardoned.

And who stood stronger against the peasants with writings and preaching than I? I have been in the midst of them, and have passed through them with my life and limb. They never let me tell them that they had it from me. So also in Frankenhausen and Mühl-

Hausen, that the mintman had not to do with me. Yes, he was more violent and bitter toward me than toward any other man. What the devil did through him was also most true of my 2) head. But I put a block in front of him by the grace of God, even before worldly authority came. And if it should be a boast, I would not yet know who had beaten the peasants first and more. Now they take the glory that have done the least; and they that have done the best must now have the reward that they have rebellious doctrine. But it is right. Go, go, you are on the right track, you must run if you want to break your neck.

So it is also publicly true that the coiner, although he began in Alstädt in our prince's land, God drove him away so that he had to leave, and came into Duke Jörgen's land to Mühlhausen and caused such misery in his principality. Where were there angry princes and lords who defended him? So it is true that the rebellion did not arise in our principality nor in Hesse, but came from Franconia over the forest and from Mühlhausen and the line here to Duke Jörgen's land, and thus also threw down and set fire to our prince's land as the border. Yes, that is why the rebellion has come to us, since the gospel has been rejected to the highest degree. I must tell the truth, and if 5) Count Albrecht of Mansfeld, who at that time was the first to put on the armor, had not done so, 6) it would have been the Duke of Mansfeld.

2) In our prelims: "my".

3) This is the passage that Luther remembers in the above-mentioned letter to the Elector: "I had resolved not to think of Duke George any further, for his thought is in the closest printed copies of the "Rathschlag". Duke George had known how to procure a copy of the "Rathschlag", and this caused a longer correspondence between him and the Elector.

4) Manuscript: "ober".

5) It is highly probable that instead of "hätt", which the Erlanger offers here, "thät" (thet or thett) will be found in the original; this means: "if Count Albrecht were not there". We have refrained from a change, because the reading we have assumed is incomprehensible today not only to laymen, but also to highly learned people. Compare St. Louis edition, vol. V, 668, K 34, note and idiae, Col. 1191, 8 28. Of course, with the reading "thäte" the addition made would be omitted.

6) "not done" is missing in the original. (Erlang. Ausg.)

In eight days Jörgе had so little power up to Bohemia, as none of the other lords, who were overwhelmed; so horribly dwindling ran the tiresome fire. But then it gained a push and resistance, because the praiseworthy count took hold of it; now in time one should also give him his reward and thanks, as the wolf gave to the crane, and as the world is wont to reward all honest pious people who do the best by it, according to the saying: He who helps the thief from the gallows, the thief gladly brought him up. He must also become rebellious and keep rebellious doctrine, regardless of the fact that he has done the first and best against rebellion and punishes its blasphemous mouth with undeniable work. 2)

But if we want to hear the truth, I would like to say who is the cause of this uproar and lamentation. The first is that God was enraged at the 3) priests at Worms, since they also condemned me 4) outrageously, contrary to natural law, and blasphemed and desecrated God's Word, after which they drove out and persecuted the evangelical preachers. Because they did not want to suffer God's word and right preachers, God did as was just and right and sent rebellious preachers who, under the appearance of the gospel, caused such misery as the false apostles did, to bring punishment on the clergy and clergymen, even though many innocent people 5) had to pay for it, because they were followers of the wicked and kept silent about such clerical outrages and did not support the truth. For the rebellion of the peasants was only a beginning of punishment and God's wrath, and also a warning that they should desist from their raving and blasphemy and let God's word go, or else he would seek them out with a sharp rod. I am not saying that they should believe me, but only that they should be more hardened 6) and not believe until they know. For God is just, and cannot do wrong.

And as he hath been able to bring punishment upon the peasants in a flash, so he may yet come upon them unawares, that they shall perish before they know it, as it is written in Job.

In addition to this, the evil that the life of the priests was evil, diabolical, tyrannical, was unmistakable to all the world, so that even the secular nobility of Worms acted before the emperor himself; there was no thought of improving or abating anything, but was always pressed, beaten, scraped, so that no one was safe from his wife, child, property, body, and the secular lords were not much more pious. Because they themselves did not want to give up their shameful, abominable, tyrannical nature, and did not allow others to hear the gospel and teach them to live well, but oppressed both body and soul of their subjects with all injustice, outrage, and violence, they pressed and forced the rebellion out by force, and went, as Solomon says, Proverb 31 [30, 33]: "He who blows too hard forces blood out." For then the mob became unwilling, and could not bear the tyrants' courage.

But no one can deny that such things were the cause of the uprising, for the peasants publicly mention them in their note, so everyone knows that it is true how innumerable the tyranny of the priests and their followers has been. Now the kittens adorn themselves finely, would gladly conceal such pieces, do not intend to desist even today, now blame the Gospel for what they have aroused by their infallible nature. God must bear it and be in the wrong, so that their evil may remain right. Well, in time he will put it away, and will excuse himself in such a way that neither the priests nor the servants of the priests will remain. This is my prophecy.

And behold their subtle wisdom, 7) they have led it out! They have therefore forbidden my teaching, because they feared sedition, and would sit fast, and keep the mob in check. That was the goodly counsel-punch. Have they not met with it? Yea, even as Solomon saith, What the wicked feareth shall come upon him; even as it came upon the Jews, when 1) they followed the wise counsel of Caiaphas; lest the Romans came and took away their land and people, they had to kill Christ. And so it is.

827 Luther's concerns about what the Elector of Saxony should do to the Catholic bishops. 1526 or later.

This concern is found in the Eisleben edition, Vol. I, p. 276; in the Altenburger, Vol. III, p. 520; in the Leipziger, Vol. XIX, p. 556; in De Wette, Vol. III, p. 315 and in the Erlanger, Vol. 53, p. 449. The Eisleben edition places it above the Mainzer Rathschlag (1526), De Wette and the Erlanger above the Packsche Bündniß (1528). We find in the same neither for the one nor the other a clue.

(1) Whether it should not be good that my most gracious lord should take such an action against the bishops who are encroaching on the lands of his electoral grace, and should petition them in writing and have them denounced, since they have done nothing in the evangelical cause up to now, and have omitted to supply his electoral grace with the word of God. His Electoral Grace was forced to forestall riots, discord and all kinds of trouble (arising from unequal doctrine), even to do the best they could in the greatest need.

002 But that they might yet see for abundance that his electoral grace sought nothing but that in the lands of his electoral grace, for the salvation of the poor souls, the same gospel was held. But that they might still see for abundance that his electoral grace sought nothing but that in his electoral grace's lands, for the salvation of the poor souls, the gospel and the same doctrine might be held, and lived peaceably, in harmony: then his electoral grace would still be inclined or desirous that they themselves, the bishops, should take care of their office, 1 Timothy 1:1, and promote and help such gospel in his electoral grace's lands, and teach and help such gospel in his electoral grace's lands. 1, and in the lands of his princely grace promote and help to teach such a gospel and to keep peace, as they owe before God and the world, because they want to be bishops and shepherds.

003 But where they would not that they should then mean, that it might be his churfürst-

The bishops, as a secular prince, suffer as little in his princely lands discord and unequal teaching contrary to the Gospel, as little as they themselves can suffer in their dioceses 2c., and they, the bishops, thus urge H. C. F. Gn. with the utmost necessity to see to it themselves, lest H. C. F. Gn. also be found guilty before God of such neglect on the part of the bishops of his electoral subjects.

(4) Such things, I think, should not be useless for more glorification before the world and for more consolation of the conscience: so that one could boast that all ways have been tried to please the bishops, as much as God's word suffers it.

3. The 1) Origin and beginning, of which the first flowed most and highest, Martin Luther, out of imperial clemency before his imperial majesty, other princes, princes and estates of the holy empire, to Worms to the imperial diet, in escort and most gracious good security (although his imperial majesty, over previous amicable and gracious admonition, by papal holiness to the same Martin Luther, was not guilty of this) to the responsibility graciously let come; there, after recounting some of his "most false and seductive" articles in imperial majesty's [name], 2) and subsequently by a prince and other honorable learned persons, graciously and brotherly instructed, to refrain from such his unrighteous behaviour, to consider himself, and to revoke his outgoing unchristian books and writings, which, from the praiseworthy examples of the holy fathers, would certainly follow him for the preservation of his soul, honour and body,

Therefore, the Imperial Majesty, together with all the Princes, Princes, and Estates of the Holy Empire, as mentioned above, have been caused, with timely counsel and good forethought, to separate Martin Luther from the community of the Christian faithful, to reject him, to confiscate him, and to put him under guard, on account of his booklets and unchristian teachings; Also to forbid his and his followers' and successors' books, along with other unseemly paintings and letters, to be printed, traded, bought, sold, read, and kept, with severe penalties,

And especially new, frightful, outrageous doctrines, which are not to be revealed nor reported to us on account of the impudent blasphemy, and which we have heard with quite a heavy mind, arise, among which are the regeneration of baptism and abuse of the reverend sacrament of the tender Corpus Christi. And, what is still more grievous, by some who follow Carolostadio, Zwinglio, and Oecolampadio, and their followers, they even reject, deny, and speak of it in a vicious and contemptuous manner, that neither the holy body of Christ, nor his blood, is in the sacrament of the altar under the form of bread and wine.

8. But now that it is evident and in the light of day that baptism in the fellowship of the holy Christian church from the time of the apostles, as it is still held in custom by all Christendom, is not contrary to but in harmony with the gospel, and that two hundred years ago rebaptism was not only condemned by the holy fathers, who proved their faith with their honorable good Christian life and bloodshed, but also by the emperor's right hand (as their writing shows) as heretical, who have proved their faith with their honorable, good, Christian life and bloodshed, but also by the imperial laws (as their writing indicates) condemned it as heretical, but on the other hand allowed and approved infant baptism, such as comes to us from distant parents and forefathers, as Christian. Thus also the holy and worthy sacrament of the altar is instituted by Christ, true God and man, our Redeemer, at his last supper, to be enjoyed by us in remembrance of his suffering and the forgiveness of our sins, and last of all, his body and blood are confessed. This also the four Gospels, together with St. Paul, in many places clearly and undoubtedly express, and our parents,

With all devotion they have used, believed, given and received. Even out of contempt for him, many long and short years ago, considerable signs have followed and come to pass.

9. Where then such things are to be despised, scorned, abused, or not kept by you as believers in Christ, you must consider that such things, together with the highest blasphemy, would certainly be sufficient to endanger your souls, honor, and bodies, and also all your lives, that you (as unfortunately appears in many places) would fall into much more and graver error, seduction, and blasphemy against our holy faith, and, as to be feared, would finally, without all knowledge of God, our Savior, live like cattle on the earth, and consume your time. Because, as mentioned above, such articles were considered heretical and condemned many hundreds of years ago, and were prevented and forbidden not only by spiritual, but also by imperial laws, at grave and highest penalties to honor, life, limb, and property.

010 Namely, that ye may receive remembrance and knowledge of them in part, as is reported. Whoever freely and persistently holds and believes against the twelve articles of our holy Christian faith, 1) also against the seven sacraments of the common, holy Christian church, is thereby duly recognized as a heretic. That he may be punished in body and life according to the occasion and magnitude of his sacrilege, hardening, blasphemy, and heresy; item, who in the above 2) opinion is found to be a heretic, as is proper, and is recognized that his goods are forfeited and confiscated according to the order and difference of rights; item, that every heretic, as recognized above, is put to death; item, that he loses all liberties given to Christians; item, that he is dishonorable, and therefore not fit for any honest office, nor may he be used; item, that no one is obliged to hold or execute any bonds or other bonds; item, that he has no power to buy, sell, or carry on any trade or business; item, that he has no testament, 3) or business, or last will and testament, nor to make any other 4) testament, or last will and testament, which may be of use to him; item, that he has no right to make any other will and testament, nor to make any other will and testament, nor to make any other will and testament, nor to make any other will and testament, nor to make any other will and testament.

2) In the old edition: "transcribed".

3) According to 8 16 this is to be understood by "bearing witness".

4) In the old edition: "other".

The same shall not be able to do so; item, that a father who believes in Christ may legally disinherit his son who is a heretic of all his father's property, and contrary to this, a son may disinherit his father in the same case.

(11) Now that such penalties and punishments have been set and decreed only for the chief heretics, and other new unchristian articles have arisen and are being used against our holy faith and holy Christian order, and because of the punishments imposed in such cases there is no doubt, lack of understanding or doubt on the part of the authorities, we have graciously considered and decreed the punishments due to some of the transgressions. We earnestly admonish and wish to punish with fire, without any mercy, those who, with impudent speeches, sermons, and writings, attack or despise the divinity or humanity of Christ, or the birth, passion, resurrection, ascension, and similar articles of the same. Those who despise, defile, or revile the eternal, pure, and chosen Queen Virgin Mary by saying, preaching, writing, or preaching that she was a woman like any other woman now on earth, that she was a mortal sinner, that she did not remain an eternal virgin after her birth, that she did not give birth to God, and that she did not go to heaven, shall be punished for these and similar heresies and errors in body, life, or property, according to the occasion and magnitude of the offense.

(12) Those who despise, reject, and speak shamefully of the Mother of God, Mary, apostles, evangelists, martyrs, and other dear saints of God, as well as their merit, intercession, and proven miraculous signs, shall be punished with imprisonment, banishment from the country, and other punishments, according to the occasion of the crime. If any one shall change or alter the form or order of baptism, mass, or holy chrismation, other than that which has been instituted of old in the Christian church, he shall be punished, according to the form of the act of alteration, with imprisonment, banishment from the country, or other punishment. Item, who, according to heretical opinion, commit the Lord's supper (as they call it), so that they give and take bread and wine to one another, they shall be punished as heretics in body, life, and goods, and the houses in which such things are committed shall be confiscated, or, according to our pleasure, torn down to eternal remembrance.

013 Item, in which places the baptismal fonts, sacramental houses, and altars are pulled down, they shall be restored, with the forfeiture of all liberty, in months of the year.

The time limit is to be set. All those who have not been ordained priests according to the order of the Christian church, and who nevertheless consider that they have the power to consecrate the reverend sacrament, as has unfortunately happened in many places in an unlawful and intentional manner, shall be punished by fire, sword, or water, according to the judgment of the judges. If anyone despises priestly confession and does not do so at least once a year according to the order of the church, or if anyone goes to the sacrament without priestly confession, he shall be punished with imprisonment, banishment from the place of his residence, or other penalties to the estate. If any monk or priest shall have thrown away his habit or priestly habit, or shall have let it become overgrown, or shall have taken wives, and shall not be found to be a priest, they shall be accepted, and shall be kept in prison with water and bread for one month, after which the priests shall be deprived of their benefices (whether or not they have them); and the monks who have entered the country in which they have fallen out of their orders shall be sent back thither to their authorities for further punishment, according to their orders and rules. But those who had fallen out of the country, and the priests mentioned above, according to the recent order of Regensburg, would be eternally expelled from the country. The same shall be done with their wives. Unless they fall into other heresies, they shall be punished like other heretics, according to their crime.

014 If any man shall take a husband more than a wife, or again a wife more than a husband, they shall be punished according to the custom and usage of the country. Neither shall anyone who, contrary to the order of the Christian church, dwells with one another in forbidden degrees of friendship, kinship, or affinity, be punished, but shall be expelled from the country. If anyone destroys, burns, or otherwise changes the image of our Lord Jesus Christ on the altar, or the like of our Lady and other saints, he shall be punished according to his crime against his body or goods. Those who, during the forty days of the holy fast, on Fridays or Saturdays, or on other forbidden fast days, eat meat unlawfully to the annoyance of their neighbors, shall be punished in prison with water and bread for as many days as they have done so.

015 He that preacheth and holdeth that no Christian should go and fight against the Turks, or against other infidels, shall be punished with the law.

and otherwise be punished. Anyone who has acted unjustly and defended that nothing good should happen to the poor souls, nor bring them any merit or benefit, should be chased out of the country and driven away. And when in various times great revolts and terrible bloodshed arose from the fact that Christian liberty was spread among the common people with false doctrine, as if all things were common and no authority should be, which doctrine is then again in many places imagined in the corners of the poor unintelligent: therefore we set and will whoever holds or teaches such, and is convicted of it, that he shall be judged with the sword, as the imperial laws otherwise express and are able to do.

(16) We will also remind you of the penalties and punishments imposed by secular law on those who contain, house, defend, protect, and guard such heretics. Namely, and first of all, that they are under ban, where they despise amicable admonition, do not accept it, and after such admonition remain for more than a year, ipso cuoto, and are in footsteps, inknsZ, and deprived of all honors, are not admitted to honest public offices, nor to council, are not admitted to any testimony, may not make any transaction nor last will, which is decided for them, nor be capable of any other inheritance. No one is obligated to answer them in court for any matter whatsoever, but only the law is open against them, that such a person is neither an advocate nor an orator, and does no assistance before the court; item, not to be a notary public, and the same instruments are not valid.

17. According to such known and still much higher penalties and punishments, which are contained in written, 1) especially in ecclesiastical laws, and which we have now and then refrained from reporting, and which we only intend to comply with the imperial ones, we might well have proceeded against those who knowingly transgressed this and made themselves liable to punishment, and also as a praiseworthy Christian prince and king not only ought to do, but also ought not to change, 2) we have nevertheless given the poor unintelligent and simple, ignorant Christian people, who alone are seduced by some wicked, unchristian persons, and are thus falsely and fraudulently instructed under the appearance of the Gospel, the right to be punished.

1) In the old edition: "Penalties, nor those written in" 2c.

who, graciously bearing mercy and compassion, have the gracious confidence which our open prohibition reminds them to stand by, and to avoid such erroneous, seductive articles.

18. Therefore, out of innate weariness and mercy, we are graciously minded to once again send out the most gracious warning to all of you that such seductive teachings and heretical sects, which mostly occur in the corners and secret schools and assemblies of some wicked, wanton, reckless persons, do not satisfy us; and who are not satisfied with the great, miserable bloodshed, which occurs from it every year, but still new mutinies and practices, for the awakening of all disobedience and sedition, from which nothing good ever comes, but all evil, as fire, murder, robbery, and extortion, The authorities are not obliged to tolerate it, nor to let it go on without punishment, but to have the necessary understanding, and are obligated to do so.

(19) Accordingly, we wish to remind all of you, and each of you, especially herewith of your Imperial Majesty, our dear brothers and most gracious Lord, Edict. Majesty, our dear brothers and most gracious Lord, Edict, also reminded you of our mandate, and thereupon graciously admonished you to live, comply with, and carry out the same in all its contents and understandings, and especially the rebaptism (after the holy baptism has been unitedly instituted by God Almighty, and thus, as it stands before, has been held for many hundred years from the time of the holy apostles), also of blasphemy, contempt and abuse of the reverend Sacrament of the Altar, other than that which is accepted and used by the holy Christian Church; In addition to the contemptible speeches that have been made because of it, and other heretical articles that have resulted from it and have been spread at this time, and some of which have been reported above, we have not left it unreported for admonition and warning in the most gracious opinion.

020 For whosoever among you, of high or low estate, shall not obediently keep to such our gracious warning, but shall yield to the seductive sects and doctrines still aforesaid, or shall raise up anew other unheard-of, damned ones, or shall keep, defend, and protect those that have been raised up, and shall thus show themselves repugnant to our holy faith, as that of Christian church fellowship has hitherto been in use, and also repugnant to these our mandates, and shall not turn away or turn back from it, against him or her we will, by ourselves and by our mandates according to the law of the church, give up our holy faith.

appointed attorneys and officials, according to written, especially imperial and secular rights, also announced imperial edicts and superior to our declared prelates, hold justice,

(21) But against the disobedient, our subjects, who witness and permit such, let them proceed with punishment according to the following measure. Thus, if such a person is one of our officers, councillors, servants, stewards, or bailiffs, and such a thing is committed, he shall be deprived from that time on of his service, office, stewardship, or any other provision he may have from us. If it were another of our landmen or subjects, who had to administer the court or the authorities, we reserve our punishment against him, and at any time determine and require the same crime and infraction in our chamber. If they are mayors or judges of cities or towns, they shall be deprived of their offices and henceforth not be allowed to come and serve. If, however, the cities or town councils in which the mayors and judges are present, and would not admonish and hold them to the execution of our mandates, deprive these cities of all their privileges, and revoke them, and otherwise generally against all authorities subject to us, including heresies knowingly harbored and detained (if they would not repent of the same after this our gracious admonition in due time), reserve our punishment.

22. In order that such errors and heresies may be prevented from causing the most irritation and cause, and that men may be all the more careful to guard against them and to take precautions against them, we herewith earnestly desire and command that no one in the hereditary and other lands of ours shall print, write, sell, buy, read, or keep books, writings, paintings, or other unseemly interpretations of Lutheran, Zwinglian, Oecolampadian, or any other of their followers and successors; And who, excluding no one, shall have in their power the same books, writings, paintings, or such meanings as they may be called, that they shall certainly deliver and deliver them all from the date of these mandates to the public within two months next coming, each to the authorities and court under which he is dedicated, seated, and belonging. But whoever does not do so, and we are reminded of it, we will proceed and act against him with due punishment.

023 And for a good and thorough inquiry and experience of such merchants as are concerned, we have granted, as we do herewith, that whosoever shall have

1) whoever uses the above-mentioned or other Lutheran, heretical and seductive articles, and does not want to be reprimanded from them, so that he would fall under our punishment and be recognized for this reason, notifies the authorities that we want the third part to follow and be given to the person reporting such punishments, which or as much as is due to him on the property. We hereby give notice to all our governors, governments, land marshals, governors, administrators, caretakers, bailiffs, mayors, judges, and all others who have jurisdiction, court, and authority, and we sincerely wish that all and any of them who, in one or more of the above-mentioned unchristian, heretical articles, have acted contrary to the outgoing imperial edict and this our mandate, may be punished. Edict and this our mandate, as aforesaid, and be referred to the same, as is due, and brought to them, that you then act and proceed against the same from this time forth, and without any further cognizance, according to the expulsion of the penalties and punishments explained above.

24. And in good knowledge, inquire everywhere in your courts and territories with all diligence, make inquiries about them, order the same also through others, where someone would enter such as is indicated, have him or them taken into custody from the beginning, order the same to be done with others, keep them well, and act with them according to our opinion as described above, and in other ways live and comply with these mandates of ours, only if some grave matter, which is not reported, should occur to you, then report it to us or to our governors and government of our lands, where such a matter occurs, so that we, or they on our account, may continue to give order and command for punishment.

025 We also will that ye be ten years, the next after the opening of this mandate of ours, with all the pastors in our provinces, and decree that they shall read and publicly proclaim the yearly twelvemonths, namely, at the high feasts, Easter and Christmas, in the pulpit of every one of his parish. To this do ye all and every one especially our opinion. Given in our city of Ofen on the twentieth day of August in the fifteen hundred and seven and twentieth year of our reign.

There, in the note, "IndUats is to be read twice" instead of Invocavit. The date given is correct, by the way.

By the Grace of God, we Ferdinand, King of Bohemia, Roman Imperial Majesty in the Holy Empire, Governor, Archduke of Austria, Duke of Burgundy and Würtemberg, Count of Tyrol &c.

And we Albrecht, of the Holy Roman Church of the title Laneti Dstri ock Vineula Priest-Cardinal, Archbishop of Mainz and Magdeburg, Archchancellor of the Holy Roman Empire, in Germania Churfürst and Primas, Administrator of the Abbey of Halberstadt.

And we Joachim, Arch Chamberlain and Elector of the Holy Roman Empire, both Margraves of Brandenburg, of Stettin, of Pomerania, Dukes of the Cassubians and of the Wends, Burgraves of Nuremberg and Princes of Rügen.

And we Matthew, of the Holy Roman Church tituli Kanoti ^QAsli Priest-Cardinal, Archbishop of Salzburg, Papal Holiness and of the See of Rome DsKotus nntu8 sta.

We Wigand, bishop of Bamberg, and we Conrad, bishop of Würzburg, and duke of Franconia.

And by the same graces we George, Duke of Saxony, and Landgrave in Thuringia, and Margrave of Meissen.

We William and Ludwig, brothers, Dukes of Upper and Lower Bavaria, Palatine Counts of the Rhine, do hereby publicly confess and declare for ourselves by virtue of this letter:

1. Since, in these weak, disgusting runs, which the Almighty God imposes on the human race on account of sin and iniquity, much blasphemy and dishonor, as well as annoyance of the neighbor, has arisen, so that God not only in His sacraments, which He instituted on earth for the correction and strengthening of our weak consciences, but also in His own omnipotence and divinity, is reviled and destroyed, churches and monasteries spoliated and destroyed, persons given to God chased out of His service, in unhonorable ways, but also in his own omnipotence and divinity, to the extent that churches and cloisters have been spoliated and destroyed, persons given to God have been expelled from his service, cast out to dishonest authorities, their rent and interest have been violently taken, and they have been deprived of them, and, most dreadful of all, the office of the holy mass has been taken away.

is not only repudiated, but also considered idolatrous and sinful: We, as Christian King, Electors, Archbishops, Bishops, and Princes, on account of the vows and pledges which we have made to God our Creator, to whom we, as the creature to its Creator, are to submit ourselves by all means, and to place ourselves under His holy feet; Likewise, on account of the oath and duty which we have taken, in part, to Papal Holiness and all Roman Imperial Majesty, our most gracious Lord, to which we, as our authorities, should and must render submissive obedience, nothing else is due, except to counter such blasphemy as described above, as much as we, as men, are able to do by means of divine assistance, to avert it, and to amend it; Likewise, the good, blessed church ordinances and ceremonies, which the holy church, being a bride of Christ, invented and ordained for our betterment and blessedness, and which have now for a time been cast out and suppressed, are to be renewed again and restored to their former status, so that the will of God (who undoubtedly desires to preserve his bride) may be lived, and the mandate of the Emperor's Majesty, our most gracious Lord, may be protected and administered. In order that we may or may be able to do this the more effectively and the more nobly (but not otherwise than by the help of God), we the above-named, King, Electors, Archbishops, Bishops and Princes, have agreed, united, sworn and promised to give birth in the manner and measure that follows.

For the first, it is considered that after the death of the Highborn Prince, Lord Louis, formerly King of Hungary and Bohemia, our friendly dear brother-in-law, lord, friend and gracious lord, the Kingdom of Hungary belongs to no one cheaper than to us, Ferdinand, King of Bohemia, Archduke of Austria 2c., on account of our friendly dear husband, by God, nature, and all rights, is considered good, and is also advised and promised that the next-described Electors, Archbishops, Bishops, and Princes shall and will do us a goodly assistance, with men or money, the contents of the articles which have therefore been put forward, granted, pledged, sealed, and accepted; so that we may conquer the above-mentioned kingdom the better and more effectively, and force the alleged Count John of Rutzfin, who maliciously betrayed our ancestor King Ludwigen, aroused the Turks against him and the Christian blood, out of it with power, and calmly sit down in it, and if we [such]

If, after the will of God has come to an end, our power and reception is thus increased by the Kingdom of Hungary, we shall then be well advised to seek out the heretics and blasphemers in their abstinence among the princes, lords and communes, where they are housed, etched and harbored.

(3) And then, upon the solemn command which His Imperial Majesty, our most gracious brother and gracious lord, will send us from Hispania, we will command the Elector of Saxony to hand over to us Martin Luther, the arch-heretic, together with all heretical preachers, priests, monks, nuns, and other clergy who have changed their habit, religion, and spiritual nature. In addition, he is to restore the office of holy mass, all ceremonies, vigils, and masses of the soul, as they may be called and have been called from time immemorial, as well as churches, monasteries, and cloisters. And if he should be in want thereof, and would not render obedience to Imperial Majesty in this, then we Ferdinand, King of Bohemia, Archduke of Austria 2c., we Albrecht, Cardinal, Archbishop, Prince 2c, the said Electors of Saxony, with our highest and strongest power, according to the terms and contents of the following articles, in his Saxon, Meissen, and Thuringian lands; and we Wigand, and Conrad, Bishops, the said Electors in his Frankish lands, also with our strongest and highest power, to seize his castles, cities, towns, and villages, to drive him out of the same, and never again to suffer him or his children to enter therein, henceforth for ever. And when we have finished this, after those of Magdeburg have become apostate and disloyal to the Holy Roman Church, to the Imperial Majesty and to the Magdeburg Chapter, we also want to bring them over to the obedience of the Church and to submission.

4th And that we George, Duke of Saxony, 2c., do not note to act against the heredity (therein papal holiness and imperial majesty with clear words excepted), or against the Elector of Saxony, although we are caused to do so by the said Elector, of which we also have good reason and right. But after the country of Moravia, Silesia and in Lusatia the six cities, 1) together with many princes and others, lend therein, which without any means are attached to the crown of Bohemia, have been conceded by the government to the crown of Saxony.

1) The six cities in Upper Lusatia are Bautzen, Zittau, Camenz, Löbau, Görlitz and Lauban. They were so named because they had made a covenant against the robber barons of that area in 1346.

If the people of Bohemia have fallen away from the obedience of the Christian Church, have sunk into the heresy of Martin, and have thereby deprived the clergy of all their rent and interest, and also deprived them of the holy masses, monasteries and ceremonies, then we want to overtake them with our supreme power and, as much as possible, bring them to the obedience of the Christian Church and to the submission of the Royal Serenity of Bohemia 1).

5th And what we Ferdinand, King of Bohemia, Archduke of Austria 2c., we Albrecht, Cardinal, Archbishop 2c., and we Joachim, both Margraves of Brandenburg and Electors 2c., in the lands of Saxony, Meissen, and Thuringia, towns, castles, villages, uses, and revenues, which are in the jurisdiction of the Elector of Saxony, we will give all and every one of them to our friendly dear prince, uncle, brother-in-law, and sister-in-law, Duke Georgen of Saxony, together with all regalia, dignities, and dignities, 2) which Joachim, Margrave of Brandenburg, Elector, has given us in our principalities and which are in fief from the Crown of Bohemia, and which shall remain to us and our heirs, for our cost and presentation. But the city of Magdeburg, after having belonged to the monastery of Magdeburg without any means, shall be delivered to the same again with all courts, rights, usufruct and justice, only reserved to the imperial majesty and the holy empire for its justice in fief, tax and consequence. What we George, Duke of Saxony, will conquer and gain in the principalities, castles, towns, villages, annuities, interests and usufruct in Moravia, Silesia and in Lusatia, in the jurisdiction of the Crown of Hungary or Bohemia, we want to hand over and deliver all of it, with nothing left out, to our kind and gracious Lord, the Royal Serene Highness of Bohemia.

6 But what we Wigand and Conrad, bishops of Bamberg and Würzburg, 2c., shall gain in the land of Franconia in castles, towns and villages and all uses, in the jurisdiction of the Elector of Saxony, that we shall keep. If, however, our friend, Duke George of Saxony, should impose and pay the costs against us or ours, and on the other hand want to take the castles and towns won in Franconia, that shall be reserved for his love, and we shall be indebted,

1) Here we have erased "to".

2) Storkow and Beeskow, two dominions located respectively 7 and 10 miles southeast of Berlin, to cede and concede to his sweetheart on the case.

(7) If, according to the will of God, the above-mentioned Elector of Saxony is punished for his disobedience, then the Landgrave of Hesse, having allowed himself to be seduced by manifold faithful admonitions, and having presumed the same heresy, and having offended papal holiness, first of all imperial majesty, with many invectives, shall also be requested and admonished in the same manner to desist from his error. If, however, he persists in his presumption, and again does not want to compare himself with the obedience of the Christian Church, he shall be punished in the same measure as has been indicated above by the Elector. But his wife, our friendly dear wife, mother, daughter and friend, of her beloved estate and legacy without harm, and with the appendix, as often as he, the Landgrave, will turn from his error and again submit to the obedience of the Christian church, that then, in view of his youth, and that he is inflamed by others, his land and people should again be delivered to him, without payment, so that our undertaking will not be considered as if we had begun it more for the sake of temporal goods or honor than for the salvation of souls.

008 If, however, the said Landgrave should persist in his intention and not return, and should depart in death for his disobedience, then his principality, land, and people, shall be due and delivered to Duke George of Saxony; but that his love shall reimburse the two bishops, Bamberg and Wuerzburg, for the expenses incurred by them on that account.

009 And the appointed king, princes, archbishops, bishops, and princes, all of them shall at one day, as the same shall be notified by us Ferdinand king of Bohemia three months before, attack each at the same time, and one shall not depart without the knowledge and consent of the other.

010 And with such a train let them spare men only, without appointed princes and rulers, and their assistants, that nothing but what is honest and Christian may be felt in us.

(11) Furthermore, it is considered good and advisable that the other princes, counts and lords, who have not been brought into this treaty, be petitioned by negotiation, and as much as possible persuaded and collected, that they give us help and tax for this honest Christian undertaking, or else stand still at the least and give the Elector of Saxony or the Elector of the Holy Roman Empire a chance.

Landgraves of Hesse neither help nor support; and the above-mentioned bishops of Franconia shall be able to help the Margrave there, upon the writing and the presentation of both Electors of Mainz and Brandenburg, likewise Count Wilhelm of Henneberg, or else induce him to stand still.

(12) Duke George of Saxony shall act in the same manner with both Dukes of Brunswick and Duke Henry of Mecklenburg; but all in secret, unnoticed, so that this deal, before it matures, does not become noisy. The Elector of Mainz shall also deliver his valiant message to the Archbishop and Elector of Cologne, act with his love on the instruction given, and diligently persevere, confident that because this our beginning and undertaking has first of all begun in praise of God, and for the benefit of the spiritual state, his love, as the Christian Prelate and Elector, will show itself willingly in all due measure. For this reason, his love should also make an effort with the Dutch Counts, the Count of Nassau and others, and what his love obtains in response, it should most beneficially indicate to us Ferdinand, King of Bohemia, Archduke of Austria.

(13) But so that this action of ours may not be regarded by many, who are not aware of our mind and opinion, as seditious or contrary to the imperial peace, we shall soon at the outset send out a common proclamation throughout the Roman Empire, together with a copy of the imperial mandate. So that this undertaking of ours may not be regarded by many who are not aware of our mind and opinion as seditious or contrary to the imperial peace, we will soon in the beginning, when we are all about to go into the field, send out and publicly post a common notice throughout the whole Roman Empire, together with a copy of the imperial mandate, so that everyone may learn the reason for our beginning, and that we may obtain from the spiritual and Christian, pious, faithful hearts, which God still maintains in the gathering of His holy Church, so much more favor and applause, and from God, our Redeemer, victory and triumph against His enemies in His name.

14. For the purpose of a constant, firm, unbroken hold, we the above-named, King, Electors, Archbishops, Bishops, and Princes, have each, as far as he personally exists, taken a physical oath to keep the above-named points, here and in the Letter of Articles, steadily, firmly, and unbrokenly; But those who are not personally present, the same authorized and skilful embassies have sworn an oath into the souls of their masters, namely, and thus, upon their expressed command, which they have presented and delivered to us:

We Ferdinandus, King of Bohemia, Roman Imperial Governor, Archbishop of the Holy Roman Empire. Majesty in the Holy Roman Empire, Archbishop of Bohemia.

Duke of Austria 2c. We Joachim, Margrave of Brandenburg, Elector 2c. We George, Duke of Saxony 2c., have sworn a bodily oath and have affixed our seal to this letter. And the rest of us, our most gracious and gracious lords of Mainz, Salzburg, Bamberg, Wuerzburg and Bavaria, sent and decreed councillors, have, upon our mandate and command, which we have from our most gracious and gracious lords, hereby delivered to the Royal Serenity of Bohemia, the Elector of Brandenburg and Duke George of Saxony, our most gracious and gracious lords, in the souls of our lords and rulers, that their electoral and princely graces shall and will keep all the above-described articles, together with that which is stipulated in the letter of articles, steadfastly, firmly and unbreakably, sworn a physical oath, and placed this letter in eight forms of one volume, and delivered one to each part, signed with our own handwriting and hand sign.

Done to the glory of God at Breslau, Wednesday after Jubilate [15 May], in the fifteen hundredth year, and thereafter in the seventh and twentieth year.

The two Electors of Mainz and Brandenburg want to have six thousand men on foot, one thousand horses; the Elector of Brandenburg wants to go in his own person.

The bishop of Wuerzburg wants to go in his own person, as a duke of Franconia, and have together with the bishop of Bamberg four baptized on foot and eight hundred horses.

The archbishop of Salzburg and the dukes of Bavaria want to send four thousand servants to the bishop of Wuerzburg, or if they cannot have them, as many Swiss.

Duke George of Saxony wants to take so many men that he is strong enough for his enemies.

And every prince shall arm himself with artillery for the field and for the storm, to the best of his ability, to set no measure therein.

It is considered good, also spoken, vowed and promised that the above-mentioned covenant princes shall draw other princes, counts and lords, namely the Margrave of Franconia, Count Wilhelm of Henneberg, the Abbot of Fulda, also other bishops to their course, or quietly induce them to sit, especially the Dutch counts, who have a large covenant, and are opposed to the landgrave without that, on account of that of Nassau.

Item, that the imperial cities be spared all the same (outside Magdeburg) with writings, words, and deeds, and in no way offend them or their inhabitants, until such time as the appointed two princes have been punished, so that they do not cause the same to be applauded. But when the princes have received their punishment, the imperial cities may well be made obedient without a few military campaigns, with the laying down of roads, the taking of estates, and that imperial majesty decree reprisals against them, and with other many ways that are not yet necessary to discuss.

831 Landgrave Philip of Hesse's letter to his father-in-law, Duke George of Saxony, sending him a copy of the alleged alliance. May 17, 1528.

Duke George had this letter sent out in quarto together with his answer to it at Dresden in 1528. Both letters are reprinted from this original edition in Hortleder, "Von den Ursachen des deutschen Krieges", Vol. I, lib. II, aax." 2, p. 583 f.

1st Most reverend Prince, kind, dear uncle and father. I will not hide your beloved, as I am obliged to do: your beloved has good knowledge how your beloved is to the thicker one.

times 1) and would have liked to know what my undertaken armour was; since I then have to give your dear one an answer on how your dear one will still have it with him without doubt.

002 But now that I may tell your beloved what has caused me to be so armed and so distinguished, it is in this form:

(3) I have come into certain experience, so that I have not only heard it from hearsay, but also want to believe it from bad copies, that Ferdinand, King 2c, and likewise several princes have joined together; which is the most unfortunate thing that God knows, that I would like to have a limb taken from my body for this, that your beloved is also in such a covenant, that I would never have hoped that your beloved would have allowed himself to be used for such a counsel against me. But I nevertheless find that your beloved still has a kinder heart towards me in such an alliance than towards others. Therefore I must reckon it to your beloved that your beloved is of the opinion that we others should be such evil heretics that your beloved would gladly see them turned away. Now God knows that I am sorry that your beloved perhaps does not want to enlighten God to His knowledge; but your beloved can easily understand that I have to stand in danger and cheek by jowl, that I should deny God's word and adhere to the devil's service, or have to let myself be driven out of the country and the people. If I now sit still and do my work until those who have such a noble purpose against me overtake me, then I have slept through the mornings. For this reason my mind is finally set on not wanting to look at either body or goods, and in the name of God I want to bring others who are planning such things against me and others, with God's help, to refrain from such unchristian, unjust actions, with the assurance that I will no longer look at such things.

4th And that your beloved may see that I really know the matter, I send your beloved a copy of such a covenant. Since your beloved has done me good in my childhood, and since I have helped your beloved against the rebellious peasants, and since I have your beloved's daughter, and your beloved's son my natural sister, I consider that I should be heartily sorry that your beloved and I should grow together in displeasure. And the Prince so related to your love...

1) "zu dem dickermal" - to the oft, often. With Walch: "to the Dickermal".

2) "beiten" - to wait, to wait. In the old edition: "beut". But "beuten" means: to exchange.

is that I truly know that he would also like to be on friendly terms with your beloved, if it would always be so. So now my friendly, official, and for God's sake request to your beloved, let him write to me by this messenger that your beloved renounce the alliance, as your beloved may well do with honor, and not act or act in unfriendship against the Elector and me, and also not help such others against us: I hereby decree to your beloved that the Elector, or I, your beloved, or yours, shall do no harm or harm, not even a chicken, as they say, shall squawk, and if your beloved wishes to do so, if your beloved ascribes this to me, as has been said, place my life and property with them. What is the use of your beloved, if your beloved drives us out, though it may yet be lacking, if God wills it, because your beloved drives out their own flesh and blood and good friends. So your beloved may well mean that as little as your beloved departs from their faith, so much less will we depart from ours; for this your beloved will not give account for us, and we for them. And lastly, I beseech your beloved to give me here a kind and right answer, your beloved, and for the good of us all, also of lands and people, by this messenger in the most conducive manner. This I will earn; so be your beloved God Almighty commanded. Date Homburg, Sunday Vocem Jucunditatis [17 May] 2c.
Philip, Landgrave of Hesse.

To the Highborn Prince, Lord George, Duke of Saxony, Landgrave in Thuringia and Margrave of Meissen, our dearest uncle and cousin,
...in his own hands.

832 Duke George's immediate answer to this, in which he denies the alliance concluded, and asks to report the author of such falsehood. May 21, 1528.

The location of this letter is indicated at the previous number.

(1) Reverend Prince, kind and dear uncle and son: Today I received from your love a letter in which your love reports that the alliance against my cousin, the Prince Churfürst zu

1) "someone it" (namely Leides) put by us instead of: "someone's".

Saxony, and thereafter against you, in which I was also involved; that your love was faithfully sorry, and would rather that you lost a member of your body, than to learn such from me, with request in the kindest and most official way for God's sake, that I give your love an answer, in which I renounce not to be in the alliance, not to do against my cousin and you 2c., I have read further contents, and add your love hereupon know: Though I am simple and unskilful, yet your beloved shall mark me of pride, if anything true be done of me in the matter, I would not deny it before your beloved, or a greater, as I would justly fear more than you. But since this fictitious copy, which your love sends me, has so much falsehood in it, even with the original it can never be produced or shown: I am not a little astonished that your beloved believes it and complains to me about it; rather, I pity your beloved, as my blood relative and son, that your beloved allows himself to be seduced by such unfounded, untrue lies and to be moved into rebellion, from which your beloved, wife and child, country and people may suffer ruin and harm; I say and write, that he that hath said such things to your beloved, that hath seen such original, that hath my hand-mark or seal upon it, or that hath read or heard the same original, that he is a desperate, dishonourable, perjured villain, therefore I will stand still before all. I will also ask your beloved kindly, and, as your beloved has asked for God's sake, your beloved will approach your matters with better care than has been done, and will not let yourselves be hurried on the journey, since someone else is hunting ahead of you; and your beloved will also tell me about the lying man, that I must beware of him, and he must beware of me: For if it were not done by your love, I should be led to think that your love invented it himself, and so would take occasion to begin your unkind will against me poor old man.

(2) I will also not refrain from writing to those who are supposed to be in copies of the covenants made in Breslau, send them to them, have no doubt, they will excuse themselves and me according to necessity; for I know well that there were not many of them, nor did they have their message. Because I do not know of any alliance, nor can it ever be brought to my attention that I have knowledge of it; for that which is stated in such a copy of the other half is a public untruth, but what I do not know is not true.

...and even lied about. Wherefore, if your beloved therefore give up a member of your body, let your beloved be sorry that it hath been done in vain, and that nothing hath been done. Neither may I step and renounce that which is not in himself. I will, if God wills it, hold myself against your love and your manhood in such a way that I know how to answer for it with honor to God, my authority, and to all the world.

This I have not wished to do in answer to your beloved, whom I am inclined to serve. Given in haste at Dresden on the day of the Ascension of Christ <sup>^21 May^</sup>, Anno Domini in the fifteen hundred and in the eight and twentieth.

(4) I will also not fail to report this to my cousin, from which his beloved will have excused me. Date ut supra.

George, Duke of Saxony 2c.

To the Highborn Prince, our dear son and Oheimen, Mr. Philippsen, Landgrave of Hesse, Count of Katzenelnbogen, of Dietz, Ziegenhain and Nidda 2c., on one's own hands.

833 The Landgrave's Manifesto, before he received the answer from Duke George, and before the Elector consented to it, publicized for fine excuse, because of the undertaken armament. May 22, 1528.

From the original edition cited in von der Hardt, Auto'r. iMtk. ; Theil II, p. 147 reprinted in Hortleder, "Von den Ursachen des deutschen Krieges," vol. I, lib. II, eax. 2, p. 577.

By the Grace of God, we Philips, Landgrave of Hesse, Count of Katzenelnbogen, of Dietz, of Ziegenhain and of Nidda. To all and each, high, middle and low estates, so this our responsibility and tender occurs, we offer against each fee, our servitude, and all Christian friendly good will. And do hereby manfully acknowledge..:

I. After our and also our lords' and friends' application and armament not a little displeasure is spread by our detractors and repugnants, on the following articles, to the most annoying and quite detrimental way.

002 For the present, as though we were to encamp before Frankfort, and be subject to become king of Rome.

1) "Application" here will mean: Recruiting people for military service.

Item 3: That we have displeased and disobeyed the King of France. Maj., our most gracious Lord, to displeasure and disobedience in the service of the King of France.

Item 4: That we should be willing and intend to stir up the common man, and to reinstate the Highborn Prince, Lord Ulrich, Duke of Würtenberg, our dear cousins.

(5) To reject such fancied, grievous calamity, our high necessity will require to do the cause of our cheap application and armour in day.

006 And hereupon we offer to know manfully, that because of such untruthful statement we are quite wronged, and are shamefully lied to in the same. For we have never been of a mind or spirit, and we know ourselves to report that such or such a thing would not be done to us. And we are also of the clear conscience that we have always been loyal to Imperial Majesty, our allies. Majesty, our most gracious Lord, to all due obedience. Likewise, we have also shown all fairness to the Confederation of Swabia, as an obedient prince related to the Confederation, as we intend, by God's bestowal, to observe all irrevocability and thus to keep it against God, Imperial Majesty, the Confederation of Swabia. Maj., the Confederation of Swabia, all impartial Imperial Estates and manly honorable minds.

007 And that we may be rid of this suspicion, it is in the form of the Most Reverend Prince Johansen, Duke of Saxony, Archmarshall and Elector of the Holy Roman Empire, Landgrave of Thuringia and Margrave of Meissen, our kindly dear uncle, brother-in-law, and father-in-law, and for the sake of our nobility:

(8) Although the common estates of the realm unanimously resolved at the last Imperial Diet held at Speier that we shall keep peace among ourselves by virtue of the Imperial Peace, none of us shall overreach the other. The Imperial Council at Speier has unanimously resolved that we shall keep peace among ourselves, in virtue of the Imperial Peace, and that none of us shall overreach the other, and that it shall not be possible for any authority to take action in matters concerning the Imperial Edict of Worms. Worms Edict, until a common Christian concilium, as they hoped to answer for it against God and the Imperial Majesty. Majesty to answer for it.

9th That also for the prevention of outrage in the empire a stately embassy should be dispatched to imperial majesty in Hispania to report to her majesty of the touched Speier action and farewell, which dispatch, by slight cause has been prevented, no doubt from the fact that some bishops, monks, a long time ago, now by advice, then by this and other manifold deliberations and assemblies, have been pleased,

Until finally God Almighty decrees a heavy fall upon them, that they have moved some great princes into an alliance with their practices, against the living, gracious Word of God and His followers, that they have entered into an alliance with them, have sworn together, and have taken an oath, as can be seen pathetically in the print. 1)

(10) Now that all things should and must be done and accomplished by God our Creator according to His divine will, all to His praise and glory, in that we always want to stand in humble supplication to His fear, we have undoubtedly also come by God's sending into the experience of such covenants, which are not only against God, nature, Christian love, but also against the Holy Roman Empire's peace, against the covenant of Swabia, common order, against all the Nuremberg, Augsburg and Speier agreements of the Empire, and also against all equity. Reichs Landfrieden, against the Covenant of Swabia, common order, against all Nuremberg, Augsburg, and Speier agreements taken by the Reich, also against all equity, especially if, to our knowledge, we have not given anyone cause to do so, and would unwillingly do so.

11. Because God Almighty has appointed us to be in charge of our lands and people, to govern them with Christian faith and the right truth of His Divine Word, in which alone we have our salvation, and not to be dissuaded from it unrecognized, but to protect ours in doing so, and to defend them as much as possible, and God gives assistance, and to defend them from pernicious harm; 2) and we are then in danger with ours, if our enemies see their advantage, that they must wait daily for the mentioned our grandparents, the Elector of Saxony, and overtake us with the strongest and greatest power, thus of the cheek strike, chasing away of country and people:

12. We therefore believe that every pious person who has good sense and an impartial, honest mind, will easily be able to judge and not disapprove of the fact that in natural and established rights, and therefore also in the imperial peace, necessity and resistance are not forbidden, against such a swift alliance and undertaking our emergency and counter-defence in time so that we may withstand the unchristian, unlawful violence which shall meet us in an unheard-of matter, and protect ours in equity and justice. And in this

1) From this it appears that this Manifesto is actually only the preface to the wording of the Covenant given in print by the Landgrave, No. 829.

2) The thread of connection will be this: Because God has set us over our lands as regents.

We do not seek anything else (that we are called to testify to God), but His, the Lord's, honor, praise and glory, so that His word may remain unpressed, and we and our subjects may remain peaceful.

13. According to all this, we want to have asked manly, of what rank and dignity each is, by the will of God and of the truth, of great diligence, whether it should be granted to us that we should, for other reasons than those mentioned, stand in armor and for the forceful restraint of violence, so that our people may be secured in peace and be protected from sorrow and suffering, to keep us excused from this; For we have no desire nor will to stir up rebellion, and would much rather live with our people in peace and Christian unity, and await the public hearing of our actions and proceedings, as befits our obedience. If, however, peace may not befall us as a result of our request and entreaty, we will turn the matter over to God and our resistance, and in a cheerful suit we will command ourselves and our fellow warriors to His omnipotence in victory. We also want to ask manfully, that this our letter has been made in no other form, than out of this urgent high necessity, that such disgrace will be granted to us, to reject the same with it. Given under our secret expressed above, on Friday after Voeörr" Ilueunäitatis [May 22] Anno 1528.

834 D. Martin Luther's, Melanchthon's, and Bugenhagen's misgivings concerning Pack's covenant. Between May 6 and 12, 1528.

On March 9, 1528, a defensive alliance had been concluded in Weimar between the Elector of Saxony and the Landgrave against the Catholic princes. About the same Luther had given a concern on March 28, 1528 (Walch, St. Louiser Ausg., Vol. X, 548, with the too general heading: "von der Gegenwehr" and the wrong year 1539; in the Erlangen double, once Vol. 54, p. 1 with your date "May? 1528" and Vol. 55, p. 264 "without date 1539"; likewise with De Wette, Vol. III, p. 319 and Vol. V, p. 247. The correct date is given and motivated in the Erlangen correspondence, Vol. VI, p. 231). The Landgrave of Hesse had objected to this in a letter of April II, 1528 (Kolde, Analecta, p. 100 and Erl. Briefw., vol. VI, p. 238). Now another objection arose, for the sake of which the Elector summoned the Wittenberg theologians to Torgau, where they remained from the middle of April to April 21. After that, the Elector and his theologians left for Weimar to conduct negotiations with the Landgrave.

the same finished, and the theologians probably returned to Wittenberg on May 6, set up this concern for the Elector. Since in it the sending of envoys to the "murder princes" is demanded, and the Elector's request for the envoy to Würzburg is dated May 14, our concern must have been written before that date (Erl. Briefw., Vol. VI, 259). A copy of our writing is in the Weimar Archives, ReA. H, toi. 29. Printed in the Eisleben edition, vol. I, p. 270C; in the Altenburg, vol. III, p. 522; in the Leipzig, vol. XIX, p. 559, and by Walch; in all these editions erroneously ascribed to the year 1526. In De Wette, vol. III, p. 314, and in the Erlanger, vol. 53, p. 447. Already Seckendorf, Uibt. CMC, Cd. II, p. 51 u, has recognized that this concern belongs to Pack's alliance. In Walch, this document has the superscription: "D. M. Luther's, D. Pomerani's, and Melanchthon's objections to the Landgrave's replica, to the Mainzian alliance."

(1) First of all, it pleases us almost well that the attack from this side should continue, for thus our consciences are the more secure, since we have not begun nor have cause to shed blood, and the world's joy is the greater that we have waited for the attack, and have suffered all kinds of patience, and have sought ways to keep the peace.

(2) Secondly, that an embassy to Imperial Majesty be dispatched in the most conducive manner. Maj. who, behind his imperial Majesty's knowledge and will, carry out such treacherous plots against his imperial Majesty's subjects 2c., and ask to omit a commandment, and to command such murderers to stand still?)

(3) Thirdly, however, the same murdering princes shall be petitioned and requested to desist from such action, because it is against God and law and imperial majesty; as such shall be done most powerfully with reason and cause. But that it be left to the outside world to reimburse the costs, lest one think that one is seeking war or strife. God will repay us a hundredfold what we have offered for his sake, even though we owe it to ourselves to do so; so that our conscience and goodwill may be the better, since we seek nothing but peace.

004 Fourthly, nevertheless, to do our part, to be in armour, to stir up and visit other princes and cities, as God hath commanded us, who have done all things without our help.

1) De Wette and the Erlanger: "forbid".
power and counsel, and yet by our fist, tongue, and heart, will think, speak, and create, as by instruments of his divine wisdom and power.

006 To the other, whether by other princes or sovereigns they might be acted upon, that they might be quiet; and the hope is, that the people would be so, if the answer were given.

007 Thirdly, that such a thing may be heard in the Diet, and that it may be complained of, and that it may be reported to the other estates what may follow therefrom.

835 Churmaints' excuse that the given alliance was a purely invented thing. Dated 27 May 1528.

From Hortleder, "On the Causes of the German War," Cd. II, Cup. 3, p. 585, where this document is printed from the single edition.

I. We Albrecht von GÖttes Gnaden, of the Holy Roman Church of the title Kaneti Uetri ack Vinenla Cardinal, of the Holy See of Mainz and of the Chapter of Magdeburg Archbishop, Elector, of the Holy Roman Empire through Germania Archchancellor and Primate, Administrator of Halberstadt, Margrave of Brandenburg, of Stettin, Pomerania, Duke of the Cassuben and Wenden, Burgrave of Nuremberg, and Prince of Rügen: We offer our friendly service, greeting, grace and all the best to anyone of any dignity, rank or character, asking and requesting in a friendly, amicable and gracious manner that everyone read, hear and hear this following apology and responsibility, which we, out of our great necessity and no other opinion, hereby testify to, have the utmost cause to do, and to deliver it without any displeasure and without any doubting faith.

002 And thus, although a good while ago there was a public rumour of the land, and we had

We have been kindly and faithfully warned by various high and low people, how the highborn prince, Mr. Philipp, landgrave of Hesse, is to overdraw us and our archbishopric in brave, serious armour and business, 2c. but which we at all times, in consideration of many high and constant causes, give no credence to, and especially to those: First, that for the sake of all error and infirmity, pending between us both, we stand in amicable action before the most venerable in GOD Father, Lord Reicharten, Archbishop of Trier, Churfürsten, our dear friend. Second, that we are bound to each other in the union of the praiseworthy alliance of Swabia, which gives a special form and measure, so that one may speak to the other and demand how he should seek the same. Thirdly, that Landgrave Philip has granted us a brave and respectable fiefdom. And fourthly, with regard to the common, public, proclaimed land peace, also the unanimous agreement made at Speier, which we have agreed to, established, sealed, and committed ourselves to keep. Thus, we cannot or may not consider or remember for what causes or reasons the aforementioned our uncle, Landgrave Philip, could or may have overreached us or our archbishopric and monastery.

3. About this, and in order that we should never feel any lack of anything that might serve for peace and unity, prevention of outrage in the holy realm, and for the prevention of Christian bloodshed, we have, in response to the common rumor and manifold credible warnings that have ever reached us, sent our ambassadors to our dear grandfather, Landgrave Philippsen, with credence and instructions, we have sent our ambassadors to our dear grandfather, Landgrave Philippsen, with credence and instruction, and have kindly requested and asked him to inform us that we should provide him with such his armour and common rumour and excellent warning 2c. Our envoys, however, did not receive a loud answer about their vehement persistence, whereupon security of the attack could have been felt, much less is some cause of discord indicated.

(4) And so we were in doubt for and for, and did not know what we should provide for our uncle, the landgrave, until Saturday, the third and twentieth day of the month of May, of the present year, we were informed by the well-born, worthy, strict, firm, highly learned and honourable, Roman, imperial majesty, administrators and councillors of the landgrave, that the landgrave is our uncle.

Imperial Regiment, now at Speier, a writing and besides a copy of a supposed covenant, so the noble, highborn Prince, Mr. Ferdinand, King of Hungary and Bohemia 2c., Imperial Majesty Governor in the Holy Empire 2c., our dear lord and uncle, together with several princes and princes, ecclesiastical and secular, should have entered into and undertaken to overrun and overwhelm, to drive out and to expel the highborn princes, Mr. Hansen, Duke of Saxony, Elector 2c., and Mr. Philippsen, Landgrave of Hesse, obgemeldt 2c. In addition, we have received a public notice, under the above-mentioned Landgrave Philippsen's name and title, in print, in which it is stated in no uncertain terms that the above-mentioned supposed alliance is to be the cause of their, the two Electors and Princes', trade, armament and intentions.

5. Since we are also named and specified in the copy of the alleged alliance, and the Imperial Regiment indicates in the above-mentioned letter enclosed to us that the above-mentioned alleged alliance is the cause of the armament and trade in which both Princes, Saxony and Hesse, stand: Our great need requires "that it may be publicly and clearly understood that such an accusation of the alleged alliance is wholly blameless and imputed to us, and that the two princes and rulers of such causes have no reason or justification against us" to make our apology.

6th And say thereupon, in true faith and belief, by our electoral honors and dignities, that to hear of such a covenant is strange and weird to us, and we bear no knowledge of it at all. Nor have we ever spoken or acted with anyone, high or low, about it, nor have we given anyone any order about it, orally or in writing, nor have we had or arranged for anyone to come to the place where the above-mentioned supposed covenant was to be established, nor have we therefore ever been spoken to or requested by anyone, before or since. It is not found that this alleged covenant has been sealed with our seal, or that the person who, as the copy shows, is supposed to have been ordered to do so by us, has been designated or named for this purpose. No one may truthfully say in life that anyone has ever received an order from us for this purpose. And of this, for our several true excuses, we refer to our friend, the Archbishop of Cologne, the Elector 2c, the Elector of Nassau, and the Dutch Counts, with whom we are in agreement.

We should, as the copy of the alleged alliance indicates, act to help or stop them, that for this reason nothing at all has come to them from us, either in writing, orally, or in any other way; so that we know ourselves completely free and certain of the same accusation of the alleged alliance drawn up, from which they derive the causes of their war. Therefore we can and may say with constant truth, and publicly declare, that such accusation of the alliance is imputed to us. For we have never taken or thought of such a thing in our mind and spirit, let alone in fact.

7. And if we had ever been confident, even entirely confident, of how such a supposed alliance, or something of the sort, would have reached the two Electors and Princes, Saxony and Hesse, against us: Considering the friendship, kinship, covenant and feudal relationship in which they stand and stand by us, they should not immediately and easily give credence to this, have taken this to their serious minds, have behaved and acted in such a way behind them, have put on their armour, and have let us know with a ready, defenceless and armed hand: but have asked us beforehand for a friendly opinion, as they were well disposed to do, and have inquired the true reason, or least of all, when we sent to the landgrave by our counsellors, as aforesaid, and met him with a straight answer of peace, and the same our counsellors, on account of all claims and demands, which he, the landgrave, thinks to have towards us, have called upon the Roman Imperial Majesty, our most gracious lord 2c., Royal Dignity of Hungary and Bohemia 2c., her Majesty's Governor, Regiment, Court of Appeal, all Princes, Princes and Estates of the Empire, the noble Union of Swabia and the Burgomaster or Master Builder of the Castle of Friedburg; they should have given notice and report to us of such cause of their intended move, or have ever accepted the superfluous legal commandment. Thereupon we wanted to have met them with a princely, friendly and amicable answer (where they otherwise loved peace and were not inclined to arouse any rebellion in the realm for the handling of the peace of the land), that such armament and trade on our part should have been completely unnecessary for them. That is why in the letter of Landgrave Philippsen sent out in print we are thus highly attracted in an unjust way (as to be judged by men), and it is reported as a cause of their armament that peace may not happen to them over their request and request.

8. When, however, our friendly request and offer of rights, also unification and relationship, and everything as mentioned above, did not come to pass or help, and the Landgrave sent himself the longer the more in armor on horseback and on foot, the common rumor poured out the more diligently, and we were somewhat warned, first of all, of a swift move by high, middle, and lower estates in the most friendly, faithful, and serious manner, and we are warned by high, middle and lower estates to the kindest, most faithful and serious, that we also received a strong suspicion and belief that such a trade on foot of three thousand strong, was first put to our land, the Ringgaw 1), and there re-mustered:

(9) Thus, in the end, we are highly induced and urged to send and place ourselves in counter-armament for our, our foundation's and subjects' stay and protection, shield and defence, not at little cost and burden to our and our poor subjects. Not to overreach, insult, or damage anyone, contrary to the common law, the imperial peace, and the farewell taken at Speier, but, as stated above, to keep them from unreasonable violence. For we, as a prince of the Holy Roman Empire, intend to abide by the truces, imperial orders and decrees established by the Emperor, our most gracious lord, as well as the covenants, obediently, in accordance with and in all fairness, as we have lived and followed them in all due obedience, as may not otherwise be imposed upon us in truth, in all matters, points and articles, to the best of our ability.

10. It has also never been our mind, will and opinion, and not yet, to suppress or prevent the divine word, and what may serve for the honor and praise of God the Almighty, also for the promotion of the love of our neighbor in some way, as we have also never been contrary to it, as we may in all innocence want to be imposed upon us, but our, as a Christian prince, highest sense and thoughts are always directed and inclined to plant, increase and promote the same, as far as our reason and ability stretch. Where it also comes about that the order and reformation of the Christian religion is undertaken, of which we have never been lacking, nor shall we yet be lacking, we want to show ourselves in such a way, prove and keep ourselves, that our just mind, will and good opinion shall be felt and found in the works. No less are our inclination, diligence, and desire, peace, and love and unity in the Holy Empire as much as possible, and to promote the common good and welfare of the entire German nation, as we owe it as a member of the Empire, and have done in all our actions and changes up to now, and hopefully have not been noted otherwise by men. We also want to act and do this faithfully, as far as our assets, body and goods extend.

(11) After all this, we most kindly, graciously, and graciously ask, remind, and request everyone, as stated above, to attribute this letter of ours first of all to our great need, and to no other form or opinion, and to give complete credence to our needy excuse, as it is in truth. That we have sent ourselves alone to defend ourselves and to stay in arms, not in the mood to overreach anyone, but to keep the imperial peace and the imperial treaty at Speier. And with this, we want to once again refrain from all claims and demands that the above-mentioned two [princes] think they have on us or our] 1) subjects, if it concerns the above-mentioned supposed alliance, which is innocently made to us, or whatever it may be, on the Roman Emperor's Majesty, the Holy Roman Emperor, the Holy Roman Emperor, the Holy Roman Emperor, the Holy Roman Emperor, the Holy Roman Emperor. Imperial Majesty, our most gracious Lord, Royal Dignity of Hungary and Bohemia, Her Majesty's Governor in the Holy Empire, and the Imperial Regiment, Chamber Court, also all impartial Princes, Princes, ecclesiastical and secular, Prelates, Counts, Knights, in addition the laudable Union of Swabia, the Free and Imperial Cities, and otherwise all impartial respectability, due right and all equity;

And therefore have asked and admonished each one, whatever his dignity and standing, in the last and highest and kindest way, not to be induced by anyone, beyond this true apology and superfluous offer of rights, to act or attack us, our monasteries and subjects, to some advice or help. We want to be comforted and provided for each one of them according to all respectability and fairness, and in turn we will kindly, amicably and graciously deserve, settle, blame and be unforgiven to recognize this in mercy. In witness whereof we have hereunto set our seal in this letter, which is given at St. Martin's Castle in our city of Mainz, the seventh and twentieth day of Nazi anno Oornini iniUesirao Huingsutssiino vioesirao ootuvo.

836: Prince Joachim's responsibility against Hesse and Saxony for the supposed alliance. May 25, 1528.

a) Our most gracious lord, the Elector of Brandenburg, writing to the Landgrave of Hesse went out.

Our friendly services, and what we are able to do dear and good, always beforehand Highborn Prince, dear Oheim! The Highborn Prince, Mr. George, Duke of Saxony, Landgrave in Thuringia, Margrave of Meissen, our friendly dear uncle, brother-in-law and sister-in-law, has given us this day to know by fine love message, that your love to fine love with sending copy of a supposed alliance, so by Royal Serenity to Hungary and Bohemia, also our friendly dear lord and brother, the Cardinal, Archbishop and Elector to Mainz 2c., his beloved, us and other princes, ecclesiastical and secular, recorded in the notel of the same covenant, against our uncle, brother-in-law and brother, the Elector of Saxony and your beloved, at Breslau, to be erected, securitized, sealed and sworn, written: for which reason your beloved have put on their armour, sent to defend themselves, and do not want to expect to be struck in the cheek, with further contents, we have received in instruction.

(2) Now it is not without, various legends have reached us on account of your love's armor, and namely that your love should be meant to touch our friendly dear lord and brother, the Cardinal; but we have not been able to find out what causes your love to do so, and now note from this that it should also apply to the rest of us. If, however, your beloved has no other motive for rebellion than the alleged fabricated alliance, it would have been proper for your beloved, before they burdened themselves with such expenses, to ask us and the other princes and princes about it and to hear our answer, so your beloved shall certainly have it for what has happened to it; it shall also not have been denied for our part, but shall have been reported without fear. Likewise the other princes and princes, whom you have reported, would have known how to keep to the fee; but if such a fictitious unstable copy, which your beloved has sent to her uncle and father, has so much falsehood in it, it can never be produced [or] reported with any true original:

3. Thus we bear no small complaint and surprise that your beloved, unhearing the rest of us, gives credence to the inconstant request, and so accuses us with inconstancy as to denigrate us against men; yet we pity that your beloved thus allows itself to be seduced to sedition with inconstant, untrue lies, from which your beloved, its lands and people, may suffer ruin and harm; and may not refrain from answering for such unfounded impositions in this way: That he that hath told your love of such fancied covenant, hath seen the original, hath found therein our names, handwriting, and seals, hath read the same, or hath understood the copies, is a desperate, dishonourable, perjured villain, and may never make this true with truth; And beg of your love to know who is the lying man that hath invented and told you these things, that we may know how to beware of such a lying villain; for if it should not happen, we might be caused to think that your love had invented it himself, and would seek cause for unkind will against us. 1) If this cannot be otherwise, although we are not inclined to rebellion, but would rather have peace, we must therefore take it for granted, and find counsel with our lords and friends to send against it; provide us, the other princes and princes, as reported in the fabricated alliance, if such reaches their love, they will know well how to keep to the truth with a due answer. For the greater part of them have not been at Breslau, nor to our knowledge have had their message there; nor may we remember that your love, nor even the Elector of Saxony in disgrace (2) has been thought of by royal majesty, nor by the rest of us, much less that alliances have been set up against you. Therefore, it is well due to your love, according to our friendly, documented, sealed and sworn pledge and alliance, to inform us in time and of such unfounded, untrue statements of their concerns and intentions, and to inquire about the truth. Accordingly, our friendly request is that your beloved inform us by this messenger that our friendly dear brother, the Cardinal, Archbishop and Elector of Mainz, and we, to your beloved, are in agreement.

1) As one can see here, there is such a great similarity between this letter to the Landgrave and that of Duke George (No. 832) that it must be assumed that Joachim received a copy of it before he wrote this letter.

2) In Spalatin: "not" instead of: "ever".

so that we may keep our opportunity and need in mind. For if we should be overtaken by your love with action unawares and beyond sworn alliance and agreement, we would almost be run over. And our necessity, together with our lords and friends, requires us to use our resistance against this, although we are kindly inclined to serve your love in other ways, as long as we can be assured of this again from your love. We request a reliable answer to this. Date Cologne on the Spree, 3) on Monday after Exaudi [May 25] Anno 2c. 28.

To the Landgrave of Hesse.

b. Des Churfürsten zu Brandenburg Schrift, an [den] Churfürsten zu Sachsen ausgangen.

1. our friendly services and what we are able to do dear and good always before. Highborn Prince, dear uncle, brother-in-law and brother! The Highborn Prince, Mr. George, Duke of Saxony, Landgrave in Thuringia, and Margrave of Meissen, our friendly dear uncle and brother-in-law, has given us this day to know by his love message, that the Highborn Prince, our dear uncle, the Landgrave of Hesse, to his dear one, with the transmission of a copy of a supposed alliance, so from Royal Serenity to Hungary and Bohemia, also to our friendly dear Lord and brother, the Cardinal, Archbishop and Elector of Mainz 2c., his love, us and other princes, ecclesiastical and secular, in the notel of the same alliance, against your and his loved ones shall be set up, sealed and sworn, written, therefore his love put on armor and sent to counterattack. And although various tales of his love's armor have come to us, namely, that his love is meant to attack our kind, dear lord and brother, we have not been able to learn what causes his love to do so, and now note from this that it should also apply to the rest of us. But if his love has no other motive for the rebellion than the alleged, fabricated alliance, then it would have been well due to his love, before it loaded itself with such armor and indignation, to send us and the other princes and princes for it, and to hear our answer. His love should certainly have it for that, if it happens, it should not be denied to him by us.

3) Both here and in the following letter Spalatin says "Spreu" and Walch "Spreu".

but without fear; likewise the other princes and sovereigns also had to do to know to keep to the fee. For it can never be shown with credible appearance that at Breslau or elsewhere such a fictitious alliance has ever been proposed or spoken of in any way, much less approved, established and executed. For it is entirely an untrue and fictitious statement, and neither the original nor a permanent copy of the fictitious covenant, which we should have approved, may be shown. Therefore, his love has refrained from unsteady instruction, by false, fabricated letters, to induce us, unheard, to such armament as is indicated to us, but has, in accordance with our written, sealed, and sworn agreement and covenant, so that we may find each other friendly, reported it, and has not so notorious us along with others, perhaps in the opinion of disparaging us against men, which, however, his love has neither reason nor cause for fairness.

(2) Accordingly, we will see to it that your love does not give any place or credence to such unfounded claims, which will never be found to have any foundation or truth, and that we reject them to our superiors, the landgraves, in the same way, as we are well disposed to your love, according to our kinship. For we are kindly inclined to serve your love. Date Cologne on the Spree, on Monday after Exaudi [May 25] Anno 2c. 28.

To the Elector of Saxony.

Also, kind dear uncle, brother-in-law and brother, we send to E. L. herewith closed for copying, that we, according to our necessity, have written this matter to our uncle, the landgrave, from which E. L. may find out truth, reason and occasion of the matters. Date ut 8ux.

pology of the bishop of Wuerzburg. May 28, 1528.

This writing was published under the title: "Apology to Mr. Conrad, Bishop of Wuerzburg and Duke of Franconia, for the supposed and false alliance, which recently went out. Quarto. Printed by Hortleder, 1.0. p. 590.

1. to all and everyone, ecclesiastical and secular, of the Holy Roman Empire, princes, prelates, counts, freemen, knights, servants, officials, guardians, governors, mayors, burgesses, and all other persons of the Holy Roman Empire. We offer Conrad von Göttes Gnaden, Bishop of Würzburg, and Duke of Franconia, our friendly service, friendship, friendly and favourable greeting beforehand.

2. most venerable in God fathers, highborn, reverend, and highborn princes; venerable, wellborn, dignified, noble, strict, highly learned, seste, honorable, and wise, special dear lords, friends, and dear special ones! Your loved ones and you are undoubtedly well aware and unaware of the fact that for some time there has been a noticeable trade of soldiers and footmen among some estates in the Holy Roman Empire, and especially the high-born princes, our special dear lords and friends, Mr. Johann, Duke of Saxony, Archmarshal of the Holy Roman Empire. Roman Empire, Elector, Landgrave of Thuringia and Margrave of Meissen, and Philip, Landgrave of Hesse, Count of Katzenelnbogen, of Ziegenhain, Dietz and Nidda, have taken up great and public arms.

3. Although, on account of these trades and armaments, much and various things were said now and then, and subsequently the common clamor and the countrymen resounded loudly in more than one place, that our lords and friends of Saxony and Hesse were planning to overrun and rape us and our monastery, we nevertheless did not give them any cause for displeasure and unfriendship, considering that we did not know how to do anything bad with their loved ones: Nevertheless, considering that we did not know how to send anything unpleasant with their loved ones, nor did we give them any cause for displeasure and unfriendship, and then we have come to a friendly agreement with our friend from Hesse, and his love is our and our foundation's obligated vassal; and especially also because in the name of and on account of Roman. kais. Majesty, our most gracious Lord, a common public mandate has gone out, and with excellent pleadings has commanded that every imperial estate refrain completely from any violent action and attack against the imperial peace. They should not want to give any credence to it, but rather, if they thought they had some demands and sayings towards us, our foundation or ours, they should provide us with such, by virtue of the Holy Roman Empire's order and the imperial peace, which is guaranteed by their own constitution. They have sought this against us through their love and other princes and estates at the most recent Imperial Diet held in Worms, and have granted, promised and accepted it, so that we should have no lack of justice and all equity.

4. But when we found that the above-mentioned lords and friends of Saxony and Hesse had strengthened themselves for and against us, we also received one warning after another, as to how such of their dear intentions would certainly go against us and our foundation; And our friend from Hesse, as we have received a credible report, has let himself be heard openly, as he should have good reason and justification for his intention, and as soon as he has encamped on horseback and on foot in considerable numbers, and with an excellent cannon, in and on the borders, very soon at our foundation, for the strongest. Therefore we, on such approach, have humbly and humbly requested help and salvation through our subjects, with notice that they have been credibly reported and seriously warned by their brothers-in-law and friends, if they were seated among the above-mentioned our lords and friends of Saxony and Hesse, that a military campaign was to pass over us and our subjects. In order that we do not leave our subjects with help, we have, out of necessity, not in the opinion of overrunning, raping or damaging anyone, but, if we or our subjects were to be overrun, raped or damaged by anyone, we have had to send and prepare to defend ourselves against such violence; as we are also required to do by the captains and councillors of the praiseworthy League of Swabia, on account of the proper handling of the Holy Roman Empire's land peace and full power. We have been admonished and requested to do so by the captains and councillors of the noble League of Swabia, on account of the proper handling of the Holy Roman Empire's land peace and the execution of the aforementioned agreement.

(5) It has come to pass that we have been asked by our Lord and friend of Saxony, Elector 2c, his sweetheart, and also by our Lord and friend, the Landgrave of Hesse 2c, Councillors, for the sake of some incidental matters, to advertise to us on behalf of both their sweethearts, whereupon, as a friendly favour to their sweethearts, we have had their Councillors brought here to our city of Wuerzburg with a written and live escort. And when they, the counsellors, thus arrived, they appeared at our request before us, our cathedral chaplains, knighthood and some of our countryside, and in free public interrogation did their advertisement, according to an instruction, which instruction they handed over to us in writings and had read out. And reads from word to word thus:

Instruction, what our, by God's Grace Johann, Duke of Saxony and Elector 2c., and Philippsen, Landgraves of Hesse, Councillors and dear faithful, Hans von Minckwitz, Knight 2c., and Contz Gotzman, Werner von Waldenstein and Jörg Nuß bicker, the younger, to the reverend in GOD and special dear friend, Conraden, bishop of Wuerzburg and duke of Franconia, to advertise on our behalf.

First, to report our kind service to his love, as usual, and then to speak the following opinion:

1st Most Gracious Prince and Lord! Hochgedachte unsere gnädigsten und gnädigen Herren haben uns befohlen, E. F. G. anzuzeigen: wiewohl ihre churfürstl. und fürstl. and princely graces know that their electoral and princely graces have no one. Although their electoral and princely graces know with special fame that their electoral and princely graces have never before been in the presence of E. F. G., as their friend and neighbor, of any other than friendly, neighborly and good will, their electoral and princely graces are nevertheless in credible and certain good will. Their Electoral and Princely Graces have come into credible and certain experience, to the effect that all sorts of things have happened and occurred for some time, from which their C. F. and F. G. have received such strong suspicions that their Electoral and Princely Graces are justifiably and unquestionably aware of this. Graces have to give and deliver this fair unimpeachable belief, and also hope to make such seemingly necessary and to do so at his and appropriate time.

(2) Namely, that the Holy Roman Emperor and the Holy Roman Emperor have entered into an alliance and obligation with some through their authorized councillors, and among others, against the proclaimed imperial peace, and especially against the treaty that was unanimously decided at the Imperial Diet at Speier. They are of the opinion that the Holy Roman Emperor and the Holy Roman Emperor, together with others of their kinsmen, have committed themselves to the Holy Roman Emperor and the Holy Roman Emperor in matters concerning the Holy Divine Word and Gospel, which their Electoral and Princely Graces have conferred upon them by the granting of the Holy Roman Emperor and the Holy Roman Emperor, and that the Holy Roman Emperor and the Holy Roman Emperor, together with others of their kinsmen, have committed themselves to the Holy Roman Emperor and the Holy Roman Emperor in matters concerning the Holy Divine Word and Gospel. Grace by bestowal of the graces of Almighty God in their C. F. and F. G. lands and principalities, in praise of God and out of His divine obedience (which their C. F. and F. G., the Holy Roman Catholic Church, have given to their C. F. and F. G.). F. and F. G., like every Christian, owe and are owed obedience to all others) have had preached for some time, and ceremonies held in accordance with the same, in such a way that their C. F. and F. G., by virtue of the touched Speierian farewell, are obliged to trust God and Imperial Maj. and males. Maj. and male trust, to attack and overrun their C. F. and F. G. and their country and people with war and feud, and to deprive C. F. and F. G. of their rights. F. and F. G. from the land and people miserably, wretchedly, unaccused, innocently, and without all preceding proper interrogation, and in such a way that such unkind and powerful nobles hardly experience more, wanted to help to chase them away: all this was done in the name of the Emperor.

according to the further contents of the same covenant, which we have ordered to be sent to E. F. G. Copei.

(3) And although it would not have been unreasonable to her electoral and princely graces [that she] would have done so. and princely graces, [that they] thereupon and on such vowed and joined enmity, for the protection, protection and salvation of their electoral and princely graces and their country and people's best and advantage, have stopped the same act by force. and their country and people's best and advantage, they had stopped by force to get the same action also to E. F. G. Landschaft and to complain to E. F. G. about the same: nevertheless, and irrespective of how unkindly they acted against their Elector and Princely Grace, they have acted in this way. and Princely Grace, their Electoral and Princely Grace have first of all. and Princely Grace have first of all, as is proper in the sight of God for the prevention of rising and other troublesome complaints, and subsequently Roman Imperial Majesty, their All Gracious Majesty, the Holy Roman Emperor, the Holy Roman Emperor, the Holy Roman Emperor. Majesty, their most gracious Lord, and for the third (although this has been considered little or not at all by their C. F. and F. Gn.) the neighbourhood, and especially so that it may be noted how much more their Elector and Princely Grace are to peace than to discord. are more inclined to peace than to discord, and that E. F. G. does not desire anyone's honor, goods, land or people, and for this reason intends to have us, as the skilful and for this purpose with full power dispatched councillors, deal with E. F. G. by way of peace.

(4) For if we note that F. G. will refrain from many of the covenants and undertakings touched upon and will be inclined to do to their C. F. and F. G. such assurance and assecuration, together with their chapter and estates of their countryside, as F. G. will in equity, according to the form and occasion of this transaction, be inclined to do, and for the sake of such articles of peace and assecuration we have further and special command that F. G. refrain from such and such undertakings on account of this or other matters, but against their C. F. and F. G. and the heirs of the same. F. G. refrain from such and suchlike actions for the sake of this or any other matter, but will be content against their C.F. and F. Gn. and their heirs, also against your Grace's land and people in equity and right for themselves, their Chapter, and their also their descendants, and renounce and renounce the much touched connection; in addition also to their Electoral and Princely Graces the damage to which they are entitled. and princely graces the damage, in which their electoral and princely graces, from above. We have the order, also the power and authority from our C. F. and F. G., with E. F. G., that such peace and assurance be finally executed and established with us without delay,

(5) To act thereon, and so let us be further heard, that for the sake of their C.F. and F.G. there may be no lack of that which is useful for the prevention of evil and other grievous afflictions, and for lasting peace and rights in the realm, and that in all this their C.F. and F.G. [love of peace] 1) may be felt.

6th And their C. F. and F. G. have not wished to burden E. F. G. with this in the best and for peace, nor to notice the same in any other way than that it requires great necessity on the part of their C. F. and F. G.; which their C. F. and F. Graces are kindly inclined to deserve in this case.

To such we reply and let action take care as follows:

1. the most reverend prince and lord, lord Conrad, bishop of Wuerzburg and duke of Franconia, my most gracious lord, has commanded me to send you, the strict, honorable and firm, most noble, high-born princes and lords, lord Johansen, duke of Saxony 2c., and Mr. Philipsen, Landgrave of Hesse, my most gracious and gracious lords, ordered councilors and embassies, on applications and advertisements, which they have received by virtue of their electoral and princely credence and jurisdiction. and Princely Credence and Instruction, and to my keeping, that, although my most gracious and gracious Lords of Saxony [and] of Hesse, behave towards the said my gracious Lord of Wuerzburg 2c. with all kindness and good neighborly will, and provide again, also law and all things against S. 2) F. Gn., and have never been: they have nevertheless come into credible experience, and have also received good reason to believe that the said my gracious Lord of Wuerzburg, the Holy Roman Empire's established land peace, has been violated. The Holy Roman Empire, and the recent and unanimously approved treaty at Speier, has entered into an alliance, and is of the opinion that they, along with several others, have joined his F. G., so that their C. F. and F. G. may preach the Holy Gospel more loudly and more effectively. They want to expel them from their country without being accused or prosecuted, and in such a wretched form as has ever been heard, all according to the copy of the same agreement that has been handed over. And although their C. F. and F. G. immediately without any further

2) Walch: "E." instead of: "S."

The C.F. and the F.G., considering what great bloodshed, death and mischief would result from this, have ordered you to send their embassy and to ask my gracious Lord of Würzburg for permanent peace, considering what great bloodshed, death, destruction and harm would result from this, have ordered you, their embassy, and will not refrain from requesting my gracious Lord of Wuerzburg for permanent peace, with notice where my gracious Lord of Wuerzburg again renounces and refuses the alliance made against them, and of this sufficient assurance and assurance, together with their F. G. cathedral chapters, also estates of the countryside, for their princely lords, all their descendants and all their families. G., all their descendants and foundation, that they will not take any action against my most gracious and gracious Lord of Saxony and Hesse and their heirs in perpetuity, and that they will also relinquish and pay the expired war costs, their C. F. and F. G. want to accept the peace later, and give this as an answer in accordance with the advertising that has taken place and the instructions that have been handed over, which I do not want to have diminished or increased:

(2) His F. G. cannot and do not know anything else to hear from the aforementioned advertisement and instruction, except that my most gracious and gracious Lord of Saxony and Hesse has been reported by my gracious Lord of Wuerzburg (2c). And if it were without this, my gracious Lord of Wuerzburg does not doubt at all that such advertising and reasoning would be from their C. F. and F. G. inferiority; for his Princely Grace, without glory, is not to be trusted with this. Gnaden know that during their reign, as befits a laudable, honorable, ecclesiastical prince of the Holy Roman Empire, and that they have kept the established peace of the country, order, and distinctions, as diligently as possible, and that their F. G. His sovereigns have also not placed in any mountain that it is their right and due, as an ecclesiastical prince of the Holy Roman Empire, to keep peace before others, and that if there should ever be strife and discord, they should use diligence to turn it to peaceful ways. For this reason, His Grace has always and in all cases, when matters have arisen between my most gracious and gracious lords and you, allowed them to act by friendly letters and messages, as you, the envoys, have in part undoubtedly known and can be proven with writings, and have sought nothing more than peace, and still want peace. have nothing dearer than peace, have also never been willing to overdraw their C. F. and F. Gn. or to weigh them down in other unfair ways.

(3) My most gracious lord of Wuerzburg has neither received nor heard of the alleged covenant, the copy of which has been handed over, until this day, when it has been handed over by you, the envoys; and is therefore not unaware of it, first of all, and because it is stated therein in one common document alone, that his F. Gn. at Breslau by one of the same councillors, who however is not named, shall have accepted and sworn the same agreement; which, without doubt, has been done and brought about in a malicious manner by the most illustrious of my most gracious lord of Wuerzburg, who would gladly cause strife between my most gracious and most gracious lords of Saxony and Hesse and my most gracious lord of Wuerzburg, as well as other members of the Holy Roman Empire; for my most gracious lord of Wuerzburg cannot remember that they have ever seen one of his F. Gn. Gn. Councillors to Breslau, and even less to the time, as the supposed copy reads, as one has to inquire about it with those of Breslau. My most gracious lord of Wuerzburg also says with his princely dignities and true words that his f. gn. not only did not accept or make an alliance according to the alleged copy, but never took such in mind nor thought to do so; and that is even more, such was not even sought from his princely lord. Gn. has not been sought at all. And so that my most gracious and gracious Lords of Saxony and Hesse may have sufficient faith in this, His Grace hereby undertakes and binds Himself: where it is shown, and as is justly enough proved, that His Grace has made or accepted such a covenant, they will suffer punishment for it in life and limb and in property, as is recognized, and for this reason they have justly offered to Their Grace and Grace to be released from the covenant. have justly offered to the Roman Imperial Majesty, our most gracious Lord, the Majesty's Governor and Regiment in the Holy Roman Empire, also to the Chamber Court and before the Estates of the noble Union of Swabia, also before the most reverend, most illustrious, high-born Princes, Mr. Reicharten, Archbishop of Trier, and Mr. Ludwigen, Count Palatine of the Rhine, both Princes, my most gracious Lords, also other impartial Princes of the Holy Roman Empire, such as and, in addition, before the Counts, Lords and Knights of the Holy Roman Empire in general and all of them.

4th Besides this, my gracious lord of Wuerzburg does not want to keep you that the royal dignity of Hungary and Bohemia, when they want to move into the country of Hungary, let his sovereign lords by their noble embassy, the noble, strict, and firm lords Albrechten of Wolfstein and lord Dilmann of Breme, knight 2c., for a military service and help on credence and instruction, which his Grace, however, for obvious reasons, does not want to grant and has refused, nor have their royal dignities given any help, neither with money nor otherwise, but have only lent two gunmasters, on their royal dignity's entertainment, for their march into Hungary. Thereby again to be taken for granted that the alleged copy which reports eight thousand florins has or may have no reason.

And because of all this, my gracious Lord of Würzburg will see to it that my most gracious and gracious Lords of Saxony and Hesse will keep to the proposed holy imperial peace and unanimously approved imperial treaty at Speier; as then his F. Gn. Gn. to do, and to promote the Word of God, not only willingly, but also to be guilty of, and have hitherto done as diligently as possible, by virtue of the aforesaid parting, and thus his F. Gn. their subjects undrawn and unharmed, also to assure and assure their supposed peace, since his Grace has not violated the same peace, much less overcome it, but has kept and still intends to keep the peace of the land and the confederation, such as to refrain from such a demand for the sake of the desired war costs, since his Grace has given no cause for this. Gn. have no cause for this, and are not at all to blame for it, nor have my most gracious and gracious Lord of Saxony and Hesse, for the sake of his F. Gn., decided to spend the same. For their C. F. and F. Gn., if they had let such things reach his F. Gn. with a bad letter, might well have received this truthful answer, and that his F. Gn. would have been inclined to keep nothing but peace, and to show friendly service to their C. and F. Gn.; this my gracious Lord of Wuerzburg will gladly and willingly earn for their C. and F. Gn.

6th And since my most gracious and gracious lords of Saxony and Hesse report more than once that their C. and F. Gn. seek nothing more than peace: to this my gracious lord of Wuerzburg is with diligence also inclined, but knows of no better measure than the Holy Empire's established land peace gives, to speak or to act. But if my most gracious and gracious Lords of Saxony and Hesse know of a better one, and indicate it to His Grace, they will hear it, consider it, and allow themselves to be heard in all fairness and equity.

Whereupon the envoys took notice until future Wednesdays, and so on the same day again presented before us in public interrogation, as follows:

1st Reverend in God, gracious Prince and Lord! We have heard the content of the answer that Your Grace gave yesterday to our instruction and advertisement on behalf of the most noble, high-born Princes and Lords, our most gracious and gracious Lords of Saxony and Hesse. Gn. again, as E. F. Gn. yesterday heard from our advertisement and instruction, that our most gracious and gracious lords, among other things, have instructed us to act primarily for peace and good will with E. F. Gn. Therefore once again our humble request that E.F.Gn. will engage in the action of the articles which we have to report and to discover, as far as they concern peace and assurance; but where E.F.Gn. wants to insist on the given answer is not without, we have orders to further report to our most gracious and gracious lords.

(2) But since we fear that the same will be of little use for peace and unity, we have resolved, in order to prevent all mischief and harm that might result therefrom, to announce and report orally to our most gracious and gracious Lords such answer as has been given to their C. and F. Grace, and thereafter to hand it over in writing: what then will be the opinion and occasion of their C. and F. Grace? and their opportunity, that shall be made known to their Lordships afterwards in writings. Furthermore, as far as peace is concerned, we cannot report or act on anything, with humble request that Your Grace will excuse us for our person in this.

Then we let it be said that we had heard the present argument, which was that they, the envoys, were ready to seek peace and security, which peace we, no less than they, were inclined to seek and keep. But because the words of peace and security were somewhat broad, we asked for a brief consideration; and after this we had

Consideration and repetition of the requests made by the envoys, this opinion:

The most reverend Prince and Lord, my gracious Lord of Wuerzburg, commands me to speak this opinion: it was heard yesterday in the answer given by his F. Gn. that his F. Gn. sought and still seeks and desires nothing more than to keep the peace, that also S. F. Gn. has never been willing, and still is not willing, to do or act anything unpleasant against my most gracious and gracious Lords of Saxony and Hesse, but rather to remain with the Imperial Peace and the most recent Speirian Peace. Therefore, his mind and opinion would still not allow anything to be changed in his F. Gn.'s favour, so that peace and unity, as well as friendly service and neighbourliness to both my most gracious and gracious Lords of Saxony and Hesse, can be achieved. But since the article concerning peace and security needs purification, and the Holy Roman Emperor is reluctant to refuse peace, it should be understood, as was heard yesterday, that the Holy Roman Emperor should undertake to give assurance, and thus understood and directed as if the Holy Roman Emperor had violated the peace and had not acted as a prince of the Holy Roman Empire should, and thus had imposed something on the Holy Roman Emperor. F. Gn. something, that they are innocent, because they have always acted princely and well, and not otherwise than according to the imperial peace. My most gracious and gracious Lords of Saxony and Hesse will not think, think, or do anything against his F. Grace, for she is innocent, because she has always been princely and well, and not otherwise than according to the Imperial Peace. weder gemuthen, sinnen, noch begehren, sich eines Dings zu verpflichten, daß sie unschuldig, und also ihr selbst das, so sie nicht gethan, auflegen; wo aber der Fried dahin gedeutet, daß Fried und Einigkeit gemacht und aufgerichtet werden sollt, haben seine F. Gn. sich gestern in der Antwort vernehmen lassen, daß sie keinen bessern Frieden, denn den kaiserl. aufgerichteten Landfrieden wüßten; wo sie aber sonst einen Frieden und Einigung, die zuförderst päbstl. Holiness, Imperial. Majesty, the same land peace and the order of the empire, the laudable union of Swabia, and other princes with whom his F. Grace is in friendly agreement, his F. Grace would like to hear about it, and would like to be heard. are pleased to hear of it, and to show and hold themselves out to my most gracious and gracious Lords of Saxony and Hesse for their friendly, official pleasure, in such a way that it may be felt that his F. Grace seeks, desires, has and holds peace, and in all that which is the same, right and proper, they are not opposed to it. and just, do not want to get anything. And after they, the envoys, have indicated that they will bring his F. Grace's answer to my most gracious and gracious Lords of Saxony and Hesse. And after they, the ambassadors, have indicated that they will bring an answer to my most gracious and gracious lords of Saxony and Hesse, and that their minds will be disposed to let their f. gn. know in writings, his f. gn. express their highest gratitude to them, the ambassadors, and want to recognize this in their gracious will; and they hope that my most gracious and gracious lords of Saxony and Hesse will offer his f. gn. more than enough to them, and that they will be able to tell their f. gn. in writings. They will understand the open mind that leads to peace, and will be satisfied with this answer, and will not do anything unpleasant against their favors or their relatives, but will keep and show themselves in accordance with the order of the realm and the peace of the land, and especially my most gracious lord, Landgrave Philip of Hesse. This is what his F. Gn. want to kindly earn and owe against their C. and F. Gn.

Accordingly the Saxon and Hessian Envoys 2c. They want, as they offered before, to present the oral and written answer, also now, to our lords and friends of Saxony and Hesse faithfully and with diligence, and put in no doubt that their love would show itself against it and act, as is due and well suited to them, also unrefusable; They have therefore taken their leave, and thanked us for all our gracious assistance, with a submissive request that we escort them back to the places where they were accepted into the escort, and that they may, for their own good, act between our lords and friends of Saxony and Hesse and us in these matters, which they would do most humbly, and not allow anything to be done to them.

Hereupon we let say to them: We accepted such a good-willed offer of theirs as a gracious favor, to recognize in grace and all good, asking and requesting them, the envoys, to the highest, to apply our given answer and innocence to the best and most faithful, if we were of the opinion that our lords and friends of Saxony and Hesse would be satiated with it, and would not be moved in evil or further development against us and our foundation or ours, but would behave all friendly and neighborly will towards us. This we also want to do and not be felt otherwise. For the sake of the seduction we consider the thanks unnecessary, because we are inclined to do so for ourselves, and we want to escort them again with a living escort through our foundation, country and land.

and territory in places where we have to guide, for where something repugnant would be due to them, we would be heartily sorry.

And from this, in view of the fairness, rightfulness, and our excessive offer, which we, as heard here above, have made, in addition to the display of our obvious innocence, we want to take care of it completely, so that our lords and friends of Salmon and Hesse do not overreach us, or ours, nor burden us in any other way, nor damage us, but shall keep the peace of the holy realm and the treaty of the realm, as well as the alliance agreement, which is most dear to us, and which we, in turn, are quite willing and inclined to earn and settle in a friendly manner with their loved ones.

But if this does not happen, and we are overrun, attacked and damaged by their loved ones, and against all this, it is to your love, and to all of you in particular, our very friendly and favourable request that your love and you will not do them and yours any help, assistance, advice or encouragement against us and our foundation. Whether your love and you also have some of your own with them, order them away and home, also handle, protect and protect us, as a prince of the holy realm, and our monastery's subjects and relatives in the established peace, imperial decrees and imperial treaties. And whether the matters have reached your love and you in a different form than is truly indicated herein, or would still reach you, we do not give credence to them, nor do we settle them, but have completely and utterly excused ourselves, as we are innocent in the right truth of the matters involved. This we, together with equity, are willing and inclined to do in order to deserve, instruct, and recognize your love and the rest of you, and each one in particular, according to each one's dignity, standing, and character, in a friendly, favorable, and gracious manner. Given under our secret, printed at the end of the writing, on Thursday after Exaudi [28 May] Anno 2c. in the 28th year of the month.

838. the archbishop of Salzburg's brief apology to the imperial regiment at Speier put. The 3rd of June 1528.

In Hortleder I. c. S. 596.

Issued by our most gracious lord of Salzburg rc. to the imperial regiment at Speier.

Most gracious, noble, honorable, learned, and festive, especially dear! We have your friendship and your letter, whose date is on the 25th day of this month.

Maji, together with the enclosed copy of a supposed, fictitious union, which should be contrary to the Highborn Princes, our dear lords and friends, the Elector of Saxony and the Landgrave of Hesse 2c., with about much narration, what has been done so far by you in the matters with the reported Elector and Landgrave, also what is against it your both dearest indications and requests, with the unattached request that we take action on our part for the most beneficial of the things and have appointment, so that further mischief and outrage will be prevented, further contents understood. And thereupon we give your friendship and your love in good opinion, and with the truth to acknowledge that we have no knowledge at all of such a fictitious union. We have never been to Breslau, neither at the time when such a union is to be established, nor ever come otherwise, nor have we had any of our embassies there, nor have we ever thought of such an action and undertaking, nor have we taken it into our minds; which will never be otherwise invented with any truth. No one so ignorant of our and our convent's occasion, and especially of the great ruin into which we have been led by the two past uprisings, through no fault of our own, can appreciate how utterly unrighteous and untruthful we are drawn in the untruthful alliance mentioned, together with the fact that we desire nothing better than peace and unity in the holy kingdom and in all Christendom. Therefore, your friendship and you must understand that it is unnecessary for us to take any action or make any request, but our request and plea is to your friendship and to you that you will excuse us and talk to you and to your men about such things and such imaginary covenants. To this end, we provide that you, in the place of the Emperor's Majesty, will, according to the form of these highly important matters and the swift and dangerous runs, take such measures that such dangerous armaments, applications and exercises will be stopped, and that the peace of the Emperor and the Holy Roman Empire will be preserved, and the Holy Roman Empire, and that the royal dignity of Hungary and Bohemia, as well as the other princes and rulers, who have been drawn into the above-mentioned imaginary union, are, as we fully respect them, of the same stature without any reason, and that all our honour, innocence and need be taken into account; we would your friendship and you on the same letter friendly and gracious opinion not behave. Date in our city of Salzburg, on the Wednesday after the holy day of Pentecost [3 June] Anno Domini 1528.

339 King Ferdinand's apology for the alliance. June 1, 1528.

This writing appeared under a similar title as the 837th document. After that with Horlleder I. e. p. 596.

1st We Ferdinand by the Grace of God, of Hungary and Bohemia, Dalmatia, Croatia 2c. King, Infante in Hispania, Archduke of Austria, Duke of Burgundy, Styria, Carinthia, Crain and Würtemberg rc., Count of Tyrol rc., Roman Imperial Majesty, Governor of the Holy Roman Empire 2c. 2c., to all and any princes, princes, ecclesiastical and secular, prelates, counts, freemen, lords, knights, servants, captains, governors, 1) bailiffs, stewards, mayors, magistrates, councillors, citizens and municipalities, and otherwise to all others of the Holy Roman Empire, also of our kingdoms. Kingdom, as well as our kingdoms, principalities and lands, subjects and faithful, in whatever dignity, status or being they may be, to whom this letter of ours is addressed, our special love, friendship, affectionate will, grace and all good things. High and venerable, high-born princes, well-born, strict, noble, honorable, respectable, learned, renowned dear friends, uncle, cousin, brothers-in-law, special love and faithful!

(2) Although it has come to our attention in the recent past that the highborn princes, our dear uncle and friend, Lord John, Archmarshal and Elector of the Holy Roman Empire, Duke of Saxony, Landgrave of Thuringia and Margrave of Meissen, and Lord Philip, Landgrave of Hefsen 2c., have been engaged in a little armament of a war party, and that there has been an outcry in the country, as if such armament had been made on some estates of the Holy Roman Empire. Whereupon we, as imperial governor, have diligently taken notice of the matter, and in many ways have taken care of amicable negotiations through notable persons, of high princely and other rank, in order to learn what nobility the above-mentioned two sovereigns and princes would be, so that such an application would be put to rest and peace: We could not have been reminded of the right reason of such armament sooner, because until the last days the mentioned Elector of Saxony had his embassy with us in our kingdom of Bohemia, the same has brought us, among other things, a copy of an alleged, fictitious, untrue alliance or agreement, as it is to be called, which in the beginning was directed to us, and in the following order to the high and venerable princes of Saxony,

1) In the old edition: "Bißthumen".

High-born Princes, our dear Oheime, Cousins and Friends, Mr. Albrechten, Cardinals, Archbishops and Electors of Mainz; Mr. Joachim, Arch Chamberlain and Elector of the Holy Empire, both Margraves of Brandenburg rc.; Mr. Matthäus, 2) Cardinals and Archbishops of Salzburg rc.; Herr Weiganden, at Bamberg, and Herr Conraden, at Würzburg; Bishops; Herr Georgen, Dukes of Saxony, Landgraves in Thuringia, and Margraves at Meissen; Mr. Wilhelmen and Mr. Ludewigen, brothers, Palgraves of the Rhine, Dukes of Upper and Lower Bavaria, and which last year against the said Electors of Saxony and Landgraves of Hesse, and their two Electorates, Principalities and Lands shall be established, sealed, pledged, and sworn; that after the reading of the same imagined union we receive not only astonishment, but also the highest complaint.

(3) And have thereupon sent our answer in writing to the same Elector, with a true denial and contradiction of such fictitious matter, and have requested that it be reported to his dear uncle, the Landgrave, because it also comprehends his love, and that the same be dismissed from her nobility with her armor. But before such our responsibility reaches the said Landgrave, we have received from the Imperial Government in the Holy Roman Empire a copy of such a declaration. The same is true for a copy of the alleged alliance, which the said Elector of Saxony and the Landgrave have sent to the same government;

(4) And subsequently from another place a copy of a letter of invitation, which is to be issued to all estates under the above-mentioned Landgrave's imprinted secret, is received, which among other things refers to the above-mentioned alleged, fictitious, untruthful alliance, and which the above-mentioned Elector of Saxony and Landgrave, to excuse their dear armament and application of the people of war, intend to avail themselves of. And since we, along with other aforementioned princes and princes, are accused of the same fictitious union or alliance in a most unjust and untruthful manner, and we are accused of the same from the aforementioned Landgrave's letter, which is based on the untruthful agreement, as if we and the princes and chieftains, as reported above, were to be in the act of opposing and suppressing the living, gracious word of God, and of the Holy Roman Empire, which has been established. Roman Empire, also the unification of the Union of Swabia, all Nuremberg, Augsburg, and Speier agreements made by the empire, and all equity, to chase away and expel their love of the same churality and principality, also land and people; as such is indicated by the letter of the oft-counted fictitious, untruthful covenant, and now mentioned landgrave's letter, according to length:

2) In the old edition: "Mattheusen" == Matthaussen.

(5) Thus we are urged and caused to take our responsibility against such a proclamation in the following manner, until it can be further and with more execution by the other sovereigns and princes, in addition to all of us, according to our need. And therefore report to your beloved, and to you the others, also manly, with right reason and truth, that we know ourselves to be quite free against God and the world of such fictitious, untruthful alliance, and to be accused of and to declare it untruthful; For it shall never be shown by anyone, whoever he may be, with truth that we have thought to establish such a union, or such a supposed one, let alone that we have sworn, pledged, and sealed it with the princes and rulers; and can understand nothing else with us, but that such a pretended notel or copy of the untruthful union is a fictitious thing, and brought on the way by him or by those, who not only between us, and the other Electors and Princes, obgemeldt, and the said Duke John of Saxony and the Landgrave 2c. Displeasure and enmity, but also rebellion, insurrection, and disobedience in the holy kingdom. They are pleased to see that they are able to do so for their own benefit and service; We therefore desire nothing better than that the one or ones who have thus subjected themselves to this heated, scanty practice, which is untruthful in it, should be presented and denounced to us, so that we may so oppose the same or those who are guilty of the matter, If we were to be presented with a counter-answer against the same or those who are guilty of the matter, we would hold and show ourselves to be manly with honor and praise, and the opposite to be untruthful, and that he has done and made such of himself, to his advantage and benefit, and to a disruption of all honorable conduct and being in the holy kingdom. He should recognize that this has been done and made for his own advantage and benefit. For your dears and you have well to consider, if the supposed, imagined alliance should be true, as it is not, we would not have endeavored so much to refuse the armor and application, as has happened, in many ways, but from the cause [of] the said Elector of Saxony and the Landgrave's armor, we together with the other unreasonably accused churals and princes, also in armor and counter-armor, would not have been able to prevent this.

But we have not undertaken any of them, otherwise, what has happened in our principality of Würtemberg through our government there, that it has come to light how Ulrich, who calls himself Duke of Würtemberg, should have had the intention, with his relatives, to invade our principality: Let your beloved and you, the others, and only we, of sincere, honorable mind, recognize that we, if God wills, walk in the right way according to the praise of God, and do our things in the light and not in secret, or do them in this way and commit ourselves to it, that (as the supposed imaginary agreement, and on it the mentioned Landgrave's letter wants to be understood) should be to the subversion of the true word of God, and against the imperial peace, the agreement of the Union of Swabia, and all the agreements made by the Empire. For we may well talk and discuss this without glory, nor shall it ever be brought upon us that we have ever been present to this, as has been foretold; so we also intend to keep ourselves Christian and unprovable in such things as befits a just king, and as our ancestors, Roman emperors, kings, and archdukes of Austria, have commendably brought upon us.

6. And therefore it is our friendly and gracious request, request and desire to your love and you, where the said fictitious covenant, likewise [the] aforementioned landgrave's letter is printed, or otherwise occurs in other ways to your love and you, or would still be indicated, you will not give credence to it, but will regard and hold such alleged alliance as a fictitious, untrue matter (such as it is), as it will in time be brought to light more clearly and unambiguously by our and the other sovereigns and princes named with us. Therefore, according to our answer, given to the said Elector, his beloved, the Landgrave of Hesse, nor her relatives, should not be in any danger or worry because of such fictitious alliance, for our sake and ours, if we are powerful; For we, not only as imperial governor, but also for ourselves, as a Christian king and an obeyer of the said imperial majesty, do not wish to endanger the aforementioned imperial peace, nor peace, justice and unity in the Holy Roman Empire. May you always be willing, eager and inclined to help, plant and maintain the said imperial peace, justice and unity in the Holy Roman Empire, only for comfort and good, for the help of our property. May your love and you be completely satisfied and provided for us, and

Your love and you show us in such that they give no credence to the above invented covenant, together of equity, especially friendly and pleasant pleasure, which we want to recognize in such and more about the same your love and you, the others, in friendship and gracious will. Given on St. Wenceslas' Hill, in our royal city of Prague, the first day of June, after the birth of Christ fifteen hundred and in the eighth and twentieth, of our kingdoms in the other year.

849 The Dukes of Bavaria, William and Louis, public writing, which they have sent out for their excuse.

In Hortleder I. c. S. 398.

(1) To all and every prince, prince, ecclesiastical and secular, and to all other relatives and subjects of the Holy Roman Empire, in whatever dignities, status and nature they may be, we, William and Ludwig, Palgraves of the Rhine, Dukes of Upper and Lower Bavaria, brothers, by the grace of God, offer our friendly service, and what we are able to do in the way of honour, love and goods, friendship, friendly and favourable greetings beforehand.

(2) We have been informed in days gone by of the most illustrious, most great prince and lord, Mr. Carl 2c., Roman emperor, our most gracious dear lord and cousin, imperial and his majesty and of the Holy Roman Empire. Reichs Regiment, now at Speier, also from other places, and lastly by the Highborn Prince, our Oheim, Herr Philipsen, Landgrave of Hesse 2c., Copies of a print, of which in his dear missive, to us, report happened of a fictitious, supposed alliance, so by the noble prince, our friendly dear lord and cousin, lord Ferdinand, king of Hungary and Bohemia, infante in Hispania, archduke of Austria 2c., imperial majesty governor in the empire. Majesty Governor in the Empire, and other Electors and Princes, as they are indicated by name therein, to be erected by us at Breslau, on Wednesday after the Sunday Jubilate [May 15] of the past seven and twentieth years, against the Highborn Prince, our dear cousin, Mr. Johannsen, Duke of Saxony, Elector 2c., and the said Landgrave of Hesse.

3rd Besides it has also been reported that now thought of, Elector and Prince of Saxony and Hesse, such supposed alliance into print, and sent it to many estates of the Holy Roman Empire, attributed it to them publicly. They have thereby excused their dear armor, craft, and attire, as if such should be done for a counter-defense. And although we fully respect that the royal dignity of Hungary and Bohemia, our friendly dear lord and cousin, as well as other attracted princes and princes, have sufficiently indicated, and the truth from the work will seemingly be revealed from day to day, that the presumed alliance has not only not been decided or established, but also has never been made by the named, their royal dignity, princes, and princes. We have also sent our reply to the Imperial Regiment, and likewise to our uncle, the Landgrave, and are partly excused in such a way of his dear letter of the proposed alliance and appendix; for which reason some further apology or responsibility on our part would be unnecessary; as your love and friendship are also to be understood from our writings and replies, such as those that follow. And initially from our answer, attributed to the imperial regiment, as follows:

By the Grace of God, Wilhelm and Ludwig, brothers, Palgraves of the Rhine, Dukes of Upper and Lower Bavaria 2c.

Our greetings beforehand, most gracious, noble and learned, especially dear! We have read your letter, together with the copy of a covenant, which should have been established by our friendly dear Lord and cousin, Lord Ferdinand, King of Hungary and Bohemia, and several other Princes, Princes and us at Breslau, and cannot wonder enough, nor consider on what opinion we should understand such a pretence on our part; for we have had no knowledge of this or such an alliance up to this time, nor have we had our embassies and counsels with the royal dignity at Breslau on account of this or other matters. Therefore, you may understand that it is unnecessary for us to ask for the dissolution and enactment of these covenants and for peace, since we, as Christian princes, would like nothing better than to see unity in the holy Christian faith, peace and acceptance of the German nation, and to help to achieve this. Our gracious request and plea is also to you that you not give any credence to such charges of ours, and that you not even give us any credence with yourselves and others in this matter.

We apologize to you for the enclosure and the established covenant, and wish to discuss it. It serves us well to acknowledge our favorable and gracious will towards you. Date Munich, May 28th Anno 2c. in the 28th year.

To the high-born, noble, and highly learned, our special dear ones, imperial governors, stewards, and other decreed councilors of the imperial regiment in the holy empire, now at Speier.

Thus reads our uncle the landgrave's missive, which he has done to us herein, as follows:

Our friendly service, and what we are able to do dear and good, always before, highborn princes, friendly dear homes! We have come to the credible knowledge that an alliance is to be established between the Highborn Prince, Mr. Johannsen, Duke of Saxony, Archmarshall and Elector of the Holy Roman Empire, Landgrave of Thuringia and Margrave of Meissen, our friendly dear uncle, brother-in-law and godfather, and us, and that we are sending an imprint to your beloved; and after we have also been credibly reported that your love shall have written down such alliance in time 1). Wherefore, when we, according to the report we have received, have fully provided for it, we should have had special confidence in your love, and your love should have taken care of our grandfather, brother-in-law and godfather, and us, without any harm, but rather should have waited for service and friendship. Request, after all this, your love friendly, correct, described, conducive answer, with this our messenger. Date in our camp at Herrenbreitungen, on the Thursday after Exaudi [28 May] Anno Christi 1528.

LeUsäuln.

We also do not want to hold back your love, that we have always provided ourselves with all friendship and friendly good will towards them, we also comfort ourselves of this, and are completely confident that your love will not let itself be moved to ill-will in such unjust matters against us; the same answer begging. Date ut in littsrib.

Philips Landgrave of Hesse 2c. ss. z. t. 8nd86rip8it^.

To the Highborn Princes, Mr. Wilhelmen and Mr. Ludwigen, brothers, Dukes of Upper and Lower Bavaria, Palgraves of the Rhine, our kind and dear grandparents.

1) "written out," that is, as we see from the answer, refused the alliance.

Hereupon our Duke William's answer, which we have given to the Landgrave of Hesse to such his letter.

Highborn prince, dear uncle! We have received your dear letter, addressed to us in their camp at Herrenbreitungen, on Thursday after Exaudi, yesterday outside of the print of the supposed suggested covenant, of which there is a report in your dear missive, in the absence of the Highborn Prince, our dear brother, Duke Ludwig; and nevertheless a few days ago we received from the imperial regiment at Speier a copy of an alliance, which was established by the noble Prince, our dear Lord and cousin, Lord Ferdinand, King of Hungary and Bohemia, together with several other princes, princes and us, at Breslau a year ago against the Prince of Saxony 2c. and your love should have been set up; to which we have given them an answer, according to the enclosed copy marked A. and leave it at that 2); and give your love this answer to their request: That your love reports this alliance with falsehood, and that it is fabricated by a dishonorable man who is inclined to sedition, war, and the shedding of Christian blood, and to lead your love and other princes to ruin; For we have no knowledge of such fictitious, untruthful alliance, nor have we been accused of it by others, to the effect that at the same or other times of this untruthful alliance, or also of other alliances or matters, we have not had our counsels and embassies at Breslau by royal dignity; otherwise no one, whoever he may be, may say or pretend of us with truth. Your love shall also recognize us of the princely mind, where your love asks us of it or otherwise, as acted by us, we do not want to have the truth kept, also do not wish to keep all our doings secret, but may well suffer the light. But we would have provided ourselves to your love completely, the same should not give credence to the untrue report against us, but reminded us beforehand, and learned our answer and the truth; likewise, not so in the print, as we may think, spread out everywhere, drawn in and named beside others, but still ascribe your love to us, that the same reports credibly that we are no longer related to the drawn alliance. And although we consider the royal dignity and other princes and rulers to be aware of this supplement, of their opportunity, of the fact that we are no longer related to the alliance.

2) In the old edition:

If we do not want to save your love from its letter, your love will undoubtedly find the reason for the truth of this reply from us. Date in our city Munich, the third day of June, Anno 1528.

By the Grace of God, William, Count Palatine of the Rhine, Duke of Upper and Lower Bapern 2c.

To the Highborn Prince, our dear Oheim, Mr. Philipsen, Landgrave of Hesse and Count of Katzenelnbogen 2c.

Nevertheless, since we have carried out all our doings with the help of the Almighty, as befits honest, pious, Christian princes, and have inherited from our honest forefathers, the time of our lives, and intend to continue in it, that we have been included in the sent out pressure without any permanent causes besides royal dignity, our friendly dear lord and cousin and other princes and princes: so our princely honours demand high and unavoidable necessity, our innocence not only against the imperial regiment, Electors of Saxony and Landgraves of Hesse, but rather and solely so that with all other honour-loving states, with which we might have grown into suspicion with an untrue poem, our reported responsibilities might not come to hand, to declare our innocence, and with constant, firm reason and truth so to do, that our detractors may have their untruthful mouths shut, and the pious may see and feel what perilous times we fall into, and that the father of all lies would ever willingly stir up disgust, outrage, destruction, bloodshed, and most grievous eternal damnable judgment of many Christian souls. And, after all, we may not conceal from your love, friendship, and all the rest of you, that we have hitherto shown and kept ourselves so neighbourly with all our neighbouring kings, princes, communes, and others (without glory to report) in the time of our government, that we shall be blameless of our hopes of such intentions, and of other unjust complaints from them all; of which we are also still of a mind, and not only against our neighbours, but against male ones. From which is to be deduced what favor, will, or mind we bear for ourselves to the covenant made, where the same should be established. And therefore he that, whether he be of high or low estate.

To our cousin and uncle, the Elector of Saxony and Landgrave of Hesse, by your love, friendship, and all of you others, we have heard in a different form than now, and in particular that we have had some favor or knowledge of, adhered to, or agreed to, seal, or decreed by our councils the covenant indicated above, or have had one through our councils, or have had one at the same time or at other times with the royal dignity at Breslau, or have also been suggested such a covenant by someone, falsely reported and issued by us: The same has acted, speaks and says as a dishonorable, mendacious man; we also know ourselves so free before God and man that all of this should never be said, proven, nor imposed by us with the least indication and truth. That the proposed covenant, on our part, is also an inhuman, let us say unchristian, dishonorable, false poem. We also hope, in all respectability, that the above-mentioned cousins and uncle, the Elector of Saxony and the Landgrave of Hesse, as honest princes of the Holy Roman Empire, will know how to denounce the author and sponsor of the often-mentioned false pact, and the royal dignity of Hungary and Bohemia, as well as the other princes, princes and us, in addition to all and every honorable people, who are annoyed by this denunciation, more than to have the same dishonest, lying man before their eyes; From this, then, there will be constant peace, and such unheard-of wickedness in the German nation will be put to rest, and the right, true reason will be reported, and the distrust that arises from this among all potentates, even the common man, will be rejected unquestioningly and with the truth. We have also, and especially about our uncle, the landgrave's, letter, in which his love reports that the same credibly reports that we should have written out such an alliance in time, not provided that we, through his love, and even less the Elector of Saxony, who is related to us with near blood, should have drawn in our unsought and unaccountable, in the outgoing print and writings, and then this excuse is the fair truth: Accordingly, to your love, friendship, and you, all others to whom this print and answer of ours comes to be read, is our kind request, amicable request, and gracious desire, that you give full credence to such our true apology, and to our repugnants and the lying poet, or others who accuse us of the lying alliance.

And even if this responsibility of ours is sharpened with somewhat heated words by someone, we still ask him to consider our princely traditions, and that we want to be infamous and brought into disrepute with males, and for this reason may not have to circumvent our need for honor, just as everyone is obliged to save his honor in the same case. For the sake of your love and friendship, and for the sake of each one of you, whatever his rank and nature, we will kindly pardon and acknowledge this. Date in our city of Munich, under our preprinted Secret, on the fifth day of the month of June, Domini fifteen hundred and in the eighth and twentieth.

In what manner we George, by the grace of God Duke of Saxony, Landgrave of Thuringia, and Margrave of Meissen, have been accused by Martin Luther of being

The poetic alliance half in writings unintelligible indicated, and thereupon our answer.

(1) Although we have heretofore, when we at the outset of the covenant made against the high-born princes, our friendly dear cousins, uncle and sons, Mr. Johannsen, Duke of Saxony, Elector 2c., and Mr. Philippen, Landgrave of Hesse 2c, shall be set up, accused, have our answer heard and put in print, also answer against the presented announcer of the same alliance, Otten Pack, and have our innocence brought to light, so that no honest man with some credible appearance will have or know the least to attribute to us that we ever advised or acted of the intention of which the fictitious alliance reports; Let alone that we should have something written about it in a note, or otherwise have some science about it; for which reason we should not be unjustly spared from all suspicion, accusation and slander, even further responsibility.

2. However, because Martin Luther may not have tolerated such a thing from his conceived envy,' nor recognize the truth of our public innocence, but such a poetic alliance, and on it especially us, now and then in his writings does attract and form in the people, and we note that this man, without all difference and fuss of his proceeding, is given faith and chance by many, and we note that this man, without all distinction and attention to his actions, is given faith and coincidence by many, so our necessity demands that we neither pass over such things in silence nor leave them unanswered, but merely indicate with what consistency and reason Luther held himself in such his pretensions.

3. Initially, we are reminded of the words that he uses in the preface of the booklet, in response to the mandate of the venerable in God, our special dear friend, John, Bishop of Meissen, namely: 1) "But our Lutheran princes must not come to such honor, yes, everyone must be theirs, and for this purpose seek treacherous plots and alliances against them, of which they must be ashamed themselves afterwards; as also happened to the plot at Mainz" 2c.

004 By which words every man shall know that he hath made a covenant, and therewith would willingly make men believe it, but in a hidden form. And in general, so that, when he is called to account for these words, he may say that he has this Covenant not meant, for which reason we also could not well have assumed such word soon.

(5) But subsequently, and a few days ago, we received a Latin writing which Luther wrote to Wenceslaus Linken against Nuremberg, not only about this covenant, but also about our apology, which had gone out, and which attacks it and us somewhat violently, and reads thus:

[D. Martin Luther's writing to Wenceslaus Link.] 1)

Grace and peace. Thou knowest more of the new paper than I can write. The alliance of the godless princes, which they deny, you see what motive it made, but 2) Duke George's very coldest excuse, which I interpret almost as a confession. Now, if they deny it, excuse it, or make it up, I know for a fact that the covenant is not nothing, or a chimera, although it is a miracle, and sufficiently miraculous for the whole world to know that they have publicly tried, done, and are still doing such things with their minds, with their deeds, with their commandments, 3) with stiff-necked diligence, up to this point: for they want to have destroyed the gospel, and no one can deny that.

But what is it to thee, who without doubt are sure of all this? only that thou knowest that we also believe nothing of the wicked, though we offer, desire, and give them peace. May God disgrace the most foolish of fools , More boldly than Moab can do, and not doing according to his might, as he hath done in all his ways. We will pray against these murderers, and so far they have been forgiven. But if they will be subdued again, let us pray to God, and then admonish the princes, that they may be destroyed without mercy; for the insatiable bloodsuckers will not rest, for they find that Germany is moistened with blood.

We're working in the Prophets now, getting them to...

1) According to Seidemann's "Explanations," 1. c.

2) In Latin: sed - but.

3) In Seidemann: "gebeth". If otherwise this reading is correct, then "gebeth" stands for areas. Latin: käieto.

Germanize. Oh God, what a great and annoying work it is to force the Hebrew scribes to speak German; how they resist, and do not want to leave their Hebrew ways at all, and follow the coarse German. As if the nightingale hastened, so the cuckoo's singing in unison, all the same should leave her lovely melody, and sing after the cuckoo. See you in good health, and pray to God for us. Sunday after Barnabas [14 June] 1528. Martin Luther.

To the very best and God-fearing man, Wenceslao Linken, a servant of Christ in the Gospel at Nuremberg, his brother.

(6) Although it is now easy to sense from the poem and other circumstances that such writing came from him, we have not failed to ascertain this thoroughly ourselves from him, whether he intended to insist on such his writing, or to give it another interpretation and excuse, and to indicate to us what caused him to do so, and to have it written to him for this reason, as follows:

[Writing of Duke George of Saxony to D. Martin Luther.] 4)

By the Grace of God George, Duke of Saxony 2c.

A copy of a letter sent by you to Wenceslao Linken against Nuremberg not long ago occurred to us yesterday before date 5) as you have to decide in this. Although we would like to give credence to this, our need requires us to know this from you as well, and we therefore request that you inform us clearly in writing to our messenger whether you have sent such a letter to the above-mentioned Linken, according to the one in this letter, so that we may be guided by it. Given at Dresden, Wednesday Simon and Jude [Oct. 28] An. 2c. 28.

Martins Luthern zu Wittenberg zu Handen.

4) According to Seidemann's "Erläuterungen", 1. c.

5) that is the 27th of October. Strange is therefore the remark, which, as Seidemann, "Lutherbriefe", p. 34, states, Thomas von der Heiden is supposed to have put on the back of the copy of the previous letter, that it was made "hewt Samptags nach Martins (14. November)". Here is either a clerical error of von der Heiden or a reading error of Seidemann. We assume that "Saturday after Severini", that is October 24, is to be read. The Erlanger Briefwechsel, Vol. VI, p. 289, has printed the above remark from Seidemann without expressing any reservations about it.

007 And if we had been careful, because we desired to know nothing but the truth of him, he should at least have allowed himself to be heard with the right answer, yes or no. But we have been given a broad answer, according to the following:

[D. Martin Luther's reply to Duke George of Saxony.] 1)

Grace and peace in Christ. I have received a letter from E. F. G., in which E. F. G. requests from me a note or copy of half an answer as to whether I am aware of such a letter; and this, as if I had to sit here waiting, like the least obligated or prisoner. To this my short answer is: Since E. F. G. is well aware of my great patience, which I have hitherto borne over the preface to the New Testament of Emser, and the answer to my heartfelt humble writing; so I will also have patience this time over this piece, which E. F. G. considers a great and heavy challenge. And humbly ask E. F. G. to leave me untried with such notes or copies. E. F. G. will undoubtedly find out from those who have received and handed such notes, even without Luther's help, what such writings are that are more related to E. F. G. than to me. I do not want to have written anything harder this time against such pious people. For I would be Christianly inclined to have mercy and to pray for E. F. G.'s affliction, if E. F. G. could suffer it. Hiemit GOtt befohlen, Amen. At Wittenberg, Saturday of the last of October 1528.

E. F. G.

willing Martinus Luther.

To the most illustrious, highborn Prince and Lord, Duke of Saxony, Landgrave in Thuringia and Margrave of Meissen, my gracious Lord.

008 From this we could not clearly find that he wanted to confess to such a writing, or to deny the same; by which we were then caused to find out about it further and at the council at Nuremberg; where we then found, that Wenceslaus Linke has been confessed, and still is, that such a Latin writing as indicated has come to him from Martin Luther.

1) According to Seidemann's "Lutherbriefe", p. 34.

009 But how it is fitting and proper for an honorable man, and first of all for him who thinks he is evangelical, to flee the truth in response to such a writing, in which he attacks us with invective more favorably than others, and not to confess clearly that which he may easily be convicted of, is for men alone to judge, and whether in doing so they will say yes or no to the teaching of Christ which interprets us.

10. From this it should be felt sufficiently what good one has to provide for such a one, especially because he did not leave it at that, but about that, that he had no doubts, how we have shown our innocence against the presented announcer of this poetic alliance, he has given the common man the words indicated before, in the booklet of both forms, in another way, so that one should ever have it and believe that at least such a covenant was made, and thus something true was in it and in front of the hand.

(11) But we, praise God, are certain of it, and that such a writing is a public lie, that Martin Luther with all his fine followers will not know or be able to show the slightest appearance that it could be taken for granted, or that it could be considered and made credible that we have ever spoken and acted, or even thought, of the things of which such a poetic covenant is said.

012 But yet this evangelical man is so bold and impudent, and may spread such an exuberant lie, not only as if he had it from hearsay, but about that, that all those who were attracted by such a poem answer in the negative, for a certain truth, and so write of us:

"Duke George's coldest apology I interpret almost as a confession."

(13) How cold our apology has been, the letter gives, nor do we yet know how we should make a more vehement and heated denial of such an accusation. If it had been so cold and similar to a confession, as Luther presents it, it would not have brought out the announcer of such a poem. Therefore it has ever more warmth than Luther's, Pack's, and all others' accusation and imputation. Which have nothing more than the most bare, coldest, and most lying words, and no one even knows how to indicate the time as such.

The only one who could say with any truth that the poetic alliance was written in Breslau, or who ever said that she had heard of such an undertaking, or even seen the note. But we have all those who were at Breslau at the same time, among whom none will say such a thing about us with certainty, and that he wants to be known, and will blame us.

(14) It is true that Pack, in order to give shape to his lie, initially invoked the Highborn Prince Henry the Younger, Duke of Brunswick and Lüneburg, our kind and dear Lord, that his love should have seen a copy of this covenant with us. However, on the day when he presented himself as the announcer of this covenant, he not only did not admit it, but also when his former fame and calling were held up to him, he quietly passed over it and did not know how to insist on it. We have, however, offered and requested that Duke Henry of Brunswick be questioned about it; if his love, or anyone else, can credibly say with truth that, before the copy of such a poem was sent, something, and even the least part of it, was seen with or around us with our knowledge, then we will say that Luther did not do us an injustice, that he calls our excuse the very coldest.

(15) But without this it is necessary for our honor to say that Luther is the coldest liar that we can think of, and that he cannot give his lie any warmth or form, and without any cause or necessity must always mix it in. And since he boasts of a spirit, as it is also attributed to him by his followers, it is truly not he who teaches him to recognize and state lies for lies, and truth for truth, but the very contradiction. And for this reason he must consider our truthful excuse as a lie, and say: he interprets it, and interprets it for a confession of the covenant.

016 From this every one may well perceive how many such lying interpretations he will have taught and imagined in the holy scriptures, before from the poor simple-minded man. After he has also now let himself be heard to want to write Eccles. Hist. of the miraculous works that happened in his Gospel, he may well put this lie of his into it; for it is well worthy of one, and almost well worthy of the others.

017 And if he had the spirit of truth with him, he would not have doubted him from many seeming indications, which are also to be found in natural things.

The authors of the book, who have come to the knowledge of their own reason, state that the poetic covenant is nothing other than a pure well of falsehoods and lies, and namely from the style, as such the right, and first of all the ecclesiastical, should clearly indicate. It may well be, however, that because they burned Luther, grace did not unreasonably deprive him of this knowledge.

(18) And although such a falsehood can be noted in many ways, it appears in particular, first of all, from the title of the Royal Serenity of Hungary and Bohemia, which time has also written itself King of Hungary, and yet in this poem it alone is given the title "of Bohemia. 1)

19) On the other hand, Royal Serene Highness of their ancestors, Kings of Hungary and Bohemia, is not used to mention them with the title so common to princes, but to call them Serene Highnesses, and King Ludewig, more blessed, their brother; all of which is omitted here, not only in Royal Serene Highness, but also in the names of the other princes and princes, and nevertheless High King Ludwig is called "gracious lord", 2) quite contrary to the usage of the chanceries.

20) Thirdly, in the words: "our most gracious dear brother and most gracious lord", 3) the right chancery order is not kept, but according to the state of the persons who mention imperial majesty, the chancery would have made it thus: our dear lord brother, most gracious and most gracious lord.

(21) Fourthly, the princes of Saxony are accustomed to place the land of Thuringia before that of Saxony; and this is not always respected, but is sometimes reversed. 4)

22) For the fifth, more is laid on us for the sake of exaggeration, 5) than otherwise two or three; whereby one should ever have felt the poem.

23) Sixthly, the Royal Serene Highness of Hungary and Bohemia does not presume to write or name "her prince" 6) to us as we have indicated in this poem; in this connection the error is to be noted in particular.

24th To the seventh, is public on the day, that Storkau and Besko are not principalities, but two dominions, 7) and our cousin, the Elector of Saxony, inwardly twenty years not been; are however so set, like other falsehood more.

2) No. 829, § 2.

3) No. 829, § 3.

4) No. 829, U 3 and 5.

5) Jn No. 830.

6) No. 829, § 5.

25th To the eighth, we shall "deal with both Dukes of Brunswick"; 1) and yet it is at day that Duke Erich of Brunswick is equal in time to us at Breslau; 2) therefore, where something had been before hand, his love would also have been drawn to it.

026 Out of all of which, and especially because none of the skilled men were named, and yet stated, as if they had been present, they only seemed to feel, and as it were to grasp, that this alliance is nothing else than a completely false poem.

027 Nevertheless Luther, by inspiration of his spirit, may write of himself, that it was sought against his princes, and that he must now be ashamed of it, and that they deny it, excuse it, or deny it, yet he knows knoweth that the crime is not vain nothing, nor a chimera.

028 Whosoever shall boast that he knoweth a thing, especially if he professeth to know it knowingly, he shall have some outward cause to show that he hath such knowledge, as that he hath seen or heard it himself, or at least that he hath heard it from two unsuspected persons who have seen or heard it.

(29) Now it may well be that Luther saw such a poem, or made it heard, perhaps also made part of it himself, or gave counsel for it; and thus it would be well to believe that he knew it knowingly. And not to refrain from it, since he showed consistent, credible causes in such his stated science, which should have moved everyone to such a testimony, and that he would have had to write it from himself. Or, on account of such an accusation, he would make a public contradiction, and spread the truth as wide as his lies, and confess that he knowingly lied to us on account of this fictitious alliance, and that he knowingly knew that it was a vain nothing, a fictitious chimera, and one of the greatest lies ever told or heard.

030 And because this is not done of him, we know not how to make it warmer to him, than we have done in our excuse. And we must say and write of him that the apostate monk lies to us as a desperate, dishonorable, perjured wicked man; as then this our excuse, which with him is considered the very coldest, manly, who has given us such an excuse.

1) No. 829, § 12.

2) Here, in the Altenburg edition, Vol. IV, p. 160, according to which Walch gave the text, are the words: "not been present," which, as Seidemann, "Erläuterungen," p. 132, note, says, are to be deleted.

The law of the covenant is not to remit, assign, and blame without speech, and it is not to be found (whether God wills it) who executes it, or (that anything has ever been done to it on our part) who makes it credible.

(31) And since Luther himself subsequently states it to be a sufficiently strange miracle, it would ever have been proper and fitting for him to find out about it thoroughly, since he thus, and above all our denials, gave a false, unknowable testimony to such a public lie with his knowing science. Which he also dares to affirm with a completely unfounded reason, saying that the world knows that we and others, as stated in the poetic covenant, have done and still do such things publicly with mind, deed, commandment, and all diligence.

32. But if by the word talia, or things like it, it is understood that this covenant is said, as he uses it, it is no less a lie than the covenant itself; And there is no one in the whole world who would say and prove with certainty that we have shown against our cousins, the Elector of Saxony and the Landgrave of Hesse, the least unfriendly will and disposition as the alliance attributes to us, or that we have given any reason to suppose that such a thing would be done to us. However, the fact that we have otherwise not wanted to let the Lutheran sect collapse in our countries, but have been most vehemently in favor of it, cannot follow at all from this that which the sealed covenant indicates. And Luther himself should be ashamed of such a childish introduction.

033 For we have also before now shown him sufficient causes, on account of which we have not hitherto been able to regard and hold his seductive doctrine as the true gospel, or that it is according to the same; wherefore, by his above-mentioned public lie, he now gives us much more cause to persevere and remain wholly in our former opinion. For we have not hitherto learned from Scripture that Christ, our Saviour, used such a public and deliberate liar as his apostle, and through him had the gospel preached and spread throughout the world.

34/ Therefore, where Luther, in the following words of his writing, means the gospel of Christ, it is just as true and credible that he imputes to us that we would gladly see it destroyed, than that he blames us for the fictitious covenant. He hath before with such iniquities and falsities reproached us, that we should be deprived of the gospel.

and otherwise also insulted us with various abusive words, and would have thought that he should one day be satisfied with his lust and desire to touch us in such a shameful way; but there will be no end to it.

035 For that he hath mixed into his writing some Greek words, which (as we have reported) are almost abominable, hath the very appearance of touching us, and wishing that God should disgrace us, as the foolishness of fools, for our boldness and pride, wherein he likeneth us to Moab; which is the common meaning of his gospel. From the gospel of Christ, and that the apostles used the like, it is not yet shown to us. And Luther would easily have commanded God Almighty something better than this, for it is ever said, "God does not defile anyone.

036 Neither have we ever professed to have any special wisdom; but, whether God wills it, Luther shall not bring us into folly, that he should persuade us to believe lies to be truth, or that we should let lies rest upon us and remain unaccountable, even if he pledged to us more than his conscience.

037 But because these things, as man's best jewels, are found to be false in him, and because of hope, envy, and zeal, he is not able to discern lies alone, but as soon as they serve his purpose, he proclaims them to be true, and commits his science to them: so it is of little consequence to us that he almost boasts of his prayer, and insists on it. If it had been according to his will, his cursing, scolding, and praying should have had much more force and apparent effect.

(38) In his writing, he also calls the others and us death-slayers and insatiable bloodsuckers, who would like to see bloodshed in German lands. But for our part, praise be to God, if we pass over his other manifold, bloodthirsty writings, there is not so much evidence of this as is found in his own writing, where he says: that he would admonish the princes that we should be driven out without all mercy.

039 In which words again we cannot feel the peaceable gospel of Christ, but rather that he desires our blood and destruction.

040 And although, praise God, he is too weak to do so, yet he does not rely on his prayer, as he otherwise insists, but on some princes whom he thinks he can bring to it. Now whoever has these princes?

...which he thus supposes to be his power, that he knows best. We hope that they will ever get to know him and see his lies for what they are. He will not frighten us with this, nor put us in some fear that we should renounce our pretensions and make ourselves dependent on his sect.

041 For we are confident in all princes, and in every one of them, that they will not suffer such a lying man to provoke or seduce them into unseemly behaviour. We do not want (if God wills) to give cause for this on our part, but know how to behave toward males in such a way that it should be unobjectionable to us at all times and to be answered for with the truth. And therefore, to all men, and to each one according to his position, we make our friendly request, our gracious intention, and our kind request that they not give Martin Luther any credence or faith in what he has written about us because of the poetic covenant, but that we lack all suspicion because of it,

(42) Luther is also to be esteemed and held in fair esteem as one who has given such a lying testimony to such a public poem, with the use of 1) his knowledgeable science, without all reason and constant cause, and has written it about himself. For the sake of each and every one of us, as befits us, let us earn it willingly and kindly, and let us compare and acknowledge it with grace and all good.

By deed we have had our secret expressed, and give at Dresden, Saturday after Luciä [49 Dec.] Anno Domini 2c. 28.

842: Otto von Pack's letter to Martin Luther about the fictitious alliance.

Dat. Cassel, 23 Jan. 1529.

The original of this letter is in Hamburg, Dls. I, toi. 76; subsequently printed in Kolde, ^nnloota, p. 110 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. VII, p. 48. Earlier it is already, as Walch also reports, printed in OoorFÜ Ollristiani kconnnis IntrUnrum litornurnquo votorum nonckuin ockiturnm KpioiloAium, x. 548.

Translated from the Latin.

To the venerable father, Mr. Martin Luther, the drommeter (bueeiriutori) of the divine word, his most holy friend.

Hail, my dear Martin, in Jesus Christ our Lord, amen.

1) In the old edition: "vorfändung".

The other day I read Duke George's tragedy, or rather diatribe, and then your answer, which pleased me and all honest people especially. For how far does not Satan go? He not only blinds men with his seeing eyes, but even with good sense he makes them mad and mad. Thus he is wont to deceive his own. But you shall shortly know the bright and true truth, and at the same time my innocence. Ever since the light of evangelical truth began to shine on me, it has never occurred to me to deceive even one person, let alone to cause such a great disturbance in all of Christendom. God is my witness that I have wanted to appease the wrath of the wicked, but not to provoke it any more; the intended agitation has been a great cause.

I want to discover evil actions, but not to sow new ones; I want to warn the pious lovingly and make them cautious, but not to incite them to war or rebellion. But that the matter has turned out differently than I had supposed, I leave to the divine will; but it is quite enough for me and my conscience that I have preserved so many righteous and godly people through my disgrace and through the exceedingly great loss of all my property (for I have nothing more than an unharmed conscience). Other things you will learn from this messenger, who is an honest man who loves God's word. Fare well and be well with me. Farewell in Christ with all your house. Given at Cassel, 23 Jan. Anno 1529.

Otto von Pack, Doctor.

The second section of the twelfth chapter.

Of the Conversions of the Protestant Princes and Estates at Torgau, Rodach, Schleiz, Schwabach, Schmalkalden and Nuremberg.

1. from the convent at Torgau.

843 The Mayor and Council of the City of Nuremberg apologize to Saxony and Hesse for not being able to take any decisive action before the upcoming Diet of Speier regarding the intended alliance for the protection of religion. Feb. 15, 1526.

From Hortleder, "Von den Ursachen des deutschen Krieiges," Vol. I, Book VIII, Cap. I, P. 1312.

Most Serene, Most Illustrious, Highborn Princes and Lords! Our subservient and willing services are diligently prepared for Your Electoral and Princely Grace. Grace with diligence. Most gracious, most gracious lords! E. C. and F. G. have sent a letter to us, the three elders of the Council, with notification and designations of a day which E. C. and F. G. have set for Torgau on account of the divine word, also its resistance and handling, and the gracious request that we should, on such a day, decree our embassy, with full authority, to help establish an understanding in such matters. Introduction of all kinds of Christian memoirs, of his content quite subserviently heard.

(2) And, in fact, our desire and inclination is entirely directed to not standing and remaining alone by his holy word, as the one foundation of our salvation, by means of divine help, but also to faithfully help to protect and handle it, as much as it is proper and always possible for us human beings to do. May the Almighty graciously give us his divine assistance in this matter (as we do not doubt), and confirm that which he has begun to work in us.

It may be, and public daily history 1) gives irrefutable testimony, that, according to E. C. and F.G. letters, the clergy have hitherto undertaken to pursue this light of divine word by manifold ways and practices. But whether their actions have not served more for the benefit and acceptance of the Christian congregation, the promotion and expansion of the same Word of God, than for its prevention, we, praise God, find this out every day; we are also still of the consoling, undoubted confidence that He, who has made His divine Word glorious, is the one who is the only one who is able to do so.

1) History - what is happening, events.

and honor of his most holy name, for the salvation and enlightenment of his Christian congregation, will also break the intention of those who oppose him, and show himself against him as a mighty God, who is also a Lord to his enemies, in such a way that they will or will not recognize him as a Lord.

(4) Although, in our opinion, it is quite wise and prudent, and the duty of all Christian authorities, to take faithful precautions so that the subjects are not only fed with the word of God, but are also provided with it, so that they may abide by it, live peacefully among themselves, and be protected and preserved from the violence of those who oppose them, we nevertheless consider it burdensome to place the handling of the divine word on temporal or physical assistance. For since the Word of God is the most powerful and mighty thing in heaven and on earth, and therefore mighty enough to sustain itself without the protection and help of all men, it is truly our opinion that it does not require any human intervention.

005 Let us be silent concerning the difficulty which follows from this, where, besides God (in whom alone trust must be placed), other bodily consolation and help, which is either not necessary or useful, is sought.

6 Now, however, E. C. and F. G. that this matter, concerning the Word of God and our faith, and also the handling and protection of it, whatever may be attached to it, is not only a common matter which affects all Christian persons and estates separately, but is also, above all other matters incumbent on the kingdom, the most important and most excellent, of which also, according to our convenience, a reasonable equality is to be sought and something unanimous and permanent is to be established, by special persons, regardless of how Christian and good it is meant by them, to tract and decide something fruitful, difficult to send, as also E. C. and F. G., as the Christian Church, are to be seen. C. and F. G. as praiseworthy, understanding princes before us. And take care that the complaints of which some estates, inclined to the word of God, have to be concerned in this matter, are prevented and stopped, that (to speak humanly of it) it must be necessary and the most noble main thing to promote with the highest diligence, so that in a common imperial or other Christian assembly, it is initially acted upon and decided, not only to preach the holy gospel clearly, loudly, and purely, as was done at the recent imperial diet in Augsburg, and in

The only way to do this would be, according to our opinion, where otherwise only the glory of God and the salvation of the subjects is sought and not one's own benefit. This would be the only way, according to our opinion, where otherwise only the glory of God and the salvation of the subjects is sought and not one's own benefit. This would be, according to our opinion, the only way to promote God's word, to live peacefully and unitedly, to preserve the country and its people quietly, and to avoid the danger ahead, if only the honor of God and the salvation of the subjects, and not one's own benefit, were sought in such things. For without this, as we fear, and as every reasonable Christian may judge from the divine word and reason, a divided kingdom will hardly endure, and all means sought outside this proper way will not only be unfruitful or unstable, but will rather give cause to strengthen the repugnant in their pretensions, and to induce them, as much as they can, to still further discontent and subjection.

(7) Thus also E. C. and F. G. know and see this every day irrefutably at work, that the punishment of the rebellious subjects has given the clergy, and those who have hitherto been opposed to the word of God, a noticeable consolation of their intention, and has caused this courage in them, as if they now have the victory in their hands, and are so powerful of fortune, of time, that for their sake there is no longer any danger. What these repugnants have practiced in many ways before the Roman imperial majesty, our most gracious Lord, to prevent the divine word, to preserve many of their abuses, position and nature, and what they are undoubtedly doing more and more every day to disgrace their imperial majesty against us and other positions that have a desire and inclination for the word of God, and would like to see things Christian and good, is E. C.'s and F. G.'s business. C. and F. G. unconcealed. For this reason it is necessary for us, as a community of the Holy Roman Empire, which has to expect much disgrace from others, who are also obliged to keep a strict watch on the Imperial Majesty, as their rightful, unanimous, temporal lord and sovereign, in all temporal things, according to divine command, to act carefully and in such a way that the Imperial Majesty does not have cause, on us more than on other imperial estates, to show his disgrace.

and that others do not draw from this also glimpses and impulses to revolt against us, who have now been sitting for about many years in various troubles, challenges and persecutions of our enemies, and therefore have all the more cause for danger, and to shoot at us like a target.

(8) But we do not show this to E. C. and F. G. because we are fainthearted or fearful in some ways on account of these things (for we are sure that we have God for our helper, and so he for us, on whom we in this matter, being without remedy, are justly defiant, who then may be against us?), but rather that E. C. and F. G. may remember the more magnificently that which may move us in this matter, as men, not unseasonably.

9. So then, and with all diligence, we have hitherto worked for ourselves and with the help of others, to move the Princely Serene Highness of our most gracious Lord, and by His Serene Highness' encouragement, the Imperial Majesty and other estates of the Empire, so that at future Imperial Diets, or by a free Christian Concilium, these excellent things, Christian, constant unity, orderly handling and fair equality of the Word of God and its fruit, would be acted upon; Just as recently at Augsburg, to our eighth, not an unskillful way and beginning was made for such a thing, and therefore it is a good consolation that God Almighty will communicate His grace even more abundantly at the next coming Imperial Diet, to carry out this work more stately, and to bring it into orderly execution: Therefore, for all the Christian reasons and causes mentioned, it is indeed somewhat difficult for us to enter into some decisive action or understanding at this time, before the future and the appearance of this Imperial Diet, because it is so close at hand, and because it will be regarded as somewhat hateful not only by the Imperial Majesty, but also by many other states, to which we are bound without alliance.

(10) We are very humbled by all this to E. C. and F. Graciously, they will not take this notice of ours, which is based on reported and all Christian good causes and our mere need, to their disgrace, nor will they refer us to the fact that in these important matters we are still looking to the Emperor's Majesty, our right Lord, and this Imperial Diet held by his Majesty, and that we place our comfort, trust and hope in him who has graciously called us into the wonderful light of his holy word.

(11) Thus we are of the excellent, undoubted confidence that God, the Father of all comfort and mercy, who has not regarded and has not hitherto used E. F. G. for the comfort of His Christian congregation as the least instrument, promoter and handler of His divine truth, will also strengthen and handle the same E. C. and F. G., and will abundantly impart His fine divine mercy to them. and will abundantly communicate fine divine mercy, to continue in such Christian conduct boldly and manly, and to walk among their adversaries without fear, steadily and so that not only country and people are peacefully governed, protected and sheltered, but also the enemies of the divine word receive through such a thing a goodly horror, and the pious a cheap consolation, heart and courage; which we also wish E. C. and F. G. to do. C. and F. G. heartily and eagerly desire from God, and in God, because he is faithful, do not doubt at all. What we, then, as Christian people and a member of the Holy Kingdom, can always promote, advise, and help in the future Imperial Diet and in other ways for the glory of God and His Holy Word, for Christian unity, and for the salvation of all Christian subjects, should not only be done by E. C. and F. G., but also by all possible and faithful diligence. C. and F. G., their subjects and us for good, but in general for the benefit of all Christendom.

(12) That we do not wish to keep E. C. and F. G. in subservience; for we are inclined to show E. F. G. subservient service, and with this we also wish to have the love of the divine word, us and common our city, faithful and subservient to E. C. and F.'s grace, and have commanded the same to E. F. G. in the protection of the Most High. Date on the 15th day of the month Februarii Anno 26.

Mayor and Council of Nuremberg 2c.

To Duke Johannsen of Saxony, Churfürsten, and Landgrave Philippsen of Hesse.

844 First alliance between the Elector John of Saxony and the Landgrave Philip of Hesse, for the protection of religion and Christian ceremonies, established at Torgau, May 2, 1526.

In Hortleder, "Von den Ursachen des deutschen Krieges," p. 1314, and in Lünig's Reichs-Archiv, purtis speoiul. oout. II., x. 36.

By the Grace of God, we John, Duke of Saxony 2c. and Elector 2c., and we Philip, by the same Grace Landgrave of Hesse, confess: Since God Almighty, out of His special providence.

In the light of God's providence, and through his mild grace and unspeakable mercy, his holy, eternal, and pure word, as the only consolation for us, the food for our souls, and the highest treasure on earth, of which we should be justly grateful to his divine graces for eternity, and, whether God wills it or not, it is nevertheless, unfortunately, openly known in the daytime, what many and various practices have been sought and undertaken for some time, especially by the clergy and their followers in the holy kingdom, to suppress and destroy this same holy divine word again, and to tear it completely out of the hearts and consciences of men, if it were possible.

2. And although up to now they have not been able to do anything against this with their obstructive attempts, but the more they have striven, acted and practiced against it, the further, by the miraculous effect of God Almighty, this action of theirs has served for the benefit and reception of the Christian congregation, the promotion and expansion of the divine word, as this is still seen daily before our eyes, in quite undoubted and firm confidence, that he who has sent his divine word, for the glory and honor of his holy name, for the salvation and enlightenment of his Christian congregation in this world, will continue to break the intention of those who oppose his word, as has happened up to now, and show himself to them as a mighty, powerful God, in such a way that they must recognize him, willingly or unwillingly, for a mighty God and Lord, so that they will not have anything to say: Where is now their divine word and gospel, of which they have thought so much?

3. Even though His Imperial Majesty, our most gracious Lord, has appointed and announced an Imperial Diet in Augsburg, which we (since we ourselves were prevented from appearing for obvious reasons) are confident would have been, and still want to be, of the highest necessity, both from the things there and from various brave causes, also that the imperial mandate was understood by many as if the letter had given and brought it, that such innovations and doctrines, contrary to the old customs, and in addition to that, the deficiencies and grievances that the secular had against the clergy, and again, were to be advised and acted upon; Thus also that the entire messages of the secular estates, ours and others, and of the greater part, out of unavoidable necessity, to prevent further disunity, bloodshed, and other grievances, are to be discussed in the Mei

It has been the duty of the Emperor and the Empress to apply for this article, as the main part of all imperial action, in which the honor of God and the eternal and temporal welfare of all Christian estates and subjects depend, and to have a Christian understanding in these matters. However, due to the fact that the Imperial Diet proclaimed by Imperial Majesty did not take place this time, but was extended to the first day of May, next to Augsburg, and was held at Speier, it had to remain, confident that there, for the reasons considered (inasmuch as it should have taken place next to Augsburg), according to Imperial Majesty's writing and mandate, it would again be judged.

4. And although we are quite inclined to unite with other states on such an Imperial Diet of Christian equality in everything that is in accordance with the Word of God and the good sense of His Holy Gospel, we also most gladly see that, by the bestowal of divine graces, an equality according to right and Christian sense may be made, and we hope for special glory, that we ever and always show ourselves to be obedient Electors and Princes towards the Roman Imperial Majesty, as we are inclined to do now and until our end, and that we do not want to be found otherwise, also that we may tolerate and suffer the knowledge and instruction of the Imperial Majesty, Electors, Princes and other estates of the Empire in all matters in which we are obliged to follow out of owed obedience; We also hereby declare against everyone that, God willing, no one shall have cause to complain against us, as if he did not receive justice against us, and therefore have cause to act against us, our land and people.

5. Now that we have been informed, and we have been given many warnings, that the public and daily actions give some indication that, notwithstanding all that has been said, and in particular that at the next Imperial Diet at Speier, of Imperial Majesty, our most gracious Lord, by mandate and according to the agreement made on this matter next at Augsburg, matters concerning the divine word and spiritual and worldly afflictions shall be discussed out of unavoidable necessity; we have also, in part, been heard by our skilful men at Augsburg, and are once again requested to compare ourselves with other states of the realm according to right and Christian understanding 2c., by the

The churchmen and others, who are dependent on them, have unexpectedly practiced the Imperial Diet and whatever is decided there or might be considered good and convenient, further and with assiduous diligence, and they have also established a covenant, and of their highest fortune, which they cannot accomplish with it, that such shall be subdued, with the expenditure and transfer of much money, to keep their old, hitherto burdensome abuses, against the divine Word and Gospel, alive, and to suppress the truth of God and His fine Word; and to do so in such a way that those who, by the grace of God, permit the preaching of the fine holy word and other things according to the same in ceremonies and otherwise, in their lands (as they are guilty before God and conscience), and allow against touched traditional abuses, should be overrun by their practices and instigation, and because of their money, and their country and people damaged, attacked, and ruined because of it.

6. Since it would now be burdensome, and also frightening and pitiful to all Christian hearts, that truth should be suppressed and untruth take its place, and since these things have the occasion to befit us and every Christian authority otherwise, we will remain silent; We do not want to say that we should rather call upon God daily and ask Him to lead us further to the knowledge of His divine word, light and will, because we should not allow what is done according to the grace of God in sermons, ceremonies and other such things (even if it is against many touched abuses) and be against it in some ways: For this reason we give no cause to anyone to take such action, and for the sake of our office, for which we have been provided by God Almighty, we owe and are obligated to protect our subjects from unreasonable violence, and also to take faithful precautions, so that our subjects may not only be further protected with the Word of God, 1) but also be provided in such a way that they may remain in it, and be protected and saved from the violence of the unrighteous:

007 Therefore, considering that necessity requires it, and touching our duty, that we may be related to our own and others who depend upon the divine word, we will require it to be incumbent upon us, even from causes above mentioned, and from offerings made, in the case of males, to so that our people may be protected from unreasonable, unprovoked warfare, violent and ungodly harassment, may remain unoffended by the Word and all the more peaceful: now and herewith in the name of God, in honor and praise of his holy name and word, out of Christian mind, heart and right loyalty, also to no one's chagrin, nor contrary, but solely for the protection and salvation of ours and others who are of like mind about much touched matters, as our understanding is able to do, who we are also inclined to take into agreement with us in the same form, have united, assembled, and given each other in understanding as we also do and want to have done herewith, thus:

8. Where the above-mentioned adversaries and their followers, on account of the divine word and those things which, according to the same, are carried out and held against the above-mentioned abuses in our principalities and lands, or also want to use other things as a pretence, since it would be meant in principle on account of the divine word mentioned, and each of us could tolerate knowledge and instruction about such pretended pretence things, as mentioned above: That we add body and goods, land and people, and all property to each other, and also that one of us wants to inflict damage on the other, who wants to be attacked, overdrawn, or weighed down by this, to the greatest extent that we are always able, at our own expense and damage, and want to come to help and rescue.

(9) Yet in all things our trust is not in ourselves, nor in these our country and people, but in and upon God the Almighty, according to his divine will, revealed through us, as his instruments and instruments, to whom it is little to prevail with many or few against the enemy, humbly and with devotion set and set. All with a faithful, Christian, and right mind, and without all danger.

(10) And that this agreement and understanding of ours in all its points and articles may be the more steadfastly and unalterably kept and lived, we Duke John, Elector, have hereunto knowingly affixed our seal, and signed it with our own hand. Done at Torgau, Wednesday after the Sunday Cantate [2 May], after the birth of Christ our dear Lord in the year 1526 2c.

for the sake of the protection of the faith. Done at Magdeburg, 12 June 1526.

In Hortleder I. c. p. 1317 and in Lünig's Reich Archives 1. e. p. 38.

1st By the Grace of God, we John, Elector, and John Frederick, father and son, Dukes of Saxony 2c., Philip, Otto, Ernst, and Franciscus, brothers and cousins, all Dukes of Brunswick and Lüneburg, Philip, Landgrave of Hesse, Count of Katzenelnbogen 2c., Henry, Duke of Mecklenburg, Prince of Wenden 2c., Wolf, Prince of Anhalt, Count of Ascanien, and Lord of Bernburg, Gebhard and Albrecht, brothers, counts and lords of Mansfeld, confess: After God the Almighty, by special providence and by good, mild grace and unspeakable mercy, has made His holy, eternal and pure Word, as the only consolation for us, the food for our souls and the highest treasure on earth, of which we should be thankful to His divine grace for eternity, and, whether God wills, wills, has made it appear to men again: so, nevertheless, unfortunately, publicly on the day, what 2c.

The further content of this document is identical with that of the preceding one (No. 844) from word to word up to the end, therefore only § 10 is added here.

(10) And that this agreement and understanding of ours in all its points and articles may be kept the more steadfastly and unalterably, and that we the above-mentioned Electors, Princes, and Counts, each of us, as Duke John, Elector, for us and our son, Duke Hans Frederick 2c., and we Duke Otto and Duke Ernst, for us and Duke Franciscus, our brother, have knowingly affixed his own seal to this letter, and have signed it with our own hands. Done at Magdeburg, on the twelfth day of the fallow month after the birth of Christ our Lord, a thousand five hundred and six and twentieth years.

846. admission of the old city of Magdeburg into the alliance agreed upon there between the Elector of Saxony and several other princes and counts, for the protection of the true pure religion and what is dependent on it. Done at Magdeburg, 14 June 1526.

From Hortleder I. e. p. 1319.

1st By the Grace of God, we John, Archmarshall of the Holy Roman Empire, Elector, and John Frederick, father and son, Dukes of Saxony, Landgraves in Thuringia and Margraves of Meissen, Philip, Otto, Ernst and Franciscus, brothers and cousins, all Dukes of Brunswick and Lüneburg, Philip, Landgrave of Hesse, Count of Katzenelnbogen 2c., Henry, Duke of Mecklenburg 2c., Wolf, Prince of Anhalt 2c., Gebhard and Albrecht, brothers, Counts of Mansfeld, do confess that we the honourable and wise, our dear peculiars, councillors, magistrates and commons of the ancient city of Magdeburg and their descendants., for the promotion and propagation of his holy word and gospel, and what depends on it, out of Christian goodwill, have resolved and united with one another, at their special submissive request, entreaty, and petition, they also hereby, at such their request and entreaty, enter into it.

(2) And because the prescription of such understanding and agreement could not be executed here now for lack of time, and for other reasons, we want to prepare the same in our above-mentioned name, and have it sent sealed to those of Magdeburg, from date in four weeks, the next approximate. On the other hand, they are to hand over a reversal to our messenger at the same time, as a copy has been sent to them, all without danger.

In witness whereof we have hereunto set our seal, and given at Magdeburg, this fourteenth day of the fallow month, Anno Domini 1526.

847 Execution of the acceptance of the old city of Magdeburg into the understanding and agreement, which the Elector of Saxony and several other princes and counts, for the protection of the true pure religion and what is pending, together with the city of Magdeburg reversal letter about it. Given the 25th of June 1526.

From Hortleder I. c. S. 1319.

1st By the Grace of God we John, Archmarshall and Elector of the Holy Roman Empire, and John Frederick, father and son, Dukes of Saxony, Landgraves of Thuringia and Margraves of Meissen 2c., Philip, Otto, Ernst and Franciscus, brothers and cousins, all Dukes of Saxony.

Brunswick and Lüneburg, Philip, Landgrave of Hesse, Count of Katzenelnbogen, of Dietz, Ziegen, Hain and Nidda, Henry, Duke of Mecklenburg, Prince of Wenden, Count of Schwerin, Lord of the Lands of Rostock and Stargard, Wolf, Prince of Anhalt, Count of Ascanien, and Lord of Bernburg, Gebhard and Albrecht, brothers, Counts and Lords of Mansfeld, hereby declare: After we, out of Christian, princely and good opinion, for the promotion and spreading of God's Word, His Holy Gospel and what is dependent on the same, by the bestowal of divine grace, have resolved and united with each other in a special understanding and agreement, all according to sound and content, as follows from word to word:

By the Grace of God, we John, Elector, and John Frederick, father and son, Dukes of Saxony 2c., Philip, Otto, Ernst and Franciscus, brothers and cousins, all Dukes of Brunswick 2c., Philip, Landgrave of Hesse 2c., Henry, Duke of Mecklenburg 2c., Wolf, Prince of Anhalt 2c., Gebhard and Albrecht, brothers, Counts of Mansfeld 2c., confess: Since God the Almighty by special providence and by good, mild grace and unspeakable mercy has given His holy, eternal and pure Word as the only consolation for us, the food for the souls and the highest treasure on earth 2c,

3. And because the honorable and wise people of Magdeburg, our beloved specials, mayors, councillors, jnnungsmeister and congregation of the old city, as those who bear to God's word, his holy gospel, and what depends on it, by the bestowal of divine grace, inclination and will, have humbly and diligently urged and requested of us, that we will graciously and favorably accept them with and beside us into our understanding and agreement, with the submissive and Christian submission that they and their descendants, at all times, as far as the divine word, the holy gospel, and what depends on it, are concerned, will commit to us all their property, as far as this extends, and will not seek any help, withdrawal, or refusal therein; as they have pledged themselves against us in a letter of reversal under the seal of the city.

(4) Upon such request and entreaty of their subjects we, the Reverend Prince, Princes and Counts, confess that we, the mayor, council, mayor and community of the old city of Magdeburg and their descendants, with and beside us, have taken them into the above-mentioned understanding and agreement of ours, and therefore hereby, by virtue of this letter, accept them where they and their descendants are.

If, on account of the divine word and the things pertaining thereto, they suffer persecution, adversity, and distress, and are therefore attacked, overburdened, or afflicted by anyone, we will then draw upon them to the greatest extent possible and at our own expense, and thus come to their rescue and aid; But that they shall at all times, in so far as the divine word, and that which depends on it, is concerned, place all their property, as far as this extends, according to their prescription, with us again; all faithfully and safely. In witness whereof we, the Reigning Princes, Princes and Counts, have each hereunto affixed our seal, as we Duke John, Elector, for ourselves and our son, and we Duke Otto and Ernst, for ourselves and our brother, Sir Franciscum, knowingly to this letter. Given on the fifth and twentieth day of the fallow month, Anno Domini 1526.

Reversal of the House of Magdeburg.

1. we mayor, council, Jnnungsmeister and community of the old city of Magdeburg 2c. As the most illustrious, noble, highborn princes and lords, Mr. Johann, Duke of Saxony and Elector, Mr. Johann Friedrich, father and son 2c., Mr. Philipp, Mr. Otto, Mr. Ernst and Mr. Franciscus, brothers and cousins, all Dukes of Brunswick and Lüneburg, Mr. Philipp, Landgrave of Hesse 2c., Mr. Heinrich, Duke of Mecklenburg 2c., Mr. Wolf, Prince of Anhalt 2c., and the noble, well-born, Mr. Gebhard and Mr. Albrecht, brothers, counts and lords of Mansfeld 2c., our most gracious and gracious lords, out of princely, Christian and good opinion, for the promotion and spreading of God's Almighty Word, and what depends on it, resolved and united to a special understanding and agreement, all according to sound and content, as is reported above in their chur- and princely graces.

(2) Because we are so much in the grace of God, that such a proceeding of their sovereign, princely, and royal graces is blessed, Christian, and just, and the salvation of all our souls is finally in the word of God. Since we, by the grace of God, find so much with us, that such a thing as their sovereign, princely, and benevolent conduct is blessed, Christian, and just, and the salvation of all our souls finally rests in the word of God, their sovereigns, fathers, and gods have, at our humble and diligent petition and request, graciously accepted us, with and beside them, in such an understanding and agreement with their sovereigns, fathers, and gods, F. G. and G. have graciously taken us into their understanding and agreement; with gracious entreaties to us and our descendants, where we suffer persecution, repugnance and affliction on account of the divine word and what depends on it, and would therefore be attacked, overdrawn and burdened by someone, that their churf.

G. wanted to come to our rescue and help in the strongest possible way, at their own expense and damage.

3. Accordingly, and in consideration of the foregoing, of our most gracious and gracious lords, the electors, princes, and counts, gracious and Christian will, we confess for ourselves and our descendants, that we will at all times, as far as the divine word, the Holy Gospel and all that pertains thereto, we will again place all our assets, as far as they extend, with our most gracious and merciful lords, and will not seek any remedy, withdrawal or refusal therein, all faithfully and safely.

And in witness whereof we have hereunto set our seal, which was given after the birth of Christ our dear Lord, a thousand five hundred and six, and in the twentieth year, on the 25th day of the fallow month, 2c.

848: Margrave Albrecht of Brandenburg, Duke of Prussia, has established a special alliance with Prince John of Saxony for the protection of the faith and all that depends on it. At Königsberg in Prussia.

September 29, 1526.

In Hortleder 1. e. Cap. 6, p. 1321 and in Lünig's ReichsArchiv, pari. spse. eont. III. p. 310.

By the Grace of God, we Albrecht, Margrave of Brandenburg, Prussia, Szczecin, Pomerania, Duke of the Cassubians and Wends, Burgrave of Nuremberg and Prince of Rügen: After God the Almighty, by His special providence and by His good, merciful grace and unspeakable mercy, has made His eternal, holy and pure Word, as the only consolation for us, the food for our souls and the highest treasure on earth, of which we should be justly grateful to His divine grace for eternity, and whether God wills, wills, has again made it appear to men: But it is plain to see what many and various practices have been sought and undertaken for some time by some of the aforementioned clergy and their followers in the holy kingdom, in order to suppress and destroy this same holy divine word, and to tear it completely out of the hearts and consciences of men, if it were possible.

2. And although they could not have done anything against it with such deceitful attempts, but the more they acted, practiced and strove against it, the further, by the miraculous effect of God Almighty, their action served for the benefit and reception of the Christian assembly, the promotion and extension of the same word; as this is also seen daily before their eyes, in quite undoubted and firm confidence that he who has sent his divine word into this world for the glory and honor of his holy name, for the salvation and enlightenment of his Christian congregation, will continue to break the plans of those who oppose his word, as has happened up to now, and will show himself to them as a mighty, powerful God in such a way that they must recognize him, whether they want to or not, for a mighty God and Lord, so that they will not have to say: Where is now their divine word and gospel, of which they have thought so much?

(3) And although we, for our own glory, hope that we will ever and always show and keep all due obedience to the Roman Emperor's Majesty, as we are inclined to do now and to our end. Imperial Majesty all due obedience, as we are then inclined to do for the present and to our end, nor do we wish to be found otherwise, shown and held, also in due places, in all matters in which we are obliged to follow out of due obedience, We have also undertaken to tolerate and suffer knowledge and instruction in due places, in all matters in which we are obliged to obey out of duty of obedience, just as we have undertaken to do for everyone, so that, if God wills, no one shall have cause to complain on our account, as if he would not receive justice against us, and therefore have cause to act violently against us, our land and people.

4. But since we are told, and have been made to believe by various warnings, that the public and physical actions give some indication that, notwithstanding all that has been said, they continue to practice it with diligent diligence, and that alliances have been set up by the adversaries, of their highest ability, which they cannot accomplish with it, that this is to be subdued with the expenditure and transfer of much money, in order to keep up their old, hitherto practiced, burdensome abuses against the divine word and gospel, and to suppress the truth of God and the word as much as is in them, and to suppress the truth of God and His Word as much as is in them, and to do so in such a way that those who, by the bestowal of God's grace, allow His holy Word to be preached, and other things according to it in ceremonies and other things, in their countries, as they are guilty of before God and for the sake of conscience, and allow it to be preached against established abuses, shall be subjected to the same by their

Practices and incitement, and of their money should be overdrawn, and their country and people damaged, attacked, and spoiled because of it.

5. Since it would be burdensome, and frightening and pitiful to all Christian hearts, that truth should be suppressed (although it is in no one's power), and untruth should prevail, and with these things the occasion arises that another is befitting us and every Christian authority, we will remain silent, that we should rather call upon God daily and ask Him to lead us further to the knowledge of His divine word, light, and will, because we should not permit what is done according to the granted grace of God in sermons, ceremonies, and others in accordance with the same (although it is against many touched abuses), and be against it in some ways; For this reason we do not give anyone cause to take any offensive action, and because of our office, for which we have been provided by God Almighty, we owe and are obligated to protect our subjects from unjust violence, and also to take faithful precautions, so that our subjects are not only further protected with the Word of God, but are also provided in such a way that they remain so, and may be protected and saved from the violence of the unrighteous.

6. Accordingly, we confess and declare in this letter that in the name of God, in honor and praise of His holy name and word, out of a Christian mind, heart and right loyalty, and also to no one's annoyance or offence, but solely for the protection and salvation of ours, we hereby unite with the Highborn Prince, our friendly dear lord and uncle, Mr. Johann, Duke of Saxony, Archmarshall and Elector of the Holy Roman Empire, Landgrave of Thuringia and Margrave of Meissen, as follows, and have given them an understanding, as we do and want to do herewith.

7. Thus: Where the above-mentioned adversaries and their followers, on account of the divine word, or on account of changes that have followed or are still to follow from the word of God, and the things that are done and held according to it, against the abuses thought of in his beloved principality and lands, or also other things for the sake of appearances, since the touched divine word would be meant in the reason, and his loved ones could tolerate knowledge and instruction about such pretended appearances, as touched above, that we then have S. L. help, advice and assistance, namely:

(8) If his beloved or his lordship's land and people are overrun, encumbered or attacked for this reason, we will send his beloved a hundred armed men to help him, at his lordship's request, at our own expense, until they reach his beloved's land, and if they reach his land, they shall be maintained by his lordship with a fair amount of transfer, fodder and expense, but at our pay and expense.

(9) Forasmuch, however, as between the said our dear lord and uncle, and ourselves, this more has been agreed upon and granted, what each of us may induce of other more Christian princes and estates into this Christian, friendly, prescribed union, that we both have diligence and power to do so, and whether the one or more with less help than aforesaid shall prescribe against us, that on the other hand neither of us shall owe him more, neither he shall prescribe against us 2c. Whether now after this more princes or other states would come to us in this prescribed Christian, friendly union, and we therefore from their one, before from the above-mentioned our dear lord and uncle, the Elector of Saxony 2c., and send it, and thereafter also be requested by the said dear lord and uncle, on account of the help prescribed herein; as much as we have then sent for help on the first admonition of the other contracting relative, we shall not be deprived of the help requested thereafter, as long as we are charged therewith, and further; and that such and all other things between us be understood and kept Christian, friendly, faithful and harmless.

010 But in all things let us not put our trust in such our covenants, or in ourselves, but in and upon God the Almighty, according to his divine will, through us as his instrument and instrumentality, to whom it is also little to prevail with many or few against the enemies, humbly and with devotion, all with faithful right Christian opinion and without all danger.

(11) And that this our agreement and understanding in all its points and articles may be kept the more steadfastly and unalterably, we have hereunto affixed our seal, and signed it with our own hand 2c. Given in Prussia, at our castle Königsberg, Saturday on the day of Michaelmas [Sept. 29] Anno 1526 2c.

849. compulsory note for the envoys to be sent to Emperor Carl the Fifth by the protesting Electors and Estates. The 26th of May, Anno 1529.

From Müller's History of the Protestant Estates Protestation, Book II, Cap. I, § 4, P. 146.

Since my most gracious and gracious lords, the Elector and the Princes of Saxony, Brandenburg, Lüneburg, Hesse, and Anhalt, and also the honorable free and imperial cities adhering to their electoral and princely protestations, have decreed you, my lords and friends, to be their princely embassy and advocates in Hispania to the Imperial Majesty, and have now ordered their electoral and princely graces, and also the honorable free and imperial cities, to ride in Hispania to the Imperial Majesty. And now their electoral and princely graces, also the respectable free and imperial cities, are much interested in this trade: so our, their electoral and princely graces, have ordered you, my lords and friends, to be their princely embassy and advocates, to ride in Hispania to the imperial majesty. [Therefore, it is our friendly request and friendly plea that you, in place of your electoral and princely graces, and for the sake of the respectable cities, promise us in good faith that you will act faithfully and diligently in the matters concerned, in accordance with the instruction you have given and the order you have received, and deal with the allowance in the most faithful and exact manner, and above the granted sum of two hundred florins, if a good parting is given in this matter, neither give away nor honour anything else, without our most gracious, gracious and favourable lords and friends' good knowledge and will; That neither of you without the knowledge and will of the other will take up or spend anything, and that you will faithfully account for your expenditures, and that you will also show and keep yourselves in all this as faithful messages and attorneys of our most gracious, gracious and favorable lords, as their graces and favors and our trust stand in you. Actum on 26 May Anno 1529.

1) Thus Ungewitter, "Geographisch-statistisch-historisches Handbuch," vol. I, p. 294, writes this name, as does Guericke, Kirchengeschichte (7), vol. III, p. 165; but Walch "Rotach," and so does the Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. VII, p. 110. De Wette, vol. III, p. 465 writes "Rothach," as does Seckendorf, List. Imtü., lib. II, § 46, A.ä. L.

850 Instruction what our envoys of the following named princes, princes, and cities are to present, advertise, and act before the Roman imperial and Hispanic royal majesty, our most gracious lord, upon surrender of our sealed document of credence. May 27, 1529.

In Müller 1. e. Book II, Cap. 2, Z1, p. 147 and in Lünig's Imperial Archives, pari. Zsn. out. II, x>. Walch notes that this Instruction is also written in Latin and French, which is also evident from the following document.

I. First of all, to express to Her Imperial Majesty our most humble, submissive, owing obedience and most willing service, as our most gracious Emperor and Lord.

(2) And then to tell her imperial majesty the following opinion: After her imperial majesty had undertaken to hold a common imperial diet at Speier on the other day of the month of February, no doubt not without special cause, and had it advertised and proclaimed in the holy realm, but which imperial diet, in addition to such advertisement, was immediately extended to the one and twentieth day of the same month and was adjourned:

3. Thus we, the Elector and the Princes, in our own persons, and we, the free and imperial cities, by our stately embassies, as obedient members of the holy empire, have joined together in a certain imperial diet, and have no other opinion than to help to discuss everything at such imperial diet, to act and to decide, which might have always served for the advancement of God's honor, for the welfare and reception of common Christendom, the Holy Empire and her Imperial Majesty, also for the increase and preservation of common peace and justice.

(4) As we have noted each time from the most recent and other notices of Imperial Diet held by Her Imperial Majesty, that Her Imperial Majesty, as a laudable and peaceful Emperor, would finally direct his mind and highest inclination to the end that, through such Imperial Assemblies, that should be considered, tractted, and carried out which would prosper the peaceful, Christian harmony of all high and low estates in the Holy Empire. For what else would the manifold imperial congresses be either useful or necessary for, if the grievances and deficiencies incumbent upon the Holy Roman Empire were not remedied, and if that which is necessary for all estates and subjects were not to be achieved?

peace, tranquility and absorption should be taken in hand, and as much as possible should be brought into the work?

(5) But we could not avoid to inform her Imperial Majesty, as a Roman Emperor, protector and guardian of the Holy Roman Empire, also our most gracious Lord and temporal authority decreed by God, not only out of our, but also of all the relatives of the Empire's preceding high necessity, the following opinion in the highest submissiveness.

(6) Although Her Imperial Majesty has appointed a common Diet in Speier for the past six and twentieth years. 6. Although her Imperial Majesty in the past six and twentieth years has in like manner appointed and proclaimed a common Imperial Diet at Speier, out of the remote necessity of the Holy Empire and its members, and there appointed her Imperial Majesty's brother and Governor in the Empire, our dear lord, uncle, brother-in-law and most gracious lord, the King of Hungary and Bohemia, also other commissaries of her Imperial Majesty, namely the venerable, high and gracious King of Hungary and Bohemia, brother-in-law and most gracious lord, the King of Hungary and Bohemia, also other commissaries of her imperial majesty, namely the venerable, reverend, noble and high-born princes, dear lords, friends, uncle, brothers, brothers-in-law and gracious lords, Mr. Bernhard, bishops of Trent; Mr. Casimir, Margrave of Brandenburg 2c., of blessed memory; Mr. Erich, Duke of Brunswick and Lüneburg 2c., and Lord Philip, Margrave of Baden 2c., ...decreed.: Who then, in virtue and by virtue of their plenary power and command, delivered to them by their Imperial Majesty, with all the Princes, Princes, and other Estates of the Holy Roman Empire, but among others, and most especially in matters concerning our holy faith, religion, and the ceremonies thereof, after due deliberation and advice, have unanimously agreed and decided that for the sake of such high, important matters, a common, free, Christian concilium, or at least a national assembly, where the same matters would be dealt with in the most equitable manner, has been requested from Her Majesty by a message decreed at that time by the common estates of the empire. And that in the meantime all Princes, Princes and other Imperial Estates, and each one for himself, with his subjects, in all and as much as the Edict, by their Imperial Majesty, on the first occasion, has been ordered. Majesty at the first Diet of Her Imperial Majesty at Worms. Majesty's Diet at Worms, should and would live, govern and conduct himself as each one hoped and trusted against God and Her Imperial Majesty. Majesty and trusted to answer for it.

(7) As then the common imperial decree of the predetermined Diet of Speier contains quite clearly, which is also accepted by all the estates of the empire with one accord, granted to be held, and

1) Whereupon we Ferdinand, Prince and Infante in Hispania, Archduke of Austria, of Burgundy, 2c., Imperial Majesty's Governor, and we the appointed Commissioners, do, by virtue of our power, by reason of the Roman Imperial Majesty, our most gracious and most merciful Lord, promise and agree to keep and perform all and every thing above written which may touch His Imperial Majesty. Majesty, steadfastly, firmly, and unbreakably, and sincerely, to keep and perform the same, to comply with the same strictly and without refusal, and to live, not to do, perform, act, or cause anything to be done contrary thereto, nor to permit any other person to do the same on their account, except all danger.

(8) And we, Princes, Prelates, Counts and Lords, also of the Princes, Princes, Counts and of the Holy Roman Empire, envoys, embassies and rulers, as named. Imperial envoys, embassies, and rulers, as they are called, also publicly confess with this farewell that all and each of the above-mentioned points and articles have been made and decided with our good knowledge, will, and counsel, and that the same, all together and especially, hereby and in virtue of this letter, consent to the same, do speak and promise by right, good, true faithfulness, which, as much as each his lordship or friends, of whom he is sent or has power, concerns or may concern, shall be true, constant, firm, sincere, and unbreakable to keep, perform, and comply therewith to the utmost of our ability, and to live, without danger.

(9) And let such farewell be sealed by their Imperial Majesty's rulers, governors, and commissaries, also princes, princes, and other estates of the realm, with their seals, as befits, and confirmed for necessity; so that such stately deeds shall be confirmed in equity, and as much as possible, according to the same printed farewell.

(10) Notwithstanding such unanimous consent and resolution of all the estates of the empire, which is present in the sixth and twentieth year, it has been prevented and abolished by some of the lesser part that all the estates of the empire have not sent their decreed embassies to their imperial majesty, no doubt for no other reason than that they feared when such embassies came to their imperial majesty. The Imperial States have not ridden to their Imperial Majesty, no doubt for no other reason than that they feared and worried, when such messages come to their Imperial Majesty, that their Majesty would report the form and occasion of the matters with reason of truth, and otherwise than as and hitherto done by the counterpart.

and would also thereby be warned and moved not to obey or grant the other's repugnant request.

II. when, therefore, at this Diet of Speier, an Instruction was brought forward in the name of Her Imperial Majesty. In which, among other things, it was understood that it should be the mind and opinion of Her Imperial Majesty to repeal the article now reported, which had been decided upon in the previous Speierian Convention, and which she had promised to uphold, and which had been confirmed and sealed, and to return the matter to the old erroneous and dangerous state of affairs; which, however, for the reasons hereafter mentioned and other excellent causes, we do not at all provide for Her Imperial Majesty, but doubtlessly consider it, although such instruction should have come from Her Imperial Majesty. that this is either due to an unequal report of those who have concealed the occasion of this important business, or to the previous action of some who might be inclined to cause a greater proliferation in the Holy Roman Empire: confident that if Her Imperial Majesty had had a sufficient report of the reason for such matters, or of the previous Speierian and other imperial treaties decided before it, which complaints would certainly have resulted from it, where they were to be annulled and passed in such a manner, Her Imperial Majesty would not have been moved to such an instruction by any means; because we have committed ourselves to Her Imperial Majesty, as a just man, to the protection of the Holy Roman Empire. Majesty, as a just, Christian and honor-loving Emperor, that Her Imperial Majesty's heart, mind and soul will not be moved to such an instruction. We have no intention to act against what has been unanimously decided, accepted, and ratified by her Majesty's authorized commanders and commissars, in addition to all other imperial states, or to rescind, change, or allow someone else to do what has been decided, accepted, and ratified by all imperial states, or to rescind, change, or allow someone else to do what has been decided, accepted, and ratified by all imperial states, or to rescind, change, or allow someone else to do what has been decided, accepted, and ratified by all imperial states, or to rescind, change, or allow someone else to do what has been decided, accepted, and ratified by all imperial states: we therefore, out of necessity, Christian good opinion, not only for our conscience and ours, but also for the praise, honor, and glory of God Almighty and of Her Imperial Majesty. Majesty, for praise, honour and dignity, for the prevention of further disturbances and offences in the Empire, and also for the sake of the preservation of common peace, we have submitted our advice and objections at the above-mentioned Imperial Diet to the effect that the other Princes, Princes and Estates of the Holy Empire, in the case of the Articles mentioned above, drawn up in the previous Speier Agreement, should, out of appropriate consideration, be granted the right to vote on the matter.

The things which have been indicated by us for the time being, for the reasons of their love, favour and grace, shall remain until a future Christian Council, and no unpleasant thing shall be decided in its presence.

12. 12. And when, through some repugnant actions, it was decided and undertaken to completely abolish the indicated article, in the pretense that in it alone a brighter declaration and purification should consist, and to put in its place some burdensome, unpleasant articles, which would rather lead to discord, division, and presumed further development than to unity, peace, and goodness, which would also be completely unsound in many ways for our and our subjects' souls and consciences, and presumed further development than unity, peace and good, which would also be quite infallible to us and our subjects' souls and consciences in many ways, if we had given their Imperial Majesty's governors, orators and commissars, as well as the other imperial states, our manifold deficiencies and complaints, our manifold deficiencies and complaints, according to friendly, good and subservient opinion, and besides made several honorable, reasonable suggestions, so that the much reported article of the previous Speierian farewell, if it should ever be misunderstood by some, should be explained in an equal, reasonable and fair way, without any other mistake, because all princes, princes and other estates of the Holy Roman Empire would not have made a mistake with us at all, but would have settled it without any great hindrance or objection.

13. When, however, princes, princes and other estates of the realm had insisted on their undertaking, and had not accepted our proposals, of the opinion to decide in this matter by a majority: If the previous agreement of the empire, also its unanimous decision, the approval, acceptance, high obligation and victory of all the estates of the empire, had been brought to their remembrance by us, with the further reminder that it would not be due to them at all, to change or rescind such unanimous imperial decree in the appearance of a majority, because out of the assets of all equity and human right 1) such a unanimous decision of the imperial estates should and must be changed again by a unanimous approval of the same: For if it were in accordance with right and all reasonable order that in temporal temporal affairs, since the matter does not concern many of them in common, but each one in particular, some resolution of the more part against the others and diminish and one of their special consent should not take place, it would be much more reasonable, lawful and orderly, to act in this most supreme, most excellent matter, since it does not concern the temporal, but fundamentally and without means the glory of God, the salvation of souls and consciences, for which reason every person, high and low, must, for the sake of his faith, life, deeds and actions, give account and responsibility for himself before God the Almighty and his just, unchanging court, and his righteous, unchanging, serious judgment, must give account and responsibility for himself, and in this no man would help, be relevant to, or support any other order, even of the greater or lesser part, along with other more excellent high movements, which we would have most modestly and kindly indicated to the common estates for the purpose of putting an end to their plan. But above all this, notwithstanding our faithful request, exhortation, entreaty, proposal, and reminder, the other imperial estates would have persevered in their undertaking and decided in favor of an imperial treaty; That we, however, for the following and other noticeable and necessary reasons, complained to the highest degree, could not have accepted the same resolution and parting in any way or approved of it, but out of pressing necessity publicly protested against it, of no other opinion, than that our conscience not only for ourselves, but also for the sake of our commanded subjects, to whom we have been ordained by God according to their Majesty to be sovereigns and regents. to whom we are decreed by God to be sovereigns and regents, as is just, to save also her Imperial Maj. Maj., as in this affair badly and unequally reported, to report the matters with better true reason, as we hereby report to Her Majesty in the shortest time in all things. Maj. in all submissive obedience, thus:

14. Majesty that in the time of her Imperial Majesty's reign, and before that a good while ago, there had been many controversial articles and errors about our holy faith. Majesty's reign, and before that a good while ago, there had been many contentious articles and errors on account of our holy faith; so, too, through the public teaching, preaching, and proclamation of the holy gospel, things had reached the point that the same doctrine had spread everywhere in Christendom, but before that in the German nation, and had come so far that it had been accepted by many estates in Christendom as just, true, and Christian, and had hitherto been held and advocated for it without means.

(15) Although at many imperial congresses that have been held up to now there have been many good counsels and actions to counter such divisions and to bring the Christian estates into unity, yet daily experience would have taught us so much.

that Her Imperial Majesty's governors, decreed commissioners and commanders. The Emperor and the Holy Roman Emperor have indicated that their Majesty's governors, decreed commissioners and commanders, in addition to the princes, princes and other estates of the Holy Roman Empire, cannot find a more convenient, more permanent and less burdensome way to help this matter in the case of pending Christian disputes, than that a common, free Christian council be held and announced by their Majesty's help. This is what has happened in the Christian church until now in such disputes of our faith. Not only all the imperial states, but also the majority of all the relatives and subjects of the empire, but most of all their imperial majesty, would have supported them in this way of Christian help. Majesty, would have approved of this way of a Christian Concilii; and some of the most recent imperial treaties, 1) especially the one at Speier of the sixth and twentieth year, as reported above, would have been seriously put to this end, so that their Imperial Majesty would have asked for a favorable appointment. Majesty should be requested in the most conducive manner for the conducive establishment of such concilii, to which also the majority of all those who are attached to and inclined to the Gospel, to which the opposite of the same have appealed and offered themselves. Although we, together with others, certainly provide that this means and decision of an approved and accepted Christian Council should remain valid, and that no one should be obliged to determine, act, and deliberate about it by any other repugnant means, the other princes, princes, and estates of the realm had, at this imperial diet at Speier, undertaken to take action on all the admonitions and notices that had been given, and also on some of the main points of these important matters of our faith, by means of their resolution and agreement; But how justly could her Majesty., as a Christian, praiseworthy, and understanding Emperor, may judge for himself. For since the same imperial estates before and now considered it useful, necessary, and fruitful to hold a Christian council in the best possible way, they would have declared loudly and more than sufficiently that in no other place than in a free Christian council would it be proper to act justly in this matter, and thus they would have surrendered the power of their determination, decision, and judgment, even if they had had some, without means. How then could one thing always be suffered to stand beside the other? For if these matters were placed in the hands of a concilii, the estates of the empire would not be able to act with any have a just mind to submit to some action, however small it may be; but if they had a just knowledge of it, what need would there be of a council?

(16) Secondly, in a crazy time, namely in the 24th year, her Majesty had planned to hold an Imperial Diet at Speier; but when it reached her Majesty that many of the princes, princes and other imperial estates had made themselves skilful with some brave counsels, in the opinion that in matters of the Gospel and of our faith they should act there the more nobly, her Majesty had most seriously forbidden such plans to the estates by a written order issued by her Majesty, with these reasons attached, that such important matters should be dealt with in a Christian common council and in her Imperial Diet. had her Majesty, by written order issued by her Majesty, most earnestly forbidden such plans of the Imperial Estates, with these reasons attached, that such important matters should be dealt with in a Christian common council and in the presence of her Imperial Majesty. Not only would such an action in matters of faith have remained to be held, but also the entire Imperial Diet. From this we could draw this undoubtedly certain reason, that her Majesty would not be of any other mind, than that this trade, and what may be attached to it, should not be traded and acted upon by some special imperial estates, as is now done, but by a common Christian council; and that her Majesty's mind, commission, and order would not be placed there at all, in this matter, beforehand without her Majesty's and other Christian estates' presence. and other Christian estates to decide what to do, although it was said that only the time between here and the Concilium should be kept that way. For so, according to Her Imperial Majesty Majesty. Opinion and Command outside of a Christian Concilii and Her Imperial Majesty's Majesty. If, according to the opinion and command of Her Imperial Majesty, no action is taken on such important matters outside of a Christian Council and Her Imperial Majesty's presence, then neither now nor in the meantime of a Council shall anything be traced or done by the estates in these matters as for a common decision.

(17) Thirdly, because Her Imperial Majesty's invitation to this Diet has been given to her Commissioners. Majesty's invitation to this Diet, as well as the Commission and Instruction given to their Commissioners at this Diet, it is clear, among other things, that Her Imperial Majesty promised and promised what would be decided at this Diet for the honor and benefit of the Holy Roman Empire. Majesty has promised and pledged that whatever is decided at this Imperial Diet for the honor, benefit and welfare of the Holy Roman Empire, Her Imperial Majesty will faithfully observe and keep. Maj. would faithfully keep it and help to carry it out: so we could by no means presume that, if through the cassation of the previous Speierian imperial treaty some more discord, strife and further development should take place in the Holy Roman Empire, that her Majesty should be inclined to make the same treaty for herself, or through the help of some of the Imperial Estates, without the consent of the others, which would have helped to decide the same before, and to cause something more burdensome for it. For what imperial state would want to respect their Imperial Majesty's mind? Majesty's mind that she would have given her commissioners the power and command to do and decide what might presumably result in mischief, harm, and strife in the Holy Empire? Moreover, we have no doubt that the commission, authority, and instruction given to her Majesty was not based on a final command, i.e., that the content and letter of the same should be strictly adhered to and lived by, but on a useful, fruitful concern of all imperial estates in general; as princes, princes, and the other estates of the empire understood this in the same way, and therefore undertook to make several changes contrary to the letter of the instruction. For if it had been her Imperial Majesty's If it had been her Majesty's strict opinion to act entirely in accordance with the Instruction and not otherwise, what would have been the need for her Majesty's authority and commission, given to her Majesty's Commissars? What use would this Imperial Diet and all the Imperial Estates described therein have been for presence, concern, advice and decision? From this we can sufficiently remind ourselves that the other imperial estates, to presume upon some force or command, contrary to the previous imperial treaty at Speier, or to cause other complaints in the empire with it, would have had no cause from their imperial majesty. Maj. had no cause to presume.

(18) Fourthly, whether we have now decided in favour of the Imperial Majesty in the articles which the other imperial estates have submitted to the previous Speier Treaty. Maj. in the articles which the other imperial estates had decided upon in the previous Speierian agreement at this Imperial Diet, and to indicate to each of them in particular a great deal of our high complaints, where we should accept and agree to the articles, in a different way and as a matter of necessity: we would like to make such an arrangement until Her Majesty's happy future in the Empire, which we would expect with great joy and satisfaction, or at another more opportune time. We would, however, make such arrangements until her Majesty's happy future in the realm, which we would expect with but joys and desires, or at some other more opportune time, but would nevertheless inform her Majesty before others of this subsequent high grievance, and what would have driven us to our protestation in particular: namely, that some of the same articles have been placed where we should accept them and consent to them, that we would have to act against our conscience without means. We would be silent of all our subjects and dependents, on whom by our grant we laid an equally burdensome and unmistakable burden on their consciences; and where no other cause but this should be before our eyes:

we respect the same more than sufficiently, that the imperial estates would have had a reasonable, guilty motion, not to knowingly oblige us by their resolution to that which we would never want to answer to God for the sake of our conscience. For since it would ever be evident, and irrefutable among all Christians, that if a man considers something to be unjust, and acts upon it, if it were otherwise right in himself, it would be sin and damnable; If then we should be compelled by the granting of the same burdensome articles, or in other ways, to do that which, from the indication of the divine word, we have thought either unjust or a public error in our hearts and consciences, it would not only be most burdensome, injurious, and damnable to us, as Christians, but also, in the case of men, believers and unbelievers, reproachable, and most detrimental to our holy faith. We also fully consider that it would be more virtuous, less dangerous, and more detrimental for us to put our temporal life in danger than to fall into the hands of the Almighty God by allowing such public and damnable sins. Moreover, we have always desired from the bottom of our hearts, and we still do, since our minds would never stray, either with knowledge or out of willfulness, nor would we seek our own benefit or piety, but only the glory of God and his holy gospel, and the salvation of our pious subjects; If anyone from the imperial estates, spiritual or secular, should suspect us of some unchristian insanity, action or misbelief, and want to report all this to us with divine truth: We would be inclined to refrain from such errors, of which we have none in ourselves, without hindrance, even as we would be without remedy. For no man on earth could ever deny this with truth; even the clergy themselves would have to confess it. Thus, Pope Hadrianus, by means of a papal commission and instruction, which he gave to his orator at the recently held Imperial Diet at Nuremberg, would have freely confessed in the same way and announced that there were many certain infirmities and abuses in the Roman Church, 1) moreover, that these abuses had been reported at the Imperial Diet at Nuremberg to one hundred of their Imperial Majesty and the papal authorities. Maj. and the papal orators in writings). From which their

2) Document No. 722 in the 15th volume of our edition.

Imperial. Maj. himself, as a highly understanding Christian Emperor, graciously remind us that we also have sufficient cause from the public abuses before our eyes, although the Word of God does not bear witness to them, and that we are also obligated to pacify our consciences in all of this in such a way that we should not, with knowledge, permit, accept, or approve of anything objectionable. It also behooves every Christian, in matters concerning the salvation of souls and our faith, to look neither to the crowd, nor to old customs, nor to disgusting practices, nor to the great multitude, nor to a greater number, but to the truth of their God, from whom they have received soul, body, honor, goods, government, and all things, as not only the holy divine Scriptures, but also the ecclesiastical papal laws themselves are able to do clearly and expressly.

19. Fifth, we should not unreasonably consider the impossibility of this great and important transaction, and what might result from the execution of a burdensome and repugnant parting, in addition to the aforementioned excellent reasons: for although our subjects know, and are told by God's word of necessity, that they owe obedience to the authorities, they are not unaware that they need some compulsion to sin and act against their conscience, no less than we do: but that they are also unaware of the fact that they are not obligated to grant a certain coercion by which they are required to sin and act against their conscience, no less than we are; that in this case, too, and since it concerns God's strict command without means, all obedience to man ceases. Even if we were to fall into this blindness, that we would consent for ourselves to that which would be burdensome for our souls and consciences, and that we would knowingly sin for ourselves (from which God Almighty would mercifully protect us), our subjects would not accept this as certain, but would, as is undoubtedly the case from the foregoing action, show themselves to be opposed to it, so that it would be impossible for us to obtain it and to bring it about. What further development, aggravation, disobedience, apostasy, and separation of all civil [order] 3) and common peace would cause, how far this burdensome pestilence would spread in the holy realm, whether it would not cause public irreparable riots, revolts, and all indecencies, which one would want to prevent, and whether the last days would become worse than the first, which we would like to prevent according to our best ability, would not be a problem for us.

less to her Imperial Majesty. Mas., as the highest promoter of all peace and justice, holder of the common peace of the land, and a ruler of the holy realm, than to graciously consider us, on whose backs the highest burden would be placed. For the subjects of the holy kingdom are now instructed this year that they do not wish to be instructed in these important high matters, since it concerns the honor of God and his holy gospel and the salvation of their souls and consciences, by any other means than by the certain word of God. If we were now to depart from the previous imperial decree at Speier, and fall into such burdensome articles, and were also to undertake to impose them on our own, without a prior thorough demonstration of divine truth, or before a free Christian council, for which all the imperial estates had hitherto urged the highest discord in favourable action, then it would be certain that such a thing would be impossible to raise among the common man and subjects. Since no man, to whom this would not be in his power, from which he could expect nothing but a final ruin and all danger, should be urged or be obliged to accept it, this movement would be so brave and respectable, notwithstanding all the other causes mentioned above, that the Imperial Majesty, as we do not doubt, would have given us the right to do it. Maj. would not, as we do not doubt, refer our refusal and non-consent to any disgrace, and, besides the impossibility of our doing so, would not consider it of any small benefit and promotion of the common welfare of the Holy Roman Empire that, by such protesting and non-consenting, we would have prevented a troublesome beginning of greater unpleasant uprisings and revolts, and much more a frightening and irretrievable outcome of the same.

20. It is certainly not in our mind, will, and opinion to give any cause for discord, division, apostasy, revolt, and repugnance in the holy realm by these or other actions of ours, but rather to devote all our diligence, effort, and labor of our highest fortune to faithfully prevent such things, as we have been willing to do in the same way no less than our forefathers did; that all our actions, and what we have suffered because of them, where they have been presented to Her Imperial Majesty with reason and truth, ought to have been taken into account. Majesty should be presented with reason of truth, would give us open testimony. But that, which in this matter has been confirmed by the recent Speierian If we were to take leave, the way would certainly not be, as one would think, to cause a lot of future mischief, but, as we have heard, the only way to cause the greatest harm; but we, as the obedient Christian members of the holy kingdom, inasmuch as we also recognize ourselves guilty, would much rather and more cheaply see this prevented with the utmost diligence, and for our part we would not like to lose anything from it 1).

(21) So also the Imperial Majesty should take care of all of us. Majesty should take care of all of us in general and in particular, that we are not only ordered on earth by God to Her Imperial Majesty, as our rightful united Lord, but also to Her Imperial Majesty, as our rightful united Lord, that we are also ordered by Her Imperial Majesty, as our rightful united Lord. Majesty. and faithfully promote everything that may always serve the dignity, honor, welfare and reception of divine truth, the holy empire and common Christianity, but also to join with our subjects and relatives in a common council or national assembly in matters concerning our holy faith and the same religion, by means of divine assistance, so that, if God wills, nothing else but an honorable, princely and Christian mind, love and inclination towards God, Her Imperial Majesty, common Christendom and the Holy Empire shall be publicly felt, and doubtless no one shall have cause to blame or accuse us all of some unchristian action, rebellion and disobedience in some way; Nor would it be in our minds to refuse or protest in others, where these matters of conscience, faith and Christian religion, and what therefore might be a common grievance to us all, are not concerned, but would in such, where it is the necessary help against the Turk, The Imperial Majesty at Worms has established the necessary assistance against the Turks, the maintenance of the regiment and chamber court, as long as it is in accordance with the order of the empire, the handling of peace and justice, and other such matters, and to live faithfully, and to act, perform, and execute everything that is due to the obedient members of the empire.

22 And thereupon our envoys shall petition the Imperial Majesty in the highest authority on our behalf. Majesty in the highest subservience on our account whether these things and acts have hitherto been communicated to Her Imperial Majesty by anyone. Majesty by anyone.

1) "erwinden" == lack; lack; put by us instead of: "erwenden".

of any other form than that which is in the ground, or that we would be disparaged and registered, either altogether or especially, with Her Imperial Majesty or in some way. If we have been disparaged and registered in some way or other, or if we have been discredited and registered in some way or other, her Majesty will not give any chance or credence to it, but will graciously be mindful of our true Christian and well-founded excuses, and will not be moved to do us any disfavor. For we are of no other mind, intention, or will than that we like to be Christians, to do right and to act right, and to be obedient members of the holy Christian church, of its imperial majesty, and of the holy empire. Majesty and the Holy Empire, and faithfully place our property at the disposal of their Imperial Majesty, also to God what belongs to God, and to their Imperial Majesty what belongs to their Majesty. Majesty, what is rightfully and obligatorily due to Her Majesty, inasmuch as our forefathers, brothers and ancestors have hitherto also done everything of their property. With further most humbly request that also her Imperial Majesty will graciously promote and be concerned that a common free Christian Concilium be held as soon as possible, of the "most humbly" understanding that her Imperial Majesty would find this our apology and statement so important and respectable that we would have urged to our protestation and non-approval out of unavoidable necessity, and therefore do not deny ourselves that we would not allow this, which would be so very burdensome to us, our souls and consciences, as well as to our country, people and subjects, but would prevent it as much as possible, considering how very burdensome and frightening it would be for all Christians to fall into deliberate sins, God's wrath, punishment and disgrace, and to cause others to do the same in the same way; Again, with the most humble Christian entreaty, if we or ours have erred in anything hitherto, or should still err, that we should then let ourselves be instructed each time with holy divine Scripture quite obediently, willingly, and inclined, and insist on nothing that should be repugnant to our holy faith, Christian religion, or God's Word in some way.

(23) We also wish to submit ourselves most humbly to Her Imperial Majesty, as our most gracious Lord and Emperor, in all due obedience, and to command Her Imperial Majesty's protection, protection, and imperial handling of the same, with most humbly humble request to inform Her Imperial Majesty of our gracious response to this; that is, we are all and one.

each especially for the sake of Her Imperial Majesty, as our most gracious Lord, Emperor and Ruler, to earn in dutiful obedience all submissive diligence, most eager, inclined and willing.

24th For the record is this our Instruction with ours, by the Grace of God Johannsen of Saxony, Archmarshall of the Holy Empire, Elector 2c., Georgen, Margrave of Brandenburg 2c., and Philippsen, Landgrave of Hesse 2c., for ourselves and on account of the Highborn Princes, our Oheim and brothers-in-law, Ernten and Franciscen, Dukes of Lüneburg 2c., and Wolfen, Princes of Anhalt; and then by us Mayors and Council of Nuremberg, for ourselves, and those of Strasbourg, Costnitz, Ulm, Memmingen, Nördlingen, St. Gallen, Lindau, and other free and imperial cities of the Holy Roman Empire, adhering to us in obberührte Handel, Insiegeln, imprinted at the end of the writing, sealed. Done and given at Nuremberg, on Thursday, May 27, 1529.

851: The protesting princes, princes and estates' supplementary instruction for their envoys to be sent to Emperor Carl the Fifth. May 1529.

In Müller I. e. p. 167 and in Lünig's Reichs-Archiv, part. Z6n. eont. II. p. 320.

(1) In addition to this sealed instruction of ours, which is also to be delivered to the Imperial Majesty in German, Latin, and French, our envoys are commanded to act in the same way before Imperial Majesty the Grand Chancellor, the Grand Chamberlain, Count Henry of Nassau, and Alexander Schweiß, on our letters of credence. Majesty's Grand Chancellor, Grand Chamberlain, Count Henry of Nassau and Alexander Sweat, to act in the same way on our letters of credence, and to tell them orally these matters of our protestation and the causes of the same as briefly as possible, and where it is necessary, and, where it is necessary, have copies of our instructions read out to them, to learn the principles of the matter from them, and thereupon to request them altogether and especially implore them that, in view of our highest pressing need, our true excuse and Christian honourable entreaty, they may apply to His Imperial Majesty for faithful, good and faithful assistance. Majesty's faithful, good and gracious supporters, and to help ask their Imperial Majesty to support us, as obedient members of the Holy Roman Empire, the Christian Church and their Imperial Majesty, to their highest mercy. Majesty, to whose highest possible servitude we offer ourselves in all ways, not to be moved, but to send our envoys with a gracious written-

...with a simple answer... That we would also be quite inclined and willing to blame them all, and each one in particular, and to recognize them with grace.

(2) Likewise, Ulrich Ehinger is to be used as a faithful assistant and solicitor to Imperial Majesty in the name of all of us. Majesty in the name of all of us, and be diligently requested for this by the envoys.

(3) If, however, our envoys should meet with some opposition from His Imperial Majesty or other persons on our account by disparaging and repugnant action, we shall be entitled to the same. Majesty, or the other persons, if they should apply for promotion on our behalf, as if we should not have some just cause or reason for our action and conduct: Let our envoys, from the acts passed at Speier, also from our protest and appeal, among other things, as they know and have heard at Speier itself, explain our reasons, goodwill and necessity to the best of their ability, but not in any other way than in general, and do not enter into any special article with answer and dispute. With the further indication that any reasonable Christian would find our undoubted oversight out of the aforementioned responsibility of ours certainly so much more courageous, respectable, and well-founded, that he would not blame us in such an unjust, unskillful, or wanton act 1). We wanted to keep silent about all our Christian heritage and other more valiant causes, so that we would be able to further harm the Emperor's Majesty in time. Majesty in time and with such important prestige that her Majesty would undoubtedly be graciously satisfied 2c., so that the envoys know what to do and must send themselves into it for the best from the action as it may come to them.

4 If the envoys receive a gracious answer and farewell from His Imperial Majesty for all their actions, they will work diligently to communicate it to them in credible writings. If the envoys receive a gracious answer and farewell from His Majesty, which they should also work diligently to communicate to them in credible writings, then it has its way.

(5) If, however, the Imperial Majesty does not bear 5. If, however, the Imperial Majesty should ever refuse to accept this noble apology, responsibility, and entreaty of ours, and should be so ungracious to our envoys that they would not have to put up with a more gracious and tolerable discharge, they shall "most humbly" inform the Imperial Majesty that this and other matters incumbent upon the common Christianity and the Holy Roman Empire, such as the following, are not to be considered by the Imperial Majesty.

we would like to testify with God and our conscience that we all do not mean anything else than the most Christian and faithful; we would like nothing better than that among all Christian states, first of all the German ones, a unanimous will, peace and unity, and a confidential mind should be found, which we would gladly and faithfully promote, and in such we would not spare our fortune; this shall also, if God wills, be evident to their Imperial Majesty and manly. Majesty and all men shall find this to be true. We would also have provided ourselves completely, our true justified excuse, also the noble causes and inheritances embodied therein, should have had such a standing with Her Imperial Majesty. Majesty should have had such a reputation that Her Imperial Majesty would have accepted our emergency measures. Majesty would have graciously respected and accepted our emergency responsibility, and at least not less, than their statements, which might have been repugnant to us, and without reason in the eyes of Her Imperial Majesty. Majesty without reason, as God wills, to disparage us and to make an ungracious Emperor. However, we initially consoled ourselves of our innocence, and of the fact that we considered Her Imperial Majesty a laudable person. Majesty for a praiseworthy, pious, just, Christian Emperor, who, as we have no doubt, would allow himself to be instructed in time, and would fall into line with the right truth and uphold it, without any means. Since this transaction affects not only our persons, our country, people, and subjects, and thus the temporal, but rather our faith, souls, and consciences, as the eternal; in which, even in the case of the loss of souls and the punishment of eternal damnation, it behooves us to look only to the strict command of God, who will be the certain right judge of all men, high and low: Therefore, we, as those who would gladly be Christians and prevent a common and even more burdensome adversity, strife and division in the Holy Empire, as well as a pernicious and irretrievable damage to our principality and subjects, as each one is obliged to do in accordance with his duties, have appealed to the youngest of the other imperial estates, out of the greatest need, and not contrary to any man, nor out of any will of courage, for a decision and for the dismissal of this case; as Her Imperial Majesty would graciously hear from the instrument of such appeal, 2) which our envoys should deliver to Her Majesty in German and Latin, that they, the envoys, are to be considered by Her Imperial Majesty, as a Roman Emperor. Majesty, as Roman Emperor, Lord of us all and temporal sovereignty, from our command, with the most humble reverence and reverence as befits, have humbly notified and proclaimed, with the request that we want to follow up such our needy and highly caused appeal at its time, and to comply with it as is due and right. Her Imperial Majesty should also be pleased. Majesty, notwithstanding this appeal of ours, should never look to us all, and to each one in particular, for anything other than faithful, dutiful obedience, willing submission, and peaceful, harmonious action, as much as is always possible for us, as to obedient, obligated members and estates of the Holy Christian Church, Her Imperial Majesty, and the Holy Roman Empire. Majesty and the Holy Roman Empire. And if we did not have the highest desire and inclination for such a thing, but that our mind should stand to cause some displeasure, discord, or dissension, however slight it might be, in the Holy Empire, we would certainly not be sent to her Imperial Majesty. We certainly did not want to send to her Imperial Majesty, and to have indicated our submissive obedience to her in such a tolerant manner, with a submissive, humble request, that her Imperial Majesty should not be displeased with us. Majesty will not be moved to disgrace us, but to have us in her Majesty's most gracious protection, protection and command. This we want for the sake of Her Imperial Majesty, as our gracious Majesty, as our most gracious Lord and Emperor, with all submissiveness and obedient diligence.

6th And the envoys shall again act with all diligence, of their highest ability, also by the support of the imperial counsels. Majesty's counsels, act for a gracious farewell and credible answer; as we then graciously and favorably trust in the said our envoys; this shall not remain unrecognized and undeserved against their persons.

(7) Besides this, it is also considered and ordered to the envoys, if Imperial Majesty does not want to lead them, the envoys, astray. 7. It is also considered and ordered to the envoys, if the Imperial Majesty does not want to mislead them, the envoys, that they then send their letter of credence, also the instruction and appeal in German, Latin and French to Ulrich Ehinger's hand, and write next to it how they have been dispatched to ride to their Imperial Majesty and to make a submission to her; but because they have been refused, they are not allowed to do so. But since they have been refused an escort, it would be quite burdensome and inconvenient for them to ride into Hispania in these swift heats without a necessary escort; and so that their Imperial Majesty would nevertheless be informed of their command. Majesty of their command, so they send their letters of credence, instructions and our appeal herewith to their imperial Majesty in all

With most humbly request that Her Imperial Majesty would again send us a gracious reply in writing and have us in her gracious command, protection and protection. Majesty would again send us a gracious answer in writing, and have us in gracious command, protection and protection; which we would quite willingly deserve against Her Imperial Majesty in subservience. Majesty in subservience quite willingly. And our envoys shall then ride home again.

Nuremberg, May 1529.

See No. 851.

Before the Most Serene 2c., our most gracious Lord, and otherwise manly, we, by the Grace of God Johann, Duke of Saxony et ulū 2c., and we mayors and councillors of the Holy Roman Empire's free and imperial cities, Strasbourg, Nuremberg, Ulm, Constance, Gall, Nördlingen, Memmingen, Lindau, Heilbrunn, Kempten, Ißnau [Jsny], Reutlingen, Windsheim and Weißenburg, that we have appointed and ordered as our attorneys in all matters of high obligation and necessity, as we have appointed and ordered them all and especially herewith, our dear special and faithful, Hansen Ehinger, Mayor of Memmingen, Alexium Frauentraut, and Master Micheln von Kaden, with order to appear before Your Imperial Majesty, Our Allies. Majesty, our most gracious Lord, or his Imperial Majesty's commanders. Majesty's commanders, our well-founded and constant reason why we could not, on account of our conscience and other excellent causes, have granted, on the occasion of the Imperial Diet held at Speier, in the parting assembled at that time by the greater part of the estates of the Holy Roman Empire, in matters concerning religion and the Christian faith, to present together other necessities on the occasion of these matters: And hereby give them perfect power to present and act upon our necessity and advertisement, upon our received order, through themselves, or, their all or one hindrance, their subordinate attorneys, whom they may also substitute according to their necessity. Thereupon we the above-mentioned Princes, Reigning Princes, and Estates, speak and pledge to perform all that said our attorneys, or their subordinate one or more commanders, shall do on our account in the above-mentioned matters, wherefore they have been delivered by us to Imperial Majesty. Majesty, that we shall have all these things approved, and that we shall and will keep them steadfast and firm.

faithfully and approximately. 1) We, the electors and princes, and we, the electors and princes of Nuremberg, for the sake of all other free and imperial cities, and by order of the same, have had our petitions knowingly printed hereon. Actum Nuremberg.

853. draft of the oral presentation Lei the imperial audience.

In Müller I. c. S. 174.

What the skilful ones after transfer of the credence, and due service, are to present orally before Imperial Majesty. The king's Majesty.

1st Most Gracious Emperor! At the recently held Imperial Diet at Speier, which was called by Your Imperial Majesty for moving reasons, a discord of religion has arisen, together with that which is to be held in the meantime of a concili with peace; Therefore our most gracious and gracious lords, princes and princes, and the free and imperial cities have protested, out of urgent necessity, against the other parting made, on account of their consciences, with notice that they wish to have this brought to your Imperial Majesty. Majesty, as follows:

(2) It is unknown to Your Imperial Majesty. It is not known to Your Majesty what controversial articles of divine doctrine have occurred for a long time in Germany and other countries, which have been accepted in part by some estates and their subjects, and opposed by other estates whose subjects are eager for the same doctrine, Therefore much error, quarrel and antagonism has arisen among them, and has always been considered by all parts, and still is, that these things could not be dealt with in a more appropriate way than by a free, Christian, common council or national assembly, as was done at the Imperial Diet by Your Imperial Highness. Imperial. Majesty in the 26th year at Speier, it was considered good, necessary and convenient, deliberated and decided that a council be held as closely as possible, and that in the meantime each governed and held it with his subjects in such a way as he could answer for it to God and to Your Imperial Majesty. Majesty, and that no other suitable way be devised for the preservation of peace and unity; as was resolved and promised at the same Imperial Diet not to act contrary to this.

1) about - without danger.
all according to the printed parting having herewith.

(3) When, however, in this year another Imperial Diet was again called at Speier by Your Imperial Majesty for moving reasons, with a report on the future Council and other necessities of the realm. Majesty, with notice to act, deliberate, and decide on the future Council and other needs of the Empire, their Electoral and Princely Graces, in their own persons, and the cities, by their noble embassies, went there. Their Electoral and Princely Graces, in their own persons, and the cities, through their noble embassies, have gone there, in the opinion that everything that serves the honor of God and His Holy Word, the preservation of good peace and the noble welfare of His Imperial Majesty and the Empire, should be done. Majesty and the Empire, to seek and promote.

4th And although in the name of Your Imperial Majesty an Instruction has been read by the same Commissioners 2c. Majesty, an Instruction has been read out by the same Commissaries 2c. in which the previous Decree at Speier, concerning the Edict at Worms, has been passed, rescinded and annulled, these causes that a misunderstanding would have arisen with some from it.

(5) However, their Electoral and Princely Graces and the others of this part have shown good reasons. Graces, and the others of this part, have shown good reasons why it should remain with the first Speierian parting, and that no better way could be found to avert the anxious uproar, to calm all repugnance, than that it would be held as previously reported.

(6) There is also no doubt if Your Imperial Majesty would be thoroughly informed of the matter. Majesty had been thoroughly informed of the matter, out of what high and unanimous concern the previous Speierian treaty would have been decided, certified, and sealed; what also would have resulted from the revocation of the same for a disruption and careful burden in the Holy Roman Empire, if His Imperial Majesty had not been moved to the cassation. Majesty would not have been moved to the cassation; just as it would have been of the opinion that the matters should not be discussed in the first place, so the imperial diets that had been announced would, in their opinion, have been in vain and without fruit. As, without this, it may well be presumed that it will certainly and finally be the pleasure of Your Imperial Majesty. Majesty would certainly and finally not have been of the mind to decide on the affected opinion of the submitted Instruction, so nevertheless His Imperial Majesty's letter and mandate would have been in vain. Majesty's decree and mandate do not entail such, but extend to preliminary deliberation and consideration of the aforementioned affairs of the realm alone.

(7) Although this and other things have been objected to, especially that it should not be proper to do what has been unanimously decided with Your Imperial Majesty's permission and promise not to do. Majesty's grant and promise not to act contrary thereto, has been unanimously decided with the estates, such by the several, in divine matters, our

They are sure that they have not acted contrary to the same parting; and although some would have misunderstood it, they have intended to act as an explanation and mitigation of the other parting, but rather that it would be just and lawful to hear each one's special word and will, even in temporal matters that are held outside a community. To this end they know for certain that they have done nothing contrary to the same ordinance; and although a misapprehension would have been taken of it by some, yet they have wished to act by way of explanation and mitigation, and have proposed several honorable and equitable expedients. But notwithstanding these, and all their admonition, friendly and submissive request and reminder, the other Electors, Princes, and Estates, out of one majority, contrary to the previous unanimous agreement, have decided on a different opinion, and in religion have introduced several burdensome articles, notwithstanding Your Imperial Majesty's prohibition and permission. Majesty's prohibition and permission of the Council, and ordered how it should be done. Against this, this part, as complained of, protested, so that they might not have agreed to it for the following and other reasons mentioned; And especially because it does not behoove them, even as a majority, to set anything in the midst of the Council in matters concerning religion and faith, and to make a statute against the other few parts who hope to have the Holy Scriptures for themselves; first of all, because one should expect the same Council in the future, otherwise one would not be in need of it. Moreover, in the 24th year an Imperial Diet was called by Your Imperial Majesty at Speier. Majesty to Speier, to separate the evil from the good, and also to act again in Speier in the 26th year against the abuses to which Pope Adrian and other ecclesiastics had confessed, and ordered them to act, as the Estates have therefore been well prepared and skilful with their advice in such matters with their university scholars, but one Imperial Diet has remained; so Your Imperial Majesty has seriously ordered the other Imperial Diet to be held in Speier. Majesty had the other one seriously commanded that matters concerning religion be discussed without the presence of Your Imperial Majesty and of the Council. Majesty, and of the Concilio 1) neither to act nor to decide.

(8) Moreover, their electoral and princely graces and others may indicate in truth that it is not only burdensome for them in their consciences, but also impossible against the world. Graces and others indicate in truth that it is not only burdensome for them in their consciences, but also impossible in the face of the world, according to the present course, to persuade the subjects to a different doctrine than that which they have been instructed; and if this were not the case, it would be impossible for them.

1) "and of the Concilio" put by us instead of: "and its Concilii". Compare Document No. 816 in this volume, Col. 251, § 2.

It is to be feared, where something because of it, and especially in cities, where the same doctrine has become prevalent, should be done against it, that much more mischief and indignation, than ever before, might result and arise from it.

(9) Therefore Their Electoral and Princely Graces, and the others. Graces, and the other, humbly and most humbly request, that Your Imperial Majesty, for the above-mentioned and other reasons, will not take an ungracious will against the same. Majesty, for the reasons mentioned and others, do not wish to take an ungracious will to the protestation and refusal made against the same, but rather to assign this to the unimportant, urgent and great necessity: considering that the eternal, and thus the salvation of souls, must and should be placed before the temporal and the teachings of men; that it is also not to be assumed that anyone, out of presumption, would want to place the salvation of his soul in danger and oblivion; moreover, their Electoral and Princely Graces and others, who have been informed about the protestation and refusal of the same, consider that this is not the case. Furthermore, their electoral and princely graces, and others, by means of divine assistance, intend in the meantime to show themselves, to hold, to govern and to live in their jurisdictions and territories in matters concerning our faith and the same religion, as their electoral and princely graces, together with those of their own, do. Graces, together with the honorable free and imperial cities, pending to them, such against God and Your Imperial Majesty as a Christian. Majesty, as a Christian Emperor, by God ordered supreme authority, our most gracious Lord, hope and trust to answer for it, that nothing unreasonable or evil may be imposed on them because of it; as they also hope that with them, like their ancestors, parents and brothers, nothing else has been felt or found, but that their electoral and princely graces, and the others, have been able to find their way into the Holy Land. Graces, and the others, are working with obedient diligence towards Your Imperial Majesty. Majesty; and first of all, as far as the temporal is concerned, with the necessary help against the Turks, also with the assigned maintenance of His Imperial Majesty's regiment, chamber, and the army. Majesty's regiment, chamber court and other things that are necessary for the honor and welfare of His Imperial Majesty and the Holy Roman Empire. Majesty and the Holy Roman Empire, for which we, as the competent authorities, humbly ask your graces and favors.

(10) And if the things should come to Your Imperial Majesty in another form. Majesty, Your Imperial Majesty does not want to give the same unequal report or disparagement. Majesty will not give the same unequal report or disparagement, but will grant this truthful request and apology; in addition, without a necessary and thorough hearing of both parties, and our most gracious, gracious, favorable gentlemen's answer, which they would be well advised to do by God's grace before His Imperial Majesty and other males, they would be well advised to do in the presence of His Imperial Majesty. Majesty and other men would be well advised to do.

Electoral and Princely Graces. Graces, and the others of cities and followers, cannot be moved in any way.

(11) Because they have also, where they have reported and overcome with divine truthful writing of another and certain, wanted to have their graces and the others duly measured; and hereby, as the submissive, obedient, command themselves in Your Imperial Majesty's protection and defense as our right lord. Majesty, as our rightful lord, protection, shield and defence, and again humbly requesting that Your Imperial Majesty will be so kind as to grant them the right of protection and defence. Majesty to give them a gracious answer; this is what Their Graces and the others around Their Imperial Majesty, as their all-gracious Lord, wish to do. Majesty, as their most gracious Lord.

854 Three letters of credence or promotorial, which were given to the envoys to some imperial ministers.

May 27, 1529.

The three letters of credence are found in Müller I.c. p. 180ff, the first in Latin, the other two in German. We have set the date after the second letter.

Promotorial letter to Margrave Mercurinus, imperial supreme chancellor.

Item inut. mut. to the second Imperial Grand Chamberlain.

Translated from the Latin.

Johannes von GÖttes Gnaden, Herzog zu Sachsen, des heiligen römischen Reichs Churfürst, Georg, Markgraf zu Brandenburg, Ernst und Franciscus, Herzoge zu Braunschweig und Lüneburg, Philipp, Landgraf zu Hessen, und Wolfgang, Fürst zu Anhalt, wünschen dem Hochgebornen und vortrefflichen Herrn Mercurinus, Markgrafen 2c., Heil.

We have no doubt that the actions of the princes and the German nation, which took place at the last assembly, will have been presented to His Imperial Majesty, our most gracious Lord. Majesty, our most gracious Lord, from which His Imperial Majesty will take it that we are with others of the Roman Empire. Majesty will accept that we have not been in agreement with other Princes and Estates of the Roman Empire on all points concerning the faith. So that Imperial Majesty will not doubt our obedience due to her, we have united to let Imperial Majesty know by means of certain sent-off letters how we have had very important and considerable causes for our deliberations, which we hope will be of interest to Imperial Majesty.

will be enough, and prove that we owe obedience in all things to Imperial Majesty, as our most gracious lord, and seek the general peace in this realm with great zeal. Accordingly, we have written to you, and for the sake of your peculiar mind and reputation, we wish to entrust our cause to you, not doubting that you also wish with all your heart that there may be peace in the Roman Empire. We therefore beseech you to help us to obtain from the Emperor's Majesty Majesty that, in accordance with their highest grace, they will listen most graciously to our apology why we have carried some doubts in the article concerning the disputed points of religion, and that they will give us a gracious answer, which we are prepared to give to Your Imperial Majesty with all obedient respect. Majesty with all obedient services; you, however, will be able to do yourselves the best service for the entire German nation in this imminent great danger, if you will endeavor to preserve the general peace by your power and good counsel; for which favor we want to thank you at all times and show you on occasion that you recognize that your good deed has not been used on any ingrates. Fare you well. Given 2c.

Promotorial letter to Ulrich Ehinger, imperial council.

By the Grace of God John, Duke of Saxony, Archmarshall of the Holy Roman Empire, Elector 2c., George, Margrave of Brandenburg, and Philip, Landgrave of Hesse 2c.

Our favorable will, friendly and willing services before, special dear, also special trusted lord and friend. We have dispatched your brother, our special dear, also trusted friend and relative, Hansen Ehinger, mayor of Memmingen, also our secretary and syndic, Alexien Frauentraut, and Master Micheln von Caden, to the Roman imperial and Hispanic royal majesty, our most gracious lord, with order and instruction, as you will hear from them verbally. Now we are nevertheless careful, and have more than one good reason to suspect that our friends and gracious lords, the bishops with their entourage, will not celebrate, not only the Royal Majesty of Hungary and Bohemia, our friend, lord, and most gracious lord, as the Imperial Majesty's governor in the Holy Land. Majesty's governor in the Holy Roman Empire, to make this matter and action quite heated, and against the Christian faithful.

It is not only necessary to move as much as possible the estates who would gladly adhere to the Gospel and be Christians, as we have felt such practices with complaints at the Imperial Diet now being held, but also to form much in the Imperial Majesty through her writings and messages, which, God willing, shall never again be found in some of these same Christian estates. For this reason it is necessary that the Imperial Majesty be informed of this high and important trade, which is important to all of us, who are related to and interested in such matters, as well as to the Holy Roman Empire and common Christianity, in many ways more than can be considered, as a matter of necessity, just as the envoys, at our hope, will not let anything happen to them because of all their faithful diligence. And if we have hitherto recognized you as a good Christian and townsman before others, you have also declared yourselves to be faithful to the Emperor's Majesty. Majesty as a faithful promoter and solicitor in our, the cities', matters: so out of special gracious and good faith our very kind request, friendly and official request is that you, as a Christian, in honor of God, for the welfare of the Christian community, also for the benefit of Imperial Majesty and the Holy Empire, will faithfully submit to and accept this matter and diligently solicit from Imperial Majesty. Majesty diligently, promote that her Imperial Majesty will no longer give Majesty no more give credence to those who actually seek themselves and their own advantage, and not at all the common benefit and salvation of souls, than to all of us who ever devote ourselves to the cause in a Christian, heartfelt and faithful manner, or allow ourselves to be persuaded to do something from which their Imperial Majesty and the Holy Roman Empire may benefit. Majesty and the Holy Empire with too late regrets, and that all our envoys are dispatched with a gracious answer. For our mind does not stand at all to give cause to any repugnance, disobedience, or sedition in the holy realm, or ever to persist in it, in which we should lack Christian just cause, but rather to help to prevent all this of our ability: so we have also always offered, and are still offering, where we should err in one or more articles, that we would not only like to have a free Christian council, but would almost gladly have each one instructed with the word of God. In this we want you to show how we graciously and favorably trust you before others: we are inclined to earn this for you, to recognize you in grace, with all friendly servitude and inclined will. Date at Nuremberg, with the absence of the above-mentioned princes, and the of Nuremberg from the other cities of all, Teeret sealed, this Thursday, 1) 27th of May Anno 2c. in the ninth and twentieth.

Mayors and councillors of the cities of Strasbourg, Nuremberg, Ulm, Nördlingen, Memmingen, and others, of these matters pending.

To our dear, special one, the honourable Ulrich Ehinger, Roman Imperial and Hispanic Royal Majesty's Councillor.

letter to the imperial secretary sweat.

ise iriutatis mutanäis to the Count of Nassau and Secretary Waldes.

Our greetings and friendly services beforehand, dear, special, favorable Lord and friend! We have no doubt that the action taken at the next Imperial Diet at Speier by the Roman Emperor's Majesty, our most gracious Lord, Governor, Royal Dignity of Hungary and Bohemia, our special dear Lord and Grandfather and most gracious Lord, and Her Imperial Majesty's Orator, Commissaries, also Princes, Princes and other estates of the Holy Roman Empire, will now be brought to Her Imperial Majesty's attention. From this Her Majesty will hear how and for what reasons we, in this matter concerning our holy Christian faith and religion, may not at all consent to nor heal the same, for the sake of our conscience. And although we have no doubt that Your Imperial Roman Majesty, as our allies, will be pleased with our work, we are not in any doubt that you will be pleased with our work. Majesty, as our most gracious lord and emperor, be graciously confident that we are quite eager and inclined to render submissive obedience to her imperial majesty in all due and proper matters, and especially for the preservation of peace and unity, and otherwise for the welfare and all good in the holy realm: Nevertheless, we have, according to our necessity, not wished to refrain from informing Her Imperial Majesty of our moving and high causes, on account of which (as indicated) we have taken such action, as far as our Christian faith and religion are concerned, until the future of a free common Christian religion.

1) In Walch's old edition: "on the day of Pentecost, the 27th of May", which is in any case wrong, because in 1529 Pentecost was May 16. We have left the date given, May 27, because we are of the opinion that all previous documents, from No. 850 on, are drafted on the same day.

We have not, however, consented to have the matter further brought forward and reported to you by our skilful agents. We therefore indicate this to you in our gracious and official opinion, that we hope you are inclined, as they can and do, to promote peace and unity in the Holy Empire with the Imperial Majesty. Majesty. And therefore it is our gracious and favorable request and official request to you, that you will be helpful and beneficial to our mentioned skilful ones on our behalf before the Imperial Majesty, that they may obtain from her Majesty a gracious hearing and answer to their commanded advertisement and request, and that they also otherwise have commanded us in the best possible way together with the matter in question. In this you show us favorable favor, which we are also inclined to recognize and owe you with graces and favors and willing services.

855. instrument which has been erected because of the one envoy, Alexius Frauentraut, exoneration from the legation. October 7, 1529.

From Müller's History 2c., lib. II. ep. 7. p. 191. - Frauentraut had herself exonerated from the legation in order to be able to serve as Notarius at the insinuation of Speier's appeal. See No. 857 and No. 863, 8 20.

I. In the name of God, Amen. It is made known and manifest to all men by this open instrument and deed, that in the year which is counted after the birth of Christ our dear Lord, fifteen hundred, and in the ninth and twentieth year, in the other Roman number of interest, called Indiction in Latin, in the reign and government of the Most Sublime, Lord Carol, elected Roman Emperor, our most gracious Lord, her Imperial Majesty's Regiment, the Roman in the eleventh, and the other all in the fourteenth year, on a Thursday, which was the seventh day of the month Octobris, about the time of vespers, or even close to it, Alexius Frauentraut, margravian secretary, personally appeared before me here below written notaries, and credible witnesses, and had and held in his hands a paper note of his own handwriting, in which he indicates reason and cause, why he does not want to wait any longer for his legation and sending, in which he was at that time, but wants to renounce, with request and desire that I, as a notary, make him ex officio one or more open instruments and documents, as much as he would be in need of them, about it and which note he also asked to be read out immediately, which was thus read out, and read from word to word, as actually follows afterwards:

Before you, Mr. Notary, and the present witnesses, I, Alexius Frauentraut, Margravian Secretary, appear this day, the seventh day of Octobris, and say: After the most illustrious, noble, high-born princes and lords, Mr. Johann, Archmarshall and Elector of the Holy Roman Empire, Duke of Saxony 2c., Mr. George, Margrave of Brandenburg 2c., Mr. Philip, Landgrave of Hesse 2c., Mr. Ernst and Mr. Franciscus, both Dukes of Lüneburg 2c., and Mr. Wolfgang, Prince of Anhalt 2c., also the honorable free and imperial cities, Ulm, Nuremberg, Strasbourg, Costnitz, Lindau, Eyßna [Isny], Kempten, Memmingen, St. Gallen, and other kinsmen of theirs, my most gracious, gracious and favorable lords, my kinsmen, here present, namely, Hansen Ehinger and Micheln von Kaden, also myself, to the most most noble, most great lord, Lord Carolin, Roman Emperor and Hispanic King 2c., our most gracious lord, all of them and especially dispatched, to their imperial majesty, in the matter of a protest against the parting of this 29th year, decided at Speier, concerning, from their all electoral and princely graces, also on account of the other respectable free and imperial cities, to cultivate advertisement and action (contents of our instruction). And because such my and my kinsmen's legation and sending is common and varied and such that our one, two or all three may do the same our act and command common or varied: I take care that such my legation may prevent me from carrying out my intention, other necessary business and things, which are not possible to be carried out by others in these foreign lands; Therefore, for the sake of the time, cause, and unavoidable necessity, I hereby and now wish to dispense with and exonerate myself from such my legation, now as then and then as now, in the best form, measure, manner, and way, as that should, can, or may always be most effective and constant, whether within or outside of law, and to place the others of my kinsmen at liberty to act, as they have then, for themselves, as much as they have always had the power to do, well-disposed of such legation and action. However, I reserve the right to submit to this legation again in due time, as I have done before. About this my exoneration require, I require and ask from you, Mr. Notary, you want me about all this.

make and give one or more trustworthy open instruments and deeds, as much as I would be able.

2. These things happened in the city of Playsantin [Hiacenza] 1) in our Francisri Baunon's dwelling, in the year, month, day, hour, and indiction, as the above reads, in the presence of the highly learned, honorable, and firm and honorable, Johann Efeander, Magister Arnim Costnitzer, Marx Pfister the Younger, and Christoph Pissinger, both of Augsburg, of the same, 2) and Jeronimus Ebner the Younger, of the Bamberg diocese, as witnesses especially required and requested.

3. and if I Johannes Boxhorn, of Brüssel, Cleric of the Bishopric of Camerich, Caif. Majesty's Capellan, and Commissioner, by papal and imperial power a manifest Notary Public, have been present at the above protestation, exoneration, acceptance, and all things as above, together with the witnesses, and have thus seen, heard, and recorded such myself: I have hereunto written this present instrument by another's hand, hindering my business, and [with] this my own hand signed, and my usual sign, which I use, signed, in faith and sign of all things above written, required, requisitioned, and requested.

856 Emperor Carl V's farewell to the envoys sent to him by the princes and estates of the empire protesting against the imperial treaty at Speier. Given at Placenz, 12 October 1529.

This document is found in Müller's Historie, lib. II, e<sup>x</sup>. 8, p. 196 and in Lünig's Reichs-Archiv, xurt. Mn. eont. I., x. 331.

Imperial Majesty, our most gracious lord, has granted to the highborn, their dear hosts, electors and princes, Johannsen, Duke of Saxony, Archmarshall of the Holy Roman Empire 2c., Jörgen, Margrave of Brandenburg, Ersten and Franciscen, Dukes of Lüneburg, Philippsen, Landgrave of Hesse, and Wolfgang, Prince of Anhalt; also the honorable mayors and councillors of the cities of Strasbourg, Nuremberg, Ulm, Costnitz, Sanct Gallen, Nördlingen, Memmingen, Lindau, Heilbrunn, Kempten, Jsnaue, Reutlingen, Winsheim, and Weißenburg, which they have brought before their Majesty through their envoys, Hansen Ehinger, Alexien Frauentraut, and Michaeln von Kadan: Namely, why they have not consented to the last agreement made at Speier by (not by them alone) all Princes, Princes and Estates of the Holy Empire, concerning the article of our holy Christian faith, with their attached petition, heard at length in their Imperial Council and sufficiently understood, and her Majesty has been reminded that they are therefore at odds with the estates, by the same agreement as that made by her Majesty's brother, orator and commissioners, with the Holy Roman Empire's princes and princes and other estates at this Imperial Diet, before their envoys arrived here with her Majesty. Which disagreement and discrepancy Her Majesty has heard with complaint, and of which she has been justly displeased, considering that from such disagreements and discrepancies nothing but disruption and much misfortune can be expected, which Her Majesty, in her power, has the right to prevent and to prevent, and which she is inclined to and means to prevent. For this reason, this matter has been discussed and considered in her Imperial Council to the highest degree, and as a result, she has been able to neither assess nor decide anything else, except that this decree has been passed by the much greater part of all the noble estates, not otherwise than solely for the prevention, from that time on, of all kinds of frightening innovations, doctrines and sects, and primarily for the preservation of peace and unity in the holy realm, and has been unanimously decided upon such means and measures: In which her Majesty's Oheim and Elector of Saxony, and princes and cities related to his love, should not have sought any refusal. For her Majesty never doubts that all these same noble Electors, Princes, and Estates would just as unwillingly act contrary to her consciences and the salvation of their souls as to act contrary to her Majesty's beloved Oheim and Elector of Saxony with his kinsmen; that they also, for the honor of God, and for the sake of some Christian understanding, and for the good of all beings, as well as for their own, ask a Concilium; which concilii might not seem necessary, as far as all that was once unanimously decided by all the estates (as well as by her Majesty, with all princes, princes and estates, at her first Imperial Diet at Worms, and on which her edicts were then issued; as her Majesty's grandfather had said, "I will not be a part of this concilium.

and Elector of Saxony and his beloved kinsmen, that they may be put off, with the parting of the Diet of Speier in the year fifteen hundred and six and twenty, and a parting after change and demand of the times and things should not be changed), had been or would be lived. And for this reason Her Imperial Majesty has decreed, and because it is also customary from time immemorial, what is decided in the common imperial assembly with the major powers, that the lesser part shall not resist this, but shall live obediently; and for many other honest motives and causes, to the above-mentioned their sovereign and Elector of Saxony, as well as to his related princes and cities, written and ordered that they once again accept such a treaty made, live obediently to it, and neither themselves nor their own do or act anything contrary to it: As they are bound by their duties to be kin to their Majesty and the holy realm. and the holy realm, with the gracious warning, if they should appear disobedient, that her Majesty will not avoid taking serious punishment against them to preserve their obedience in the holy realm. With further contents of such letter of her Majesty, which [as] her Majesty finally sees, they now receive or will receive within a short time, which they are also to comply with obediently, or which they will thus still do without refusal: That her Majesty would have special joy to hear, especially so much more of these times, since her Majesty is truly told how the hereditary enemy of our holy Christian name and faith, the Turk, has come with his great power into the Christian kingdom of Hungary, intending thence to take his course further into Christendom, and especially the German nation, and by his usually tyrannical raging to extend his empire; which can by no means be resisted without the same unanimous mind and a peaceful, unanimous being being made among the common estates of the holy empire (although her majesty's dear grandfather and Elector of Saxony, and princes and cities related to his love, willingly give their share of the resistance to the same Turk, together with the maintenance of the regiment and chamber court, as they offer to do); as common princes, rulers and estates have themselves indicated to her Majesty by their letter; which the Turk's terrible, cruel action, which affects not only one principality or country, but all of Christendom, and especially the

The German nation, and the faith, honor, soul, body, wife, children, and goods of each of its noble members; and that this must either be resisted with unanimous common power and force, or one must await its obvious and inevitable destruction. Even if there are still no other causes (beyond) the above-mentioned, by which her Majesty's grandson and Elector of Saxony, and princes and cities related to his love, would be obliged to accept this parting, as far as our holy faith is concerned, they should nevertheless move them to agree to it. Therefore also, and altogether for the aforementioned and other honest reasons, Her Imperial Majesty hereby most earnestly desires of the aforementioned her dear grandfather and Elector of Saxony, and of his beloved kinsmen princes and cities, graciously requests of them, and with this also not least, the content of her previous letter and order issued to them, otherwise commands and enjoins them that they take this leave, as far as the article of faith is concerned, in so far as this has not been done, that they again grant it in the most beneficial way, and in no way do anything contrary to it or act against it, but that, as Christian, praiseworthy, obedient and unanimous members of her Majesty and of the Holy Roman Empire, they agree with all the other praiseworthy princes, princes and estates of the Holy Roman Empire, who undoubtedly want to be good Christians just as much as they do, and decide how they may best assist their Majesty's brother, the Christian King of Hungary, and themselves, and how they may withstand and resist the reported Turkish rage, and as much as their Majesty may in their part most advantageously meet with our Holy Father the Pope, and consult and decide with his Holiness, all that she may consider, which in this place shall not only come to the stay and resistance of the hereditary enemy touched, the Turk, but also otherwise everywhere to the promotion, increase and permanence of the honor and service of our Lord God Almighty, our Christian religion and faith, and peace, tranquility, welfare and prosperity of all common laudable estates of the holy realm and of all Christendom. Her Majesty also intends to take care of the affairs of these Italian lands as best she can, and as soon as she has done so, to rise up in her own person to offer the aforementioned Turk, not only to her dear brother, but also to the praiseworthy German nation, the Holy kingdom and the aforementioned Christianity for help and comfort, to resist this by the grace of God, and to bring all things to a divine, praiseworthy and Christian being, to do their utmost and ability, and thus also not to leave them; in the full confidence that her Majesty's dear grandfather and Elector of Saxony and his beloved princes and cities, to whom her Majesty has already written in large part for this reason, will take all the above-mentioned good causes and circumstances, form and opportunity of this difficult task and obligation to heart and consider them well, and will thank her Majesty for his support., as they owe obedience, and also to them themselves for the good and welfare of the family, and to each of them in particular, to show themselves in this as benevolent as they wish, so that their Majesty may feel and recognize that they seek and desire nothing else but to promote the honor and service of Almighty God, and the protection of our holy Christian faith, to obey her Majesty as their supreme natural lord and emperor, and also their own peace, tranquillity and comfort in the holy kingdom and Christendom, and in turn to prove to them her imperial mercy in a more lenient manner, and also to have cause to kindly recognize and blame them for this. Given at Placenz, under Her Imperial Majesty's usual sign of hand. Majesty's usual hand sign, on the 12th day of Octobr. An. 2c. in the ninth and twentieth, of the same her Imperial. Majest. Empire, of the Roman in the eleventh, and of the others all in the fourteenth.

857 Instrument on the Insinuation of the Speier Appeal to the Emperor. 13 Oct. 1529.

From Müller I. c. S. 202.

In the name of God, amen. Let it be known and manifest to all men by this open instrument and document that in the year counted after the birth of Christ our dear Lord fifteen hundred and in the ninth and twentieth, in the other Roman number of interest, called in inæiotio in Latin, in the reign and government of the most noble, most powerful prince and lord, Lord Carl the Fifth, elected Roman emperor, at all times ruler of the empire, in Germania, at the time of the birth of Christ, in the year of the first and the ninth, in the year of the first and the twentieth, in the year of the second Roman number of interest, called inæiotio in Latin.

Hispania, both Sicilies, Jerusalem, Hungary, Dalmatia, Croatia 2c. King, Archduke of Austria and Duke of Burgundy 2c., Counts of Habsburg, Flanders and Tyrol 2c., our most gracious Lord, His Imperial Majesty's Regiment of the Roman in the eleventh year, on a Wednesday, which was the thirteenth day of the month Octobris, at eight o'clock in the forenoon or even close thereto, before me here below written Notaries and the credible witnesses personally appeared the honorable and respectable Master Alexander Schwaib, reported Imperial. Majesty's Secretary, had in his hands a paper document, with Imperial. Majesty's own hand, also his own secretary's hand; saying and pretending that he had been appointed by Imperial. Majesty. Majesty to send the same document and copy to the honorable and firm Hansen Ehinger and Micheln von Kaden, as the envoys of the princes, princes, and also honorable free and imperial cities, for which reason they were sent to Imperial Majesty. Majesty, to hand over their advertisement: which farewell the envoys then took with due reverence, as befits, to their hands, read out with each other; which has announced, as actually follows:

2. after the reading of such imperial. Majesty. The above-mentioned Hans Ehinger and Michel von Kaden, before their Imperial Majesty's Secretaries, have presented the following opinion. Maj. Secretary the following opinion, and had it spoken by the aforementioned Michel von Kaden, namely:

Respectable and honorable Mr. Secretary! Hans Ehinger and I, Michel von Kaden, as the envoys, have now heard the written farewell (which you have given us on behalf of and by order of Imperial Majesty to bring to our most gracious, gracious and favorable lords) in all humility. Majesty, to our most gracious, gracious and favorable lords) in all submission; and our most gracious, gracious and favorable lords have provided that their true excuse and well-founded reasons for their protestation (as the oral and written ones to Imperial Majesty himself in German, English, French and Italian) shall be heard. Majesty himself in German, Latin, and French) should have had such a standing with her Majesty, or at least have been no less than the opposing disparagement, that her Majesty should have given us a much more gracious and comfortable farewell.

Her Electoral, Princely Grace and Favor. Graces and Favors, however, initially take comfort in their innocence and Christian benevolence, and that they consider the Imperial Majesty to be a laudable, pious, and pious person.

Christian emperor, who in time will also let himself be instructed and fall in with the right truth. But because this trade does not only concern their electoral and princely graces, and the person, land and people of the honorable free and imperial cities, but also their souls and consciences, so that they, in the danger of the loss of their souls' salvation and damnation, they only want to persist in the strict command and word of God and be and remain Christians:

Thus their electoral and princely graces and the honorable free and imperial cities (to prevent even more serious hindrances to the honor of God, discord, and desecration in the holy empire) have appealed to Speier out of utmost necessity and not contrary to any human will. The Imperial Majesty, out of the greatest distress and not contrary to any man, nor out of any will of courage, has appealed to Speier from the most recent of the other imperial estates resolutions and decrees in this case, with the will and opinion that the same appeal should be pursued in its time, as is proper and right; as Her Imperial Majesty graciously has to hear from this instrument, in German and Latin. Which appeal we therefore herewith make to your most respectable honor in place of Imperial Majesty, our allies. Majesty, our most gracious lord, with transfer of the same appeal actis, also copies of our power, most humbly insinuated, handed over and announced; humbly requesting to attach to her Imperial Majesty the same, and to have the same published in German and Latin. Majesty's Majesty and to request that Her Majesty. without hindrance of this insinuated appeal, to all and sundry, in particular and in common, to our most gracious, gracious and favorable lords, princes and princes and the honorable cities, nothing else but all faithful obedience, peace, subservience and entreaty (as happened in the advertisement) to be completely and in all ways well provided for; that also their electoral, princely graces and the respectable cities want to live, govern and keep themselves in this way, as they trust to answer for it against God the Almighty, their Creator, and against Imperial Majesty, their most gracious and supreme Lord on earth, and that nothing may be imposed on them unreasonably.

With this, her electoral, princely graces and the respectable free and imperial cities in her Imperial Majesty's name command themselves. Majesty. protection and protection, most humbly requesting that Her Majesty will not be moved against them with some disgraces; this is what Her Electoral, Princely Grace and the honorable Free and Imperial Cities want. Grace and the honorable free and imperial cities around her Imperial Majesty, as their most gracious lord, in subservience to obedient diligence.

On account of such insinuation by our most gracious, gracious and favorable lords, princes, princes and the honorable free and imperial cities, we requisition you, Alexia Frauentraut, as notaries, that you give us ex officio one or more (and as much as their electoral and princely graces and the honorable free and imperial cities' need requires) instruments and documents. and as much of their electoral and princely graces and of the respectable free and imperial cities' necessity requires) instrument and deed you want to make, give and deliver. Which appeal was in German, as follows:

Nota: Here the Speier appellation has been indented, which is found above Cap. 11, No. 820.

(3) I, as Notary Public, have given them this answer to such a submission by the envoys: Because a few days ago I had exonerated and renounced my legation, in which I would have been completely and irrevocably appointed and ordered, for mobile reasons, I could not avoid making and giving them, the envoys or their principals, the protesting Electors, Princes, also honorable free and imperial cities, my most gracious, gracious and favorable lords, one or more instruments and documents, as much as they would be necessary.

(4) Upon such an insinuation of the appeal, also upon the subsequent requisition, the said Alexander Schwaiss further said: Although he had been ordered by Imperial Majesty to give the envoys written farewell, however, he had not been ordered to accept the insinuated appeal. Majesty to give the envoys written farewell, however, he had no order to accept the insinuated appeal. He gives the envoys leave by order of Imperial Majesty. Majesty's order, as it had been drawn up and signed by her Majesty's hand. hand; and if they had some deficiency in it, they would like to address Her Majesty themselves, and he would like to indicate this to His Imperial Majesty. Majesty. For although he has taken such an appeal into his hands, he does not wish to have it accepted by taking it into his hands, but to report it to the Imperial Majesty. Majesty. He requested and demanded that I, a notary public, make and give him one or more open instruments and documents, as much as he would be able to do so. To which I give him this answer: As much as I would be obliged to do.

(5) Then the above-mentioned Ehinger and Michel von Kaden further said: they did not doubt Imperial Majesty's leave at all. Majesty's farewell, but because he, Master Alexander, had handed it over to them, they, the envoys, acted according to their instructions, and thus did not want to take back the handed-over appeal, but laid it down on the table.

(6) These things happened at Placentia, in the presence of the aforesaid Master Alexander Schweißen, Secretary, Herberg, in the year, month, day and hour, as reported above, in the presence of Georgen von Wittich, Colniß-/Jheronmus Ebner, the Younger, of Nuremberg, Bamberg, Jörgen Zenkel, of Plankstetten, Eisteter, and Wölfen, Count of Schwatz, Brichsen diocese, as witnesses, especially required and requested.

858 Report of the envoy Michael von Kaden to the council of Nuremberg, because of the announced imperial arrest. 13 October 1529.

From Müller I. c. S. 211.

Most favorable, commanding^Herren! I hereby hasten to inform E. W. that we, the envoys, have been summoned to this date by Kais. Majest. Alexander Schweis, and found the same to be such that the Imperial Majesty will accept the mandate, a copy of which I have sent to E. W. from Lyon; in sum, we ask, desire and command that our most gracious and gracious lords, princes, princes and the honorable cities, if this does not happen on the mandate that has gone out, shall again accept the Speier farewell. Thereupon the farewell rests, containing long words: that one is well inclined to help the Turks 2c. Upon such farewell we have, according to our order, most humbly insinuated the appeal to the secretary Alexander, in place of the imperial majesty, for the reason that he is to accept the farewell. Majesty, for the reason that he has opened the parting to us, and served the appeal on him before notaries, in Kornra, as the actus is due, and E. W. has heard from our relation. W. from our relation. Alexander, badly frightened, protests: he has no order about it, does not want to accept the appeal, we should go to the Emperor 2c. We left him the Acta and went away. So he ran to court to report this to the Emperor. Majesty. And while we are still sitting at home and deliberating about it, and where to go for security and war in the country, Master Alexander Schwais comes with notaries and witnesses, sits in our inn and asks for our three; he has an order to tell them from Imperial Majesty. Majesty to tell them. But I supposed that he would protest that the Imperial Majesty would not allow the appeal. Majesty did not want to defer the appeal. 2c..

1) This is "Kölnischen [Bisthums]".

So I went out of the house. Alexander was waiting for Alexium Frauentraut and Hansen Ehinger, whom I had warned before, at home, and they were waiting for me for a long time. But I had some business and did not come home, so it was dark and night. He has reported to the two of them before the notary that His Imperial Majesty is having them arrested. Majesty has them imprisoned, to remain in the inn, and not to leave it in case of loss of life, limb and goods, nor to send some writings or messengers from themselves to our lords, or else by ourselves or other people; and he, Alexander, wants to wait for me until midnight, if I come, it is good, if I do not come, he wants to report my disobedience to the Imperial Majesty. Majesty. These tales are told to me by my servant; I have considered it good to report such a case to E. W. in a custody and secret letter, before I would be forbidden to write, like the other two. I am yet in doubt how to do him. I cannot leave the city this night; so I worry, if they keep me at the gates without this, I can do even less tomorrow; so it is bad to hide from an emperor in a foreign city, and to come badly from the country. If then I am to be disobedient, I must be before the Emperor's Majesty. Majesty. If I am to go to prison as a free man, not a prisoner, then it hurts, and no one knows what scorn may befall one with so many priests. In sum, I fear I shall go to my fellows; they would have me come shortly, lest, as they think, I should trouble them with my evasion. If I were in Parma or Milan, I would not come; but I must, I fear, for the sake of others; God help that it may come with grace. E. W. also know that Margrave Johann Albrecht has been ordered to a post by Imperial Majesty. Majesty to post in one or two days, together with that of Waldkirch, to post from estates to estates, to work for help, [there] are many letters of credence written. Whether this deal was made because the Emperor's request and the promises of the Estates were made before the protesting Estates were aware of our departure, is a matter for E. W. to consider. But I consider it necessary to be mindful of the imperial request for our farewell and how we are to be dealt with, and to act accordingly. I have still not yet caught the opportunity to inform E. W. and other protesters of this, and in a hurry I hereby want to discover it as quickly as possible, and have delivered such a letter this evening to a Venetian messenger who safely escorted us yesterday, and have hurriedly sent it to Venice to Hans Fuwrer, without having to send a messenger and incur costs.

and to send this letter to you with haste by your own messenger. Date Placenzia, 13 Octobris, at the third hour of the night, Anno 1529.

willing servant Michel of Cadan.

In Müller 1. e. p. 214 and in Lünig's Reichs-Archiv, xart. A6n. eont. II. p. 332.

Before you, Mr. Notary Public, we, Hans Ehinger and Michel von Kaden, appear as envoys of the most illustrious 2c. Princes N., respectable free and imperial cities N., and show you: After we yesterday, the 13th of Octobris, in the morning, by kais. Maj. command, by Master Alexander Schweiß, on our action, of our most gracious, gracious Lords, Princes, Princes and of the respectable cities protesting against the Speirian farewell, a decree and farewell was opened, in which we found ourselves complained of on account of our Lords. According to the same we provoke and appeal on behalf of our lords, from such decree and farewell and to a free common Christian concilium, or where the matters belong, to the first, second and third; diligently, diligently and most diligently asking of you, Mr. Notari, A. postolos testimonialss, with reservation of our lords necessity and will, to extendir, increase, diminish, prosequir or drop this provocation and appeal according to their demand, according to all their occasion. Therefore we, the envoys, aã outslain this Provocation thus with diligence want interponirt, over it publicly protest and request; and requirir you, Mr. Notari, ex officio, to set up for us one or more instruments over it in rnsliori korina. The envoys have also requested that the Notari Imperial. Majest. Majesty's will to put notice and answer in the instrument, which the Notary will grant. Actum the 14th day of October, at the fourth hour after noon, anno 2c. thousand five hundred and in the ninth and twentieth year.

60 Two petitions of the envoys to the emperor for the release of their arrest.

In Müller 1. e. p. 216.

First Supplication. Between the 13th "nd 21st of October 1529.

Most Sublime, Most Magnificent, Most Gracious Emperor! Your Imperial Majesty's Majesty's imperial farewell, given to our most gracious and gracious lords, princes, and honorable free and imperial cities, we heard last day in submission, and found so much in our most gracious, gracious lords and honorable cities' written instruction that we must, by the same order, initiate the appeal lodged at Speier against the same farewell; as we have also done in all submissiveness, with the entreaty that your imperial Majesty, without hindrance, will not be prevented from taking the matter up. Majesty, without hindrance of such appeal, to our most gracious, gracious lords and honorable cities, nothing less of all obedience, submissiveness, peace, unity, and offering, as your Imperial Majesty was told at first. Majesty at the outset, and have issued to Your Majesty a German and Latin Secretariat. Secretariat a German and Latin appeal letter.

We have, however, at your Imperial Majesty's Majesty, we have immediately initiated the appeal from Speier alone, and have not appealed; and whoever informs Your Imperial Majesty otherwise has informed wrongly. Majesty otherwise, he has informed wrongly, as evidenced by the insinuated acts, which are given to the hand of the Secretary, Alexander Schweiß.

After all, Your Imperial Majesty. Majesty. Secretarius came, and indicated to us by order of your Majesty to remain in the hostel, not to come out of it, not to write behind him 2c., until further orders of your Majesty.

Thereupon we give your Imperial Majesty, our most gracious Lord Majesty, our most gracious Lord, that we, as envoys and obligated servants, will do nothing other than what our most gracious Lords, Princes, Princes, and the honorable cities have ordered and instructed in writing, as, without doubt, your Imperial Majesty's servants must do according to the same order. Servants must also do according to the same order.

Since we then by order alone insinuate a lawful appeal, which has been interposed at Speier, as the imperial rights permit, in the most submissive manner, and your imperial Majesty has thereby received all obedience from our most gracious Majesty. Majesty all obedience from our most gracious Majesty, offered to the gracious lords and the honorable cities, and as gladly as pious, honorable sent messages want to do, also to Your Imperial Majesty. Majesty. Majesty's command and obediently, as Michel von Kaden did when he was sent to your Imperial Majesty. Majesty. Majesty's command, and that his fellow relatives had been arrested, went freely and willingly from his business to the inn, into such obedient arrest and detention. Majesty will graciously consider and count our long silence and innocence free to our most gracious Electors, Princes and honorable cities; or, if we would be otherwise disparaged, that we know ourselves innocent, let us come to a personal gracious interrogation. Such mercy from your Imperial Majesty Majesty, we want to praise our most gracious and gracious lords, princes and princes, also the respectable cities, and obediently earn it for ourselves in all submissiveness. Hereupon hoping for gracious decision.

Ew. kais. Majest.

of the Electors, Princes, honorable and free Imperial Cities Envoys.

Second Supplication. The 21st of October 1529.

Most Sublime, Most Great Emperor, Most Gracious Lord! Now that we have entered the ninth day 1) of the Emperor's visit. Majesty. Majesty's command, we lie arrested in the hostel with heavy costs, perhaps because your Imperial Majesty, of our concern Majesty, of our concern, may have been moved to disgrace against us on unequal report. But if we have ever done nothing else than what we have to do as poor obligated servants by order of our most gracious, gracious and favorable masters, as we can prove with our instructions and authority, then we most humbly request that Your Imperial Majesty will graciously grant us the right to use the power of attorney. Majesty may graciously allow us to go home, or have us brought to interrogation, so that we may be released and bring the decision given to your Imperial Majesty to our most gracious, gracious and favourable lords; and in such a case of their electoral, princely graces themselves persons, also

The Imperial Grand Chamberlain, the Grasen of Nassau, Answer to the Protesting Princes, Princes, and Cities.

Most Serene and Serene, Highborn Elector, Princes and Lords, and Honourable, Prudent and Wise! Your churfürstl. And F. G. and you, be my most willing and kind service and greeting beforehand. Most gracious and gracious lords and good friends! Your churfürstl. und fürstl. I have received and understood your letter from their embassies, Hansen Ehinger, Alexien Frauentraut, and Michael von Kaden, according to necessity and good measure; and although I did not have much desire to take on these matters for the reason of some things reported in their letter besides your Electoral and Royal Highnesses and you, 2) nevertheless, your Electoral and Royal Highnesses, and also you, to your honour, service, and favour, and also for your honor, service and favor, and so that these envoys of theirs would not be delayed here, so I have applied to the Emperor, our most gracious Maj. Maj., our most gracious lord, for their dispatch to the best, which they have also received from her Maj. as your Electoral and Imperial Highnesses and you will hear from them. So I have also for the sake of your Lord and Lady and you subsequently, as the said their messages, after receipt of such of their clearance, proclaimed an appeal in such a way that their Majesty may not have any gracious favor (which then, where I have reported such of their order beforehand, I have done by me).

2) This is aimed at Landgrave Philip of Hesse, who for this reason is also omitted in the inscription of this letter. Compare Document No. 829, s 12 z. E. and No. 830 in the penultimate paragraph. Nuremberg is also meant. See No. 863, s 3.

thus that, nevertheless, your Electorate and your F. G. and your order should have been complied with by them, and their request should have been accepted without hesitation for your gracious favor), have requested, asked and received from Her Majesty so much for the most submissive that Her Majesty will release them from their arrest, which they will let them do in their hostel for this reason, and that they may dispose of them again to Your Electorate and Your F. G. and to you. has granted her Majesty's most gracious permission to release her from her arrest, which she had therefore ordered to be carried out in her hometown, and to allow her to return to her Majesty and to you, and to report to her Majesty of her most gracious good will, even for a short time in the future, which she has undertaken for her in the Holy Kingdom of the German Nation. But 1) Her Majesty, Michael of Kaden, has ordered to bring a booklet, I do not know what, which he has handed over to Her Majesty, but 2) not to leave Her Majesty's Court without Her Majesty's permission and until further notice, 3) for which Michael, although he has not yet earned it for me, I nevertheless, together with other of my good friends, have ordered Her Majesty to send him the booklet and the other two, and most faithfully, but nevertheless, until now, not otherwise than that he may have attained succession to Bononia [Bologna], or by other order of her Majesty. For the sake of the German nation, which I am inclined to love and serve, I will gladly do my utmost in the future. That I do not wish to let E. churfürstl. and F. G. and you, in service and friendly good opinion, on their letter to me, again, go unreported. Date at Parma, on the 30th day of Octobre, Anno 2c. in the 29th year.

Heinrich, Grast zu Nassau, Margrave zu Zenete, Count zu Katzenelnbogen, Vianden und Zied, Lord zu Breda, Diest und Grymbergen 2c. H. G. z. Nassau.

To the most illustrious and noble, highborn princes and lords, Mr. Johannsen, Duke of Saxony, Archmarshall and Elector of the Holy Roman Empire, Mr. Georgen, Margrave of Brandenburg, Mr. Ernsten and Mr. Franciscen, brothers, Dukes of Brunswick and Lüneburg, and Mr. Wolfgang, Prince of Anhalt, my most gracious and gracious lords; and the honorable, prudent and wise mayors and councillors of the free and imperial cities of Strasbourg, Ulm, Costnitz, Nördlingen, and others related to them.

Of Alexander Sweat, Imperial Seeretarii, Answer to the Protesting Electors), Princes and cities.

Most Serene and Illustrious, Highborn, Elector, Princes and Lords, and Honourable, Prudent and Wise Dear Lords and Good Friends! To your churfürstl. and F. G. and W. my quite subservient, benevolent and friendly service with all faithful diligence before. Most gracious and gracious princes and lords, and dear lords and good friends! Your churfürstl. and F. G. and W. letter, at Hansen Ehinger, Alexien Frauentraut and Michaeln von Kaden to me, in which they report how they have received the letter to kaiserl. Maj., my most gracious lord, their messages, to indicate their reasons why they have been included in the farewell, so at the next Imperial Diet held at Speier, by her Imperial Maj. Maj. governor, orator, commissaries, also electors, princes and other estates of the holy empire, my most gracious, gracious and favorable lords, so far as the cause of our holy Christian faith is concerned, may not have healed nor approved; with the gracious request and entreaty that I may have such E. and F. G. also W.'s action to her Majesty, and that the aforementioned have their messages in favorable order, so that they may be dispatched to her Majesty with the most gracious answer 2c. I have received and heard them humbly and willingly, and have reported them to E. churfürstl. and F. G. also to W. Envoy of her Majesty; whereupon also her Maj. graciously granted them an audience, and subsequently, for the best possible benefit of their then present, many, considerable other affairs, dispatched them, and had their answer given to them by me in writings, signed by Her Majesty herself; just as the Electors and F. G. will also hear from the same of their envoys. Now, however, as the aforementioned your Elector and King have also given messages to W., after receiving such of their reply, that they have given me, as the one who would have delivered such to them by imperial order, the message that I have received from them. Maj. had ordered them to do so, that they announce the appeal to me: then E. churfürstl. and F. G. can also graciously and favorably judge that I, if I had not received an order from Kaiserl. Maj., it was not proper for me to accept it, and that I should not do less, nor could I do less, than to help the Imperial Maj. to make its presentation beneficial. Maj.'s request to the best of my ability, and that Michael von Kaden, as I have been informed, immediately thereafter

I have received an order from the Emperor himself, who had handed over a booklet, in which I was to tell them not to leave their inn without her Majesty's permission, and where they should continue to stay, which, God knows, was heartily repugnant to me. But I did not discharge myself from this by my most humble and most submissive request, but, since I had previously dealt with them in this matter by their Imperial Maj. Maj.'s command and who thus had knowledge, I had to do so obediently as a servant. As I have no doubt that E. churfürstl. and F. G. also W. are well able to judge this: therefore, I inform E. churfürstl. and F. G. also W. humbly and favourably that, if my gracious Prince and Lord of Nassau, Margrave of Zenetes, or I, have reported such to E. churfürstl. and F. G. also W., I will do so. and W.'s order had been reported somewhat beforehand, that I have no doubt that his F. G. would have judged all things to such good effect that E. churfürstl. and F. G.'s order would nevertheless have been carried out, and that this of their entanglement would have been without necessity; wherefore I have also reported this to his F. G., and where further need and good would have made me think of it, I would have held his hand faithfully. But now like this: The said my gracious Lord of Nassau, together with other friends of his F. G. whom she has taken, has nevertheless done the best for the honour, service and favour of the Elector and F. G. and W., of which I have also faithfully reminded her of my fortune, so much so that her F. G. has requested of her Maj. that the two envoys of your Elector and F. G. and W., Ehinger and Frauentraut, have been released from their arrest; but her Maj. has not yet wanted to release Kaden, as all this E. Elector and F. G. and W. will hear from the aforementioned two of their embassies at length. Hope nevertheless, on the gracious and faithful diligence, which I do not doubt, my gracious lord of Nassau will continue to do in the matter, and that I will have his F. G. and the lord of Grandvelle, kais. Maj. Councillor, as he has given them this last farewell of their settlement and stay, with further appendix, as far as each one is concerned, in my presence, in the presence of all E. Electoral and F. G. also W. three envoys themselves, submissively and diligently requested that they want to have the said Kaden graciously and for the best ordered here, that his cause may also be brought to a good end with the Emperor. Maj. still attained and brought. Whereupon also, that it be done, no diligence nor effort shall be spared on me of my small fortune, without doubt, that I shall be able to give E. all Electorate and

F. G. and W. would also do me a pleasant service and favour; humbly and favourably requesting that E. churfürstl. and F. G. also W. graciously and favourably excuse me of that which I have had to do as a servant in this, as reported above. For inasmuch as I may serve them humbly and acceptably and prove love and friendship, E. churfürstl. and F. G. also W., to whom I hereby, as my most gracious and gracious dear lord, and favourable lords and friends, shall command me humbly and favourably, shall find me quite willing of it. Date at Parma, on the 30th day of October, Anno 2c. in the 29th year.

E. churf. and F. G. and W. quite subservient and good-willed Alexander Schweiß.

To the most illustrious, noble, highborn princes and lords, Herr Johannsen, Duke of Saxony, Elector 2c., Mr. Georgen, Margrave of Brandenburg, Mr. Ernten and Mr. Franciscen, brothers, Dukes of Brunswick and Luneburg, Mr. Philipsen, Landgrave of Hesse, and Mr. Wolfgangen, Prince of Anhalt, my most gracious and gracious lords.; and the honorable, prudent and wise mayors and councillors of the free and imperial cities of Strasbourg, Nuremberg, Ulm, Costnitz, Nördlingen, Memmingen, and others of their relatives in this matter, my special dear lords and friends.

862. by the margraval chancellor of Brandenburg, Georg Vogler, in which it is explained how great injustice has been done to the Protestant envoys by the imperial arrest.

In Hortleber, vol. I, lib. I, eap. 6, p. 46, and from it in Müller 1. o. lib. II, eux. 21, § 5, S. 318.

Causes, why the protesting Princes, Princes and Estates of the Conflict, in which by Imperial Maj. their Envoys, on happened most submissive Report of said Estates Protestation and Appeal against and from the Imperial Treaty at Speier, Anno 1529, also on Insinuation of such Appeal, have been taken, to complain justly, ded	by	Mr.	Georg	Vogler,	Margraval	Chancellor	of	Brandenburg,	Anno	1529.

(1) At the recent Diet at Speier, the Estates of the Empire, under the appearance and authority of Imperial Majesty, undertook to act and conclude in matters of the Word of God concerning our faith and religion. Maj. to act and conclude in matters of God's word concerning our faith and religion, about which they were duly warned by some of the imperial estates, and more than one good reason was given why this was not proper for them. And notwithstanding all this, they have continued in their proceedings, and have made a supposed resolution and agreement, which the Christian estates reported before them have accepted in all articles, outside of the matters of our faith reported; but as far as the articles of faith are concerned, they have publicly protested against it in writings, not to consent to it for many important reasons, as they have written in the long protestation and the appeal that has been made 1) for necessity, and without necessity to report it again here.

(2) And that the Imperial Majesty may not have cause to think 2. And in order that the Imperial Maj. should not have cause to think, on the unequal report of some imperial estates which are repugnant to the Holy Gospel, as if the aforesaid protesting Christian estates were withdrawing from his Maj. and the Holy Empire's obedience, and were not obeying without reason and equity that which had been unanimously decided by others at the Imperial Diet held, or wished to live by it, the same Christian estates have dispatched their embassies to travel to Imperial Maj. in Hispania, which her Maj. has also entered at Genoa, and to inform her Maj. of the occasion of the Imperial Diet held there. The same Christian estates have dispatched their embassies to travel to Imperial Maj. in Hispania, which their Maj. also entered at Genoa, and to their Maj. on the occasion of the Imperial Diet, and why it was not proper for the protesting estates, without injury to their souls and consciences, also without the highest burden on their land and people, to accept this parting of the aforementioned article, and why it is also not proper for the estates to recognize therein, with the humble request that they be inclined to accept such parting in all other articles. That they also surrender their bodies, lands, people, possessions, and goods to their Imperial Majesty, whom they have in sole possession. Maj. whom they have recognized in this alone as their rightful, united Lord and Emperor, without any means, so that Her Maj. shall be powerful in all these things. What in these matters of faith is also discussed by an orderly, Christian, free concilium (to which such matters belong) by means of the divine word, that one accepts this without any hindrance, and in no way wants to separate from the Christian church, as the obedient members of the same, or wants to separate. How then the most submissive responsibility, submission, and inheritance of the Christian estates are to be accepted?

offer through their envoys to the Imperial Maj. Maj. orally and in writing in the German, Latin and French languages, for necessity.

(3) Although the protesting estates have now appealed to this subservient, friendly, and for their sake quite necessary act of Imperial Majesty, they have not yet been able to do so. Maj. as their rightful lord, nothing else but a gracious answer, decision and dispatch of their embassies, nevertheless their envoys have been given a somewhat rough, unforeseen and burdensome farewell, and have been delivered in writings, in the safe opinion that their Maj. 2) have again earnestly commanded that the same protesting estates of the empire are to accept the drafted farewell and resolution at Speier forthwith 2c., as then such a farewell (which, however, has not yet been sent or delivered to the estates to this day) undoubtedly indicates in a long opinion.

4th Thereupon the envoys (according to their received order) have sent Magister Alexander Schweiß, kais. Maj. secretary, who opened and read to them the parting in kais. Maj. name and read it to them, delivered and left the protesting estates to appeal by means of a publicly instrumented libell.

(5) However, the causes which moved the same estates to file their appeal are sufficiently expressed in the instrument of appeal, and according to necessity, in such a way that anyone, even of little reason, can conclude from it that the protesters had a great reason and appearance to refuse the imperial decree in this matter, and, as the complainants, to appeal from it.

(6) When the envoys had carried out their order and then wished to leave Italy again, they were imprisoned by the said M[eister] Alexander Schweiß, Imperial Secretary, in the presence of notaries and witnesses, in their lodgings, and condemned not to come out of it without the knowledge of Imperial Majesty. Maj. not to come out of it, likewise in case of loss of life and limb, by themselves or others, neither in writing nor orally, not to announce anything about it to their masters 2c.

(7) This is (how manly, even friends and enemies can consider) an ungracious, burdensome and clumsy act, and quite frightful to hear that the Roman Emperor's Majesty, the Holy Roman Emperor, is not to be expected to do this. Maj.

2) These speech marks are put by us instead of the brackets which are often used in old prints to emphasize something.

by those who live around her Maj. and who are not only opposed to Christian, true religion, but also to all equality and equity) shall be moved to such disgrace and burdensome action; for the following reasons:

(8) First of all, this matter, which the envoys have requested and ordered Imperial Majesty to advertise, is not a vexatious, unfriendly act. Maj. had orders to solicit, is not a disagreeable, unfriendly, or such an act, thereby attacking the Imperial Maj. in her sovereignty, or seeking some rebellion or disobedience, but (as reported) a submissive act. Maj. in her Highness attacked, or some rebellion or disobedience sought, but (as reported) a subservient denunciation, apology, and responsibility, by which the Imperial. Maj. of the protesting estates, and to her Maj.'s own honor and glory, in which the Christian estates also offer themselves to her Maj. for such willing obedience and submissiveness, and also otherwise so Christian for the sake of their faith, that the Imperial Maj. will give her no cause for any disobedience. Maj. may not derive from this any cause of disfavor and such quick, 2) inconsiderate action.

(9) Secondly, the Imperial Majesty is our, and especially the protesting imperial estates, ordinary lord, emperor and sovereign. Our Majesty, and especially of the protesting estates of the empire, is the ordinary lord, emperor and sovereign, and therefore, out of the duties of his imperial office, he is obligated to treat the members and estates of the empire, as his maj. relatives and subjects, with all loyalty, to hear them graciously and in an emergency in their complaints and concerns, to protect and shield them from all unreasonable and infallible burdens, and also to give them his imperial assistance against all violence and injustice. Not less than the subjects are obliged to all obedience, subservience and submission to her Majesty in all ways.

(10) Now, however, with imperial maj. Maj. their own highest enemies, Turks, pagans and Jews, also others, are heard in their legation and advertisement. With what fairness or good grace then can it be justified that the most prominent imperial estates, from princes, princes and cities, envoys are not to be heard, but their legation is to be carried out in such a way that [that] without doubt these same estates, of their hope, would be tolerated by common Christianity's hereditary enemy, the Turk 3).

011 Thirdly, her majesty's ambassadors, which before this time came from Hispania to some

1) In Walch's old edition: "be", which seems to be a printing oversight, instead of: his (-are).

2) "raschen" put by us instead of: "rischen".

3) "Tolerate" here seems to be in the meaning of "exalted".

The Imperial Estates for help, let themselves be heard with loud words, that her Maj. was approached with a belief, as some of the Imperial Estates let themselves be heard: as if her Maj.'s mind and opinion was, when her Maj. came into the Empire, that she wanted to act with force and tyranny against some Imperial Estates 2c., that her Majesty bears a noticeable grievance and displeasure; for her Majesty's mind, will, and opinion are not at all disposed to a mighty, serious, or tyrannical action, but are directed to behave as a mild, gracious Emperor towards his Majesty's subjects in an entirely fatherly and gracious manner, and to hold them in such a way that they shall have much more cause to love than to fear her Majesty.

(12) Whether this action of her Majesty compares with such a gracious offer; whether the Christian estates should not be justly appalled that her Majesty, as soon as she has set foot out of her kingdom into the empire and has not yet reached Germany, should show herself in such a way; and whether they do not have to worry about an ungracious emperor, for their part quite undeservedly, from these preliminary beginnings, can be judged by anyone who understands.

(13) Fourthly, the Imperial Majesty has committed and sworn. In the receipt and election of her royal dignities, her Majesty has committed, obligated, and confirmed with an oath against the Elector in place of the common imperial estates: that her Majesty will not rape any of the imperial estates for herself, nor will she permit others to do so, but will allow each estate, where it may suffer due justice, to remain with the same, also in due hearing and equity, and will order others to do so.

Item 14: That Her Majesty have and hold her royal residence, estate and court in the Holy Roman Empire of the German Nation for the benefit and good of all members, estates and subjects of the same.

Item 15: That her Majesty will not fill and provide her royal and imperial offices at court and in the realm with any other nation than born Germans, who are not of low standing nor nature, but true, honest people, of princes, counts, lords, of the nobility, and otherwise of valiant good stock. 2c.

(16) Now it is evident that the Christian protesting estates in this matter of theirs, for which reason they have sent their message to Imperial Majesty, desire and seek nothing else than proper and necessary interrogation. Maj., do not desire and seek anything else than a proper and necessary interrogation, and may also almost well suffer a right and proper discussion.

(17) They were not the least moved in their protestations and appeals that the estates of the realm should presume, in this most excellent great matter, which concerns the honor and word of God, as well as the consciences and souls of men, in which they may by no means be judges, to make a resolution and a decision, without all previous examination of the right reason, even without sufficient experience of the truth; as would be just and right even in the smallest matters and affairs.

(18) Thus it is evident that Imperial Majesty has never had her residence in the Holy Empire. Maj. has never had her residence in the Holy Empire from the time of her first Imperial Diet at Worms, and may not have it as soon as possible: shall the embassies of the Imperial Estates, where they are to be sent in honor of Her Maj. and to indicate a submissive obedience, be sent so far, with noticeable danger and expense, and act in a way that may promote the harmony of common Christianity and the empire, and also*) the sent ones be dispatched in such a way that it would be quite burdensome for all imperial estates to hear from their proper right head and superior.

(19) Moreover, it is irrefutable that the most distinguished offices of the imperial court are mostly occupied by Hispanic or other nations. Moreover, it is irrefutable that the noblest offices of the imperial court are mostly occupied by Hispanic or other nations, who are not only ignorant of the German and Latin tongues, but who are also ignorant of the opportunity, need, and essence of the Holy Empire and the German Nation. Whether now the imperial estates, where they have to act out of their necessity before Imperial Maj. Maj. to act out of their necessity, is not more disadvantageous than advantageous to be expected from this, can be considered by everyone.

(20) But the most burdensome and unequal thing is that this trade, the holy gospel, affecting our religion and conscience, where it comes to the imperial majesty, is only or mostly with the bishops or clergy, who are at the imperial majesty's disposal. Maj. alone, or in each case for the most part, with the bishops or clergy, who are the highest, most distinguished and most respected in the Imperial Maj. the highest, most distinguished, and most respectable, and who alone are inclined to preserve the papal see at Rome with its appendages, as well as the public abuses that have so far flowed from there and are in evidence everywhere in the church, should be consulted, mediated, and discussed; since they themselves, for the reasons indicated, are parties, counselors, judges, and arbiters, and therefore justly highly suspicious. That now the Emperor. Maj. as a pious, sincere emperor, who undoubtedly wished to see things well, should have been induced by the same people to such an unkind and extensive action, which would have been contrary to their

1) Here we have deleted "that".

Maj. with friends and enemies may not be caused to small calumny, contempt, and disparagement, that is to be highly complained of in many ways.

(21) Fifthly, the protesting estates have not appealed from Imperial Majesty's sentence or decree. Majesty's Sentence, Order, or Leave, and have made such an appeal to Imperial Majesty himself. Majesty himself. From this every one may again note what a burdensome act it is that the judge before whom, and not from whom, an appeal is made, should accept for arrest the messages which the same appeal from a command implies. Her Majesty has not previously seen the acts and instruments of appeal, and has no knowledge of the causes and motions of such appeals, whether founded or not.

22) In the sixth place, the order and instruction of the protesting estates, which the envoys have handed over to the imperial majesty in the three witnesses on their behalf, clearly shows what motivated these estates to protest and not to approve the imperial treaty. Majesty in the three witnesses, clearly show what moved these estates to protest and not approve the imperial treaty. The same causes, however, are so important and respectable that any man who has reason must conclude from this that the protesting estates had at least a great pretense, glimpses, and reason, even though the same movements should not have been justified in protesting and appealing. From this also the Imperial Majesty might have found so much. Majesty might have found so much from this that she would have refrained from such an action against the envoy.

23) Seventhly, although this protestation of the estates and their envoys has neither cause nor appearance, and should be the most unskilful, yet it is against all public, human, imperial, and papal rights to act against the envoy, who is made in a legation to the imperial majesty as our lord. Majesty, as the Lord of us all, to act in this way. For the same rights are quite clear that all legates are free in all places, have assurance and opening, and are in no way to be arrested or encumbered.

(24) Eighthly, it is a great nuisance and somewhat disgraceful to hear that the Imperial Majesty has based her departure, which she has announced in writs, on an order that should have been sent by Her Majesty beforehand. Majesty has based her departure, which she has announced to the envoys in writs, on an order that should have been sent by Her Majesty to the Imperial Estates beforehand, yet none of the protesters has received or been notified of the same Imperial order or mandate. The same imperial command or mandate has not yet been sent, transmitted, or proclaimed to any of the protesters. Therefore the estates may again excuse themselves in these matters of all inequity.

25 And even if the same imperial order and command were to be opened to the protesting estates, it would still have been done first after their protest and appeal. The same estates would not have been obliged to accept such a command any less than the imperial estates' resolution and agreement, for many excellent, important reasons, of which one could do a great deal. And if there were no other than this in view, that the protesters, if they should accept such an imperial command, would have to act publicly against their conscience and the salvation of their souls, to which, however, no man of some temporal power on earth should always allow himself to be compelled, because the same farewell is capable of just that which the Estates' resolution and farewell holds: it would be more than complete and sufficient in the sight of God and the whole world to deny such a farewell and imperial decree by the proper, permitted means of appeal, which the imperial rights themselves prescribe.

26 In sum, the protesting estates recognize all of them and especially the imperial majesty. Majesty. for their right natural lord, and by God decreed emperor and sovereignty, to whom they also offer and submit themselves with their bodies, lands and people to all obedience, assistance and subservience; But that Her Majesty, by affirmation of the imperial estates, would also submit to be lord over their faith, souls and consciences in some way, or to command them to accept something by which they should deviate from the truth, act contrary to their consciences, and anger God as a Lord: that would be going too far, and God would have taken hold of the rule and sovereignty without means, who has reserved to Him all power and jurisdiction in this matter, and has left to no man on earth even the least power in this matter; as the Prophet says: Ooslum oosli Domino, tsrrurn ankern äsäit UIÜ8 Uorninnrn: Heaven and what is spiritual, God, the Heavenly HErr, has reserved, but what is earthly, He has commanded to earthly men alone. Neither is any man obliged to obey the emperor, nor any other rulers of the earth therein; for in that case, as the Scripture saith, it behooves God more than men to obey him.

27 For these causes told, in whole or in part, one can now complain of this trade to the highest, and so that masculine may find of it too much great, extensive, and unmistakable inconvenience.

863. the narrative of the whole action of their legation, set forth in writing by the envoys.

From Hortleder, tom. I, lib. I, eux. 7, x. 49.

Relation or Report of the Protesting Princes, Princes, and Estates Envoys to Imperial Majesty what they have reported the protest and appeal of the Speier Imperial Treaty Anno 1529 partly to Imperial Majesty and partly also to the same. Majesty, partly also insinuated to the same, but thereupon taken into arrest, however, finally discharged and dispatched. Anno 1529.

1st First Hans Ehinger and Alexius Frauentraut came to Placentia on the 7th day of September, and had to leave the other their fellow deputy, Michael von Kaden, due to weakness of his body, at Genoa, and then on the 9th day of September to the Grand Chancellor, now Cardinals 2c, the von Nassau, M. Alexander Schweiß and Alphonso Waldes, both Imperial Majesties. Majest. Secretaries, at Placentia their Letters of Credence, and requested them to apply to the Imperial Majesty with graciousness. Majesty with gracious audience and dispatch to promote them, who answered them as follows, viz:

The Grand Chancellor said: His F. Grace wants to announce them, the envoys, to the Emperor. Majesty, request an audience, and give them further notice.

The answer of Nassau was: The Landgrave of Hesse always wanted to make him a Solicitor, which was not convenient for his Grace; so the Nurembergers did not want his Grace to promote them, nor the Landgrave. There were many Germans who were not much good, although he was also a German; however, he wanted to do to the other princes, princes and cities what they would like; they, the envoys, would like to attribute this to their elector and his grace, as well as to the others.

4 M[eister] Alexander Schweiß thus answered: because his lord, the one of Nassau, was at odds with the Landgrave, and the ones of Nuremberg did not want to let his lord, M. Alexander, follow what the Imperial Majesty had given them. Majesty had given them, he did not intend to solicit much from either of them; however, he did not want the other estates to pay anything.

5 Secretarius Alphonsus Waldes has offered much to promote, and helped Hans Ehinger and Alexio Frauentraut at first before the Grand Chancellor.

6 Likewise Wilhelm de Rolle, kais. Majest. Hofmeister, on the handed over Credenz-letter, which the nobles have had signed over to him, since the other Grand Chamberlain in Hispania is dead, also to do good will and support with the Imperial Majesty.

(7) On the 10th and 11th day of September, the two deputies again made every effort, and approached the Grand Chancellor, the von Nassau, and the others, Court Master and Secretaries, and asked them to support them, so that they would be heard most graciously by Imperial Majesty. Majesty, and that they be again graciously and well dealt with. They have all offered to do so, except for the one from Nassau, who answered: His F. G. had said before that he did not want to get involved in any matter involving the Landgrave and Nuremberg, and he would leave it at that.

(8) And after the envoys had thus stopped daily, the Imperial Majesty had M. Alexander Schweißen announce to them on September 11 that her Majesty wished to hear them on Sunday, September 12, at an early hour of the day; and therefore they should make themselves so skilful as to hand over the trade to her Imperial Majesty in writing, and not delay her Majesty with many words, for her Majesty had so many excellent things in her hands that it would be quite inconvenient for her Majesty to hold a long oral hearing. Majesty in writing, and not to delay Her Majesty with many words, for Her Majesty has so many excellent things under her hands that it would be quite inconvenient for Her Majesty to hear a long oral presentation.

(9) So on the same Sunday morning the two deputies rode with M. Alexander Schweißen to court and appeared before Her Majesty's Chamber. Chamber, where again their Imperial Majesty told them through the above-mentioned M. Alexander Schweißen that they were to be allowed to vote. Majesty told them through the aforementioned M. Alexander Schweißen: they should hand over their action in writing and not tease Her Majesty long with words. Thereupon the envoys offered to present the deal verbally in the shortest possible time and to hand over their order in writing.

(10) Thereupon they were brought before Her Majesty, and were graciously interrogated by Her Majesty in the presence of the Marquis of Ancisa, both Bishops of Osina and Palenta, together with M. Alexander, Her Majesty's Secretary, who was especially required for this purpose. Majesty their letter of credence with due reverence, as befits them, and at the same time they have expressed their graciousness to Her Imperial Majesty. Majesty's most gracious, gracious and favorable lords, the electors, princes, also honorable free and imperial cities, from which they have been dispatched, most humbly offered, also further indicated: Their Electoral and Imperial G., and the others, have ordered two of them, besides Michael of Kaden, who, due to weakness of his body, must remain back there in Genoa, to give their Imperial Majesty the following orders. Majesty the following opinion, as their most gracious lord, which content was presented to Imperial Majesty by Alexium Frauentraut. Majesty by Alexium Frauentraut, as follows harmlessly, namely:

11. 11. It would be unknown to Her Imperial Majesty what controversial articles of divine doctrine have taken place for some time in German and other countries. Which doctrine has been accepted in part by some estates and their subjects, and contested by others (whose subjects were, and still are, most eager for it), from which much error, strife, and disagreement has arisen. For which reason Her Imperial Majesty Majesty appointed and announced a Diet at Speier in the year 1526 to avert such opposition. At this Diet, all the estates of the Empire unanimously and unanimously considered it to be good, necessary and convenient, and proposed that a common, free, Christian council or national assembly be held as soon as possible, with the resolution that in the meantime each estate would live, govern and hold itself with its subjects as it hoped and dared to answer to God and Her Majesty; with the indication that at that time for the preservation of peace and unity in the realm no better nor more tolerable way could have been conceived nor found. Such a treaty would also have been unanimously agreed upon and sealed by all the estates, and at the same time it would have been especially spoken and promised that nothing would be done or allowed to be done against the same imperial treaty, the content of the printed imperial treaty enclosed herewith.

Item: This 29th year, Her Majesty has again appointed an Imperial Diet at Speier, with notification to act, deliberate, and decide on the future Concilio and other necessities of the Empire. Therefore, their most gracious and gracious lords, the churons and princes, attended the same Imperial Diet in their own persons, and had the other honorable free and imperial cities attended by their noble embassy, in the opinion that everything that serves first of all the glory of God, his holy word, the preservation of good peace and the noble welfare of their Imperial Majesty and of the Empire, is to be done in the name of the Holy Spirit. Majesty and the Empire, to seek and promote.

But such a thing would not have taken place; but some estates would have pretended and wanted to say as if the previous Speierian imperial treaty in the 26th year should have been somewhat misunderstood, and therefore misused; that, however, their most gracious,

The fact that the gracious and favorable lords of their part have not been confessed, and would not yet be, they also know for certain that they would not have acted against the same parting of their part, and would not again be against it, nor do so; but would in the meantime keep to the granted concilii, live and govern thus, as they hoped and trusted to answer for it against God and their Majesty. And even if a misunderstanding would have arisen with some from such a departure, still their chur- and princely graces, as well as the others, would have been able to keep the law. The others, too, had wanted to act at that time by way of explanation and mitigation, and for that reason had proposed several honorable, Christian means, which, however, the other part had not wanted to accept, despite all admonition, friendly and humble request and reminder, but had, out of a supposed delusion, decided on a different opinion, contrary to the previous unanimous Speierian imperial treaty of this 29th year. They have decided on a different opinion in the 29th year, and in religion, against such Speierian imperial decree, have set other burdensome, unmistakable articles, which their churlish and princely graces, as well as the others, have not accepted. Their electoral and princely graces, as well as the others, could not keep, nor accept, for the sake of their consciences.

And although their chur- and princely. Grace, also the others, have rejected the opposite more than sufficiently and have indicated the reasons for which they would be justly obliged to adhere to the first unanimous, confirmed and promised Speierian imperial agreement, and against this, without the special permission and approval of their most gracious, gracious and favourable lords, the electors, princes, and also honourable free and imperial cities, nothing more 1) could be granted or concluded, and imperial cities, neither could grant nor conclude anything, nor that more 1) would take place, but that it would be fair to remain with that which their Imperial Majesty herself has permitted, and which has been unanimously decided by all the other estates, and which has been confirmed and sealed; that also especially her Imperial Majesty's The Council of the Holy Roman Emperor is to be the only body in the Holy Roman Empire that has the power to act, deliberate, and decide on the future Concilio and other necessities of the Empire at the next Speierian Imperial Diet, and that it is not to be interpreted as a means of again abrogating the previous Speierian Imperial Diet.

However, the obnoxious [part] would have persisted in his intention and the supposed increase and would have wanted to drag the matter back to the previous dangerous state, above which Pope Adrianus had previously confessed himself and other clergymen to the abuses at an imperial diet.

1) Only here Walch notes: "Votorum pluritas" = the majority.

So also her majesty would have announced in the next 24. year an imperial farewell to Speier, and would have reported therein to separate the bad from the good.

And because their sovereign and princely sovereigns, also the respectable free and imperial cities, had encountered such a thing (as stated above) against the previous Speier farewell, their sovereign and princely sovereigns, also the others, had protested against such a supposed increase and farewell. Their sovereigns and princes, as well as the others, have protested against such alleged increase and departure, as well as what they have encountered in this regard.

And for this reason it would be her most humble request, and that of the others, too, that her Imperial Majesty, for the reasons mentioned and others, would not take an ungracious will. Majesty, for the reasons mentioned and others, would not take an ungracious will to the protestation and refusal made, but would grant this to the unavoidable necessity.

Thus, their sovereigns and fathers, as well as the others, intend, by means of divine help, in the meantime of the future approved Concilii, or National Assembly, to hold themselves with their own in their authorities and territories in such a way as they hoped and dared to answer for against God and their imperial majesty, in such a way that nothing bad or unjust may be imposed upon them. They also wished, as their forefathers and ancestors had done, to be submissive to their Imperial Majesty. Majesty, and keep themselves as obedient, first of all as far as the temporal is concerned, it would be with the necessary help against the Turks, for the orderly maintenance of the regiment and chamber court, also other things that are necessary for their Imperial Majesty, also of the Holy Roman Empire. Maj. also of the Holy Empire's welfare and honor.

With most humble request, if the matter reaches Her Majesty in a different form, Her Majesty would not allow any disparagement of the same, but rather would allow this truthful excuse to stand and be believed, and would not allow herself to be moved to disgrace against her without the interrogation and responsibility of her most gracious, gracious and favorable sovereigns, after Her Electoral and Princely Grace, as well as others, would be requested where they would be overcome by divine biblical scripture of another, that they would allow themselves to be rebuked of all charges. They are not to be moved to disgrace against them without the interrogation and responsibility of their most gracious and favorable rulers, after their sovereign and princely lords, as well as the others, have been summoned, where they have been overcome by the divine biblical Scriptures of another, to let themselves be rebuked of all charges.

And their Lordships and F. Gnostics, as well as the others, hereby command themselves in their Imperial Majesty's protection and promise as their most gracious Emperor and Lord. Majesty's protection, patronage, and promise, as their most gracious Emperor and Lord, with the request that their Imperial Majesty would give them, the envoys, the most gracious, gracious, and favorable lords, the most gracious, prompt, written answer.

And so that Her Imperial Majesty of Commerce...

would receive still more report, which could not have been presented orally in the shortness, the envoys hand over to Her Majesty herewith their German sealed Instruction, together with two copies thereof in Latin and French, together with the other writings serving for trade; again with most humbly request, Her Imperial Majesty would rest to read the same, and thereupon to deliver them again in the most gracious, most hurried and most bailful manner. This would undoubtedly be done by Her Royal and Princely Grace, as well as the others. and the others, too, would deserve this in all subservience for their Imperial Majesty, as their most gracious Lord.

012 And have at that time committed the envoys of their imperial majesty to their own hands:

I. their German having sealed Instruction;

II. two copies thereof in Latin and French;

III. a printed farewell of the Speier Diet of this 29th year;

IV. of the Electors, Princes and the others first Protestation in Latin;

V. the other long protestation in German, and subsequently M. Alexandern, at his request, the same protestation in Latin;

VI. the tender for this Imperial Diet of the past 29th year;

VII Pabst's Adriani Confession of Abuses;

VIII. the hundred complaints, brought before the Diet of Nuremberg.

(13) Upon such a presentation by the envoys, the Imperial Majesty immediately had M. Alexander give them the following verbal answer. Majesty immediately had M. Alexander give them the following answer orally, namely: Her Imperial Majesty had received the envoys' requests from Her Majesty. Majesty had received the envoys' submission from her Majesty. and the other princes, as well as the honorable free and imperial cities, and heard their submissive obedience and service to their gracious will, and wished to see the submitted action in council, and how Her Majesty sees the matter, then give an imperial and gracious answer to the charge.

14 Subsequently, the envoys handed over a Latin copy of the Instruction to the Grand Chancellor, and asked for a prompt good answer and dispatch. This he has offered to do.

15th They have handed over a German copy of such instructions to M. Alexander Schweißen, and a Latin copy to Alphonso Waldes (both Imperial Majesty's Secretaries), and have also asked for encouragement. to good clearance, which also let themselves be heard willingly.

16 And after Imperial Maj. Maj. gave an answer through M. Alexander Schweißen (as stated above), Her Majesty sent all written acts to him that he should overlook them and send them to the Grand Chancellor in advance so that the act could be discussed in the Great Council. This the same M. Alexander did and sent the whole act to the Grand Chancellor.

The envoys have also handed over a copy of their power, which they have from the Electors, Princes, also the respectable free and imperial cities. But when the Grand Chancellor became weak, he could neither act nor overlook anything. For this reason, the envoys were so concerned that the Grand Chancellor postponed the same deal and sent it to the Nongieur Oraii Vsla [Granvella], who was decaying in the Grand Chancellor's illness, and had it announced that he would translate the act and then bring it to council.

(18) So the envoys subsequently applied to him and to all places, but outside of Nassau, while he had given them an answer, as has been reported above in the entry, also to the imperial majesty himself for a gracious, speedy, and written answer, and each time received a reply: they would be graciously dealt with.

019 In the meantime Michael of Kaden has recovered and come to them in Placentia; there they have again informed all three of them in many ways, solicited and asked for information.

(20) And although they were always reassured that they would soon and graciously be disposed of, they nevertheless had to take this precaution that they would not be disposed of as they wished. And so that, if the matter should come to the insinuation of the appeal, there would be no lack of a notary (which one would otherwise not want to have), Alexius Frauentraut has pardoned and exonerated himself of his legation and sending before another open notary and the witnesses, and has also had an instrument made about it.

021 And because then, at the time when the envoys asked for dispatch and answer, it came to pass that Imperial Majesty the Pope had sent the envoys to the Holy Roman Empire. Majesty. Colman dispatched Plattner 1) of Augsburg, that he should ride home and make some armour for her Majesty, also for the of Nassau, which Plattner requested from Imperial Majesty and the of Nassau. Majesty and that of Nassau, and requested that Imperial Majesty Majesty the Ge

1) "Platner" - plate maker, harness maker. In the old edition: "Colman Plattner".

When the Emperor of Nassau dispatched the envoys so that he might have companions, and did not ride alone in the swift louses, he told the same Plattner that he might well tell the envoys that they enjoyed him, the Plattner. For the Imperial Majesty also wants to dispatch the embassies so that he has company, and where it would be without him, the Plattner, the envoys would have to walk for a month or more afterwards.

22 But as it happened that Colman Plattner got other company so that he could ride, the envoy's answer stayed behind and was brought up. From this it is to be assumed where Plattner did not come across any company that his promotion helped more and had more reputation, neither princes, princes, nor respectable free and imperial cities themselves. From this it is also to be heard that princes, princes and the respectable cities have to provide themselves in matters of faith to their majesty 2c.

23 And after Alexius Frauentraut, for the above-mentioned reasons, had refused his legation, the other two envoys, Hans Ehinger and Michael von Kaden, asked for their leave. This was granted to them on October 13 by the Imperial Maj. Secretary, M. Alexander Schweiß, with Her Imperial Majesty and the same Secretary. Majesty and the same Secretarii's hands.

24. Which given parting Hans Ehinger and Michael von Kaden took to themselves, read out, thereupon by Michael von Kaden the Speier Appeal insinuated, with request and demand that Alexius Frauentraut, as Notary, give them, the Envoys, from their most gracious, gracious Lords, the Electors, Princes, and also the others, on account of such insinuated appeal, ex (meio), to make and give one or more open instruments and deeds, as much as they would be or would be in need of them.

25th Thereupon the above-mentioned Notary, in the presence of M. Alexander Schweiß, gave them this answer. Alexander Schweiß, gave this answer: because a few days ago he had refused his legation, in which he had been ordered all and variously, for movable causes, the contents of an instrument, he could not, for the sake of his office, avoid making and giving to the Electors, Princes, also respectable free and imperial cities, as principals, or to them, the envoys, one or more open instruments and deeds, as much as they would be in need of them. Requested thereupon the witnesses, as were present at that time.

(26) Upon which the appeal has been filed, also the requisition that followed it, has much to do. The said M. Alexander said: he had been ordered by Imperial Majesty to thus give the envoys leave of their Imperial Majesty. Majesty, but had no order to accept the appeal; he gave the envoys the farewell by order of Imperial Majesty, which was signed with the same hand, and so the envoys lacked it. Majesty, which would be signed with the same hand, and if the envoys were in want of it, they would appeal to Imperial Majesty himself. Majesty himself, and he wished to report such action to Imperial Majesty. Majesty. And even if he had taken such an appeal into his own hands, he did not want to have it accepted by taking it into his hands, but to report it to the Imperial Majesty. Majesty. Alexium Frauentraut requests and demands that he make and give him one or more open instruments and documents, as many as he would need. To which the Notary now reported gave him this answer: as much as he would be obliged to do.

27 The two envoys, on the other hand, did not doubt their Majesty's decision at all. But because he, M. Alexander, had given it to them by Imperial Majesty, they, the envoys, acted according to their instructions 2c. Majesty, they, the envoys, acted according to their instruction 2c., and thus did not want to take the appeal again, and laid it down on the table; which Appeal Acta, German and Latin, M. Alexander, together with a copy of their authority (which they also laid down), from that time on (as the envoys are reported), carried to court and reported to Imperial Majesty. Majesty.

28th day of the same 13th, Oct., about the hour of 3 past noon, the same M. Alexander came and brought with him a notary and some witnesses, and said that he appeared before the same notary, and because on the same day he had protested before Alexius Frauentraut, as notary, that he did not want to accept or have accepted the protestation, he repeated the same again, and his request was that if Alexius Frauentraut wanted to make an instrument about such a protestation, he would not let it go out, so he inscribed all the acts, namely Imperial Majesty's farewell, and what he, Alexander, had given for his person as an answer to it. Majesty's farewell, and what he, Alexander, would have given for his person for answer to it. Requested the same Notary that he wanted to make and give him one or more open instruments and certificates about all this. This now applies to himself as a person. For one.

29 Secondly, if the Imperial Majesty had ordered him to say to the envoys. Majesty would have ordered him to tell the envoys: because they had such an appeal insinuated and handed over to her Majesty, that her Imperial Majesty had by no means provided for them. Majesty had by no means provided for them. And accordingly she ordered her Imperial Majesty through him,

M. Alexander, into the hostel, with the appendix that in case of loss of body and goods they should not leave the hostel, not write behind them, nor send some servants from themselves. Everything until further notice to Her Imperial Majesty. Majesty's Imperial Majesty's decision.

(30) When Michael von Kaden was in the city at the time when M. Alexander Hansen Ehinger and Alexium Frauentraut were arrested in the inn, and learned of such arrest through a servant, he quickly attributed the same to his lords of Nuremberg, and subsequently went to his companions in the inn, and also heard of such arrest. However, due to the arrest, no notary nor testes [witnesses] were requisitioned by Alexander.

On the 14th day of October Hans Ehinger and Michael von Kaden have thereupon in the inn before Alexio Frauentraut, as notary, from their most gracious and favorable lords, the princes, princes, also honorable free and imperial cities, taken leave of Imperial Majesty and appealed to him for a farewell. Majesty farewell and eautslam provoked and appealed.

32 Thus the envoys have lain in such arrest as the obedient, namely from the 13th to the 25th day of October, and have nevertheless in the meantime given instruction in German and French to Imperial Majesty. Majesty in the meantime, and asked for interrogation.

On the 25th day of October, when Imperial Majesty was about to leave for Placentia, M. Alexander Sweat came to the officers. Alexander Sweat came to the officers, and informed them that the von Nassau, together with the secretary Lobis, had two or three times dealt with the imperial majesty on account of their trade or business, but that her majesty had taken it into consideration. However, the matter was finally brought to the point that Ulrich Ehinger's embassies, for the sake of his faithful service, now enjoy that her Majesty counts them exempt from this arrest and detention; but that they promised (as they must do) to follow the Court as far as Bononia. For her Majesty has complaint and displeasure about their action, and also about the booklet that has been handed over. But they, the envoys, may, on their way, or at Parma, settle the matter themselves and leave the inn. He tells the envoys all this by order of Nassau; but they should not overrun him, M. Alexander, too much.

34 Accordingly, the deputies of Imperial Majesty have gone to Parma. Majesty went as far as Parma and asked and asked daily for a single count of their household.

35. on Oct. 30, Imperial Majesty decreed the. Majesty the
The following notice was given to the envoy by Monsieur de Gran Vela in Latin, in the presence of Alexander, with the approximate content: Imperial Majesty would have been very displeased with their action on account of the appeal. Majesty would have been greatly displeased with their action on account of the appeal; but as to that, their Imperial Majesty, as a gracious and gracious man, would have been pleased with it. Majesty, as a gracious and kind emperor, wanted to have the envoys released from arrest and allowed to return to their masters.

36. however, kaiserl. Majesty. Order, Will and Opinion that Alexius Frauentraut does not make an instrument about the happened Insinuation of the Appeal, he would have handed it over to M. Alexander Schweiß before, to have a look at it according to necessity. To which Alexius replied: if the Imperial Majesty wanted it, he must have it. Majesty wanted, he would have to do it.

37 On such parting Hans Ehinger and Alexius Frauentraut departed from the Court; but Michael von Kaden, on Gran Vel's report of a booklet which he had handed over to Imperial Majesty, had to continue to follow the Court. Majesty, had to continue to follow the court.

38 Thus the von Nassau and M. Alexius Schweiß gave the above-mentioned Electors, Princes, and honorable free and imperial cities an answer to their letters of credence; as is to be heard here.

39 And because Ulrich Ehinger did not appeal to Imperial Majesty the King. Majesty's. Court, the envoys have kept his letter of credence with them, which they also hand over herewith, along with the other documents that have remained to them.

(40) Whatever instruments, namely Hans Ehinger's and Michael von Kaden's Provocation aa euutslam, are to be erected upon opened parting, Notarius Frauentraut, at her Electoral Grace, also submits to erect. The notary public, Frauentraut, at her Electoral Grace's request and that of the others, too, and at the behest of both of the aforementioned, agrees to erect them.

(41) The same Notary also requests that the instrument on the appeal's insinuation, insofar as it is not contrary to the last dispensation given him by Monsieur de Granvelle of Imperial Majesty, be set up. Majesty (as stated above), in which he asks for the advice of their princely and princely graces and favour, so that he may do what is just and inviolable to his honour.

From all this, the envoys want to give their Electoral and Princely Graces, as well as respectable free and imperial cities, so much to understand and to know. They want to give their electoral and princely graces, as well as respectable free and imperial cities, as much to understand and to know as their electoral and princely graces and in favor of the holy Christian faith can afford. and for the sake of the holy Christian faith to Imperial Majesty. Majesty, and also of the same rulers, in order that they may remember and act in accordance with their noticeable need.

43) The envoys shall inform their most gracious, gracious and favorable lords, the electors, princes, honorable free and imperial cities summarily of all this, and shall act accordingly.

44. do hereby also command their electoral, princely, and other graces. Graces, also to the others, herewith in all submissiveness, as their most gracious, gracious and favorable lords.

Of the above-mentioned princes, princes, also honorable free and imperial cities envoys, Hans Ehinger, Michael von Kaden and Alexius Frauentraut 2c.

D. Luther's concern for himself and his colleagues, whether the dissenters in the Article of the Lord's Supper could be taken into the religious alliance. (End of May 1529.)

The original of this prayer, which was most likely made for the convention meeting at Rodach on June 7, is in the archives at Weimar, 8. toi. 40. n. 2, and is found from it in Müller's Historie der Augsbургischen Confession, lib. II, eap. 16, s. 6, p. 230, but with the ending omitted. Incomplete also in the Leipzig edition, vol. XXII, p. 25, and in Walch. Complete in De Wette, vol. III, p. 465 and in the Erlanger, vol. 54, p. 79.

Because this alliance is to have the name, and be done in the opinion, that the doctrine of the gospel is thereby preserved and protected among us, it is

This is impossible and futile at first, because such an alliance must undoubtedly be based on the conscience or faith of those who have joined together, so that they may believe in one accord. Now such faith is unconscious and uncertain in others, and certainly to be feared in very few. If the emperor were to attack, there would be very few who would stand, and the others would all fall away; then we would first and too slowly learn how the cities are not powerful enough of themselves, and the alliance would be destroyed with great shame and damage. We have enough examples of this in Mühlhausen, Nordhausen, Erfurt, Augsburg, 1) Schwäbisch Halle 2c.

1) Here De Wette and according to him the Erlangen edition still has "Nuremberg", which is not found in Müller. The before wanted to eat up the gospel because of love, but now suddenly and easily fell down. So it is to be feared that Ulm, Strasbourg 2c., will also go, because there are still many in it who are for the gospel, that one or two men who are now silent and suffering will come forward, and turn the whole city, for: Nou ost oiunium üäos, saith Paul [2 Thess. 3:2.]

On the other hand, it is dangerous because of the landgrave, because he is a restless man. If, as he did that time, he should attempt something, storm the monasteries and convents, without our will, we would have to follow and do, or have done, what he did. Likewise also the cities, Basel and Strasbourg, which the monasteries (which are not in their power) have closed and taken by their own force?) We would have to defend all this with our help. Because now the landgrave would like to bring us into such danger, we do against God, where we go into such danger, as it is written: "Thou shalt not tempt God" [Matth. 4, 7.], and again: "He who loves danger will perish over it" [Sir. 3, 27.].

In the third place, it is suspicious and vexatious; for who can think that so many people do not seek therein drueüium oarnis, that is, more consolation and defiance in human help than in God; yea, very few would be so pure in faith, but if any were so pure, they would not charge their idol with such a covenant; for that would be dreadful. And even if two or three were pure, they would have given cause to the others, and would have set up such an idol for them, as Gideon says in Judges. 8, 3) 27. and Micha Richt. 17, 5.

Fourth, it is unchristian for heresy against the sacrament; for we cannot have it in the covenant, we must help strengthen and defend such heresy, and if Erlanger Briefwechsel, Vol. VII, p. III, remarks that "Nuremberg is probably to be deleted." - Augsburg, Schwäbisch-Hall and Nordhausen had signed the imperial treaty at Speier (No. 818); in Mühlhausen the Catholic party was still dominant, in Erfurt there was discord.

2) In Basel the council had seized the St. Peter's monastery on February 15, 1529, and in Strasbourg the council and aldermen abolished the Catholic service on February 20, 1529, even on the imperial monastery, the high monastery (the cathedral), over which they had no power.

3) At De Wette and in the Erlanger: Jud. 9.

If they were to be defended, they should become worse than they were before. For if they do not amend this matter, there is no hope that they will be just and firm in the other matters. Notice the example of Joshua 7, where, because of one Achan, all the holy people suffered misfortune until this sin was punished.

Whether any man would pretend: The cities are one with us in all things but one, and there is no great need of the one for the sake of the others.

Answer: There is too much in the one, as said above of Achan; for therefore all the rest also become unclean, as. Jacobus saith, Ollsnäens in uno, kaetns 68t omnium reus sJac. 2, 10.]. He is no less an unchristian who denies one article, than Arius or the one. Wherefore we may not escape judgment, kueiens 6t oonsentiens pari poenu pleetuntur, Rom. 1:32. and as the prophet saith to king Jehoshaphat 2 Chron. 19:2: Impio pru6t>68 uuxilium, 6t Ü8, gui ockerunt Dominuin amioitiu juuZ6ri8 6to. Also, they complain too much about the things themselves, so that without any need they completely remove all ceremonies from the sacrament and make a bad collation out of it, which we cannot justify.

But if it be said again, This covenant is not for doctrine, but is against outward violence, which is done contrary to law, because they plead for knowledge.

Answer: It will not hold, for it is known that the adversary will not attack us for any cause but for doctrine. Therefore it cannot be believed that we make such a covenant against unjust authority. And the fact that they offer themselves in knowledge is of no help to us, for we know and hold that they are wrong, and may not put this into doubt or knowledge with them, for which reason we cannot in good conscience deal with them; we must also grant and confirm such their offer of knowledge, and so at once fall with them from our certain knowledge to their doubt or uncertain delusion. That would be more than half, if not denying our faith). The-half is our concern that one should let it remain with the articles that are placed on such action.

2) The emperor must be written to.

First of all, it would be good if our part, with the exclusion of the Zwinglian, were to write for itself alone.

Secondly, that the good deeds of the prince against the church and the common being be made great, well deleted 2c.

1) That he had Christ and his faith taught in the purest way, as it has not been taught anywhere, and not for a thousand years, in so many churches and parishes. And so many abuses and abominable things have been stopped, of which they themselves must confess that they have been exceedingly evil and harmful to the church and to the common people, as the fair of the masses, the abuse of indulgences, the violence with the ban, and the like, which was also intolerable with them; such things the nobility themselves brought up at Worms and insisted that they be stopped.

2) That he resisted the rioters, as he resisted the iconoclasts and the church rioters.

3) That the honor of the authorities and majesty has been gloriously displayed, praised, and restored, more than has been done for many centuries.

4) Against the rebels, like Münzer, we would have done and suffered the utmost to preserve majesty and public peace.

5) No one held down the Sacramentirans but us, the Papists would have been overrun.

6) We have put down the Anabaptists in like manner,

7) Moreover, 3) the evil seeds of exceedingly wicked doctrines of men, which are scattered in various places, of the Holy Trinity, of faith in Christ 2c. (as those of Erasmus, Egranus and the like).

2) The following is in the original Latin and translated by us into German.

3) Per ea in our submission seems to us to be read from kraetsrea. We have assumed the latter.

866 Consöderationsnotel, of some Protestant estates to Rodach erected (the 7. June) 1529.

From Müller's History 1. e. p. 236.

By the Grace of God, we John, Duke of Saxony, Archmarshall and Elector of the Holy Roman Empire 2c, George, Margrave of Brandenburg, and Philip, Landgrave of Hesse 2c, and we Mayors and Councillors of the Holy Roman Empire Cities of Strasbourg, Nuremberg, and Ulm, confess and declare by this letter that for the following moving Christian and good causes. Imperial cities of Strasbourg, Nuremberg and Ulm, confess and declare with this letter that for the following movable Christian and good reasons, but first of all for the praise and honour due to God the Almighty, for the promotion and acceptance of his holy word and gospel, and so that we may remain with the Holy Empire, as obedient members of the same, and so that we may remain in the holy kingdom as obedient members thereof, and also that our subjects, who are commanded by God to govern and preside over us in a Christian manner, may be handled in a manner that is honorable, Christian and just, and also conducive to the salvation of their souls, and may be prevented from unjust unlawful rape and damage, have unanimously agreed, joined and committed themselves to this with one another. And in the name of the Almighty do so knowingly, by virtue of this letter, for ourselves, all our heirs and successors, as hereafter follows: Initially, our minds, wills, and opinions are in no way in the way, and this confidential and friendly understanding of ours that we are not drawn by the same against the Roman Imperial Majesty as our most gracious rightful Lord and Superior. Majesty, as our most gracious rightful lord and sovereign, decreed to us by God, for which we also recognize their Imperial Majesty without means, against the Holy Roman Empire, its members or relatives, or their Imperial Majesty. Majesty, without any means, against the Holy Roman Empire, its members or relatives, or its Imperial Majesty. Majesty, the order of the Empire, or the unification of the union in the land of Swabia, to which we are partly related, to act in certain ways, to wage war against anyone for ourselves, to wage war against anyone, to overreach anyone, to violate the law, to break the common peace, or to arouse indignation or repugnance in the Holy Empire. Majesty. Rather, we want to use them to help us in the most faithful way to maintain the dignity, honor and majesty of the Holy Roman Empire, its welfare and prosperity, as well as public peace, justice and unity everywhere, and to prevent as much as possible the dangerous uprisings, outrages and repulsions that we have to worry about in the Empire, and to use only the means of defense and salvation that are permitted to every human being by human, natural and imperial rights, without any means. We are also to protect ours, to whom we are ordained as superiors and protectors by God, from unjust complaints and violent actions by those who might subject themselves to act against us and ours against God's command, the common peace of the land of the Empire, common law and all equity; and just as we, as Christian princes, sovereigns, cities, and governors, know ourselves to be guilty of such without means, by virtue of our commanded office, and are therefore obligated to account to God Almighty, as the Lord, Creator, and Sustainer of us all.

(2) And above all, the Roman Imperial Majesty, as our Lord Emperor and Superior, shall finally and without means be exempted from this friendly understanding and agreement. Majesty, as our Lord, Emperor and Superior, shall be excluded from this friendly understanding and agreement of ours, finally and without means, so that such our understanding shall in no way be drawn, placed or interpreted on Her Imperial Majesty's person, nor shall it be understood at all in certain articles on Her Majesty. In the same way, we also take from the common estates of the empire, as much as they are not included in this our understanding; as far as each one for himself, or next to other estates, with and in the same help, does not commit against us and ours some violent, dishonourable action, help, war exercise and insurrection, still for the sake of reported things.

(3) And although we Princes and Reigning Princes, as aforesaid, are in hereditary fraternity and hereditary union with others, the contents of the prescription and Roman Imperial Majesty, our most gracious Lord, be-lieu. Majesty, our most gracious Lord, Be-

The order and unification of the Union of Swabia, in which we aforementioned estates are for the most part included, can therefore, among others, have an article with the harmless content: that the covenant relatives may well enter into unification with princes, princely and other estates in the realm, also accept covenant and understanding with them, but that they freely exclude the unification of the same Union of Swabia 2c. Because of this, some might think that we, the estates, should exclude such hereditary brotherhood, hereditary alliance, and also alliance relatives, the others of our mutual union: This union of ours is not a common or such an agreement, which in all cases that may occur, or therefore hereditary brotherhoods, hereditary brotherhoods of the princes and princes, included therein, also the covenant relatives of Swabia may recognize, The only thing that is required is a confidential, friendly understanding of whether our one of the divine word, the holy gospel and our faith and what is dependent on it, and what is pending on the same, and therefore in a common case, where the relatives on both sides have not joined themselves to each other at all, in which they also do not have the power to make some discovery, relief, decision or help, and therefore may not be judges, would be attacked, overdrawn, feuded, violated or burdened against fairness, whether one should provide himself to the other in such a case, and what salvation, protection and defence he should rely on from them; So that, for such reasons, against all of them, as has been reported, there is no need at all to make any exceptions in this matter; Moreover, that our minds are not in any way, either altogether or in particular, as we also hereby expressly reserve, that we do not wish, by these our understandings, to draw ourselves out of the agreements indicated, but intend, to the same hereditary brotherhoods, hereditary unions, and the order of the covenant, as much as each of these concerns, all of their contents and in all articles, Therefore the same agreements have been made and established, and therein they are to be recognized as just, to be lived and complied with most faithfully, no less than if this understanding of ours, which, as has been reported, is based solely on a defense of the united case and things, and not on a move or physical helpful agreement, were not at all before our eyes. If also the same hereditary unions, hereditary unions and order of the Covenant in all things, wherefore the same is established and therein admitted to be known to the same kinsmen, hereby freely excepted, and have not drawn our understanding thereon, in the undoubted confidence that every Christian mind, which is inclined to God's honor, common peace, and human respectability, will from this friendly understanding of ours, which we also bear no hesitation to reveal to Imperial Majesty, all Imperial Estates, and all men, so much that he will find nothing else than a Christian mind, faithful to God, obedient to our Lordship, and obedient to our Lordship. Majesty, all Imperial Estates, and all men, that he has no other reason to judge than a Christian mind, faithful to God, obedient to our authorities, and a responsible protection, pacification, and handling of our faithful subjects and common peace.

(4) We, the aforementioned princes, princes and cities, together with all and each of our subjects, relatives and dependents, together and in particular, shall mean, hold and support each other with good, right, true loyalty, for the sake of the matter in question, faithfully and safely. To this end, we, and all of us, shall not do or practise anything violent or unkind towards or against each other, but each of us shall be content with ordinary and equitable rights towards the other and his relatives, and shall not complain about them or allow his own to do so, nor shall any of us allow the other his secret or public enemies, Neither shall any of us knowingly keep, foster, subvert, or induce the other to keep, foster, subvert, or induce his secret or public enemies, plagiarists, and injurers in his sovereignties, authorities, and territories, or permit his officials and others to do so to his own, but each shall let the other and his dependents remain within the common peace and rights of the realm. And if any of our enemies, injurers, and such like public defenders enter our towns, territories, and courts, we shall, at the request of the injured party or on our own behalf, act against them by official authority, as the Holy Roman Empire's peace and common law and practice allow, and as each of us would like to have the other do in the same case. And after the recent Imperial Diet at Speier, the other imperial estates that were present at that time, in several articles, but especially in matters concerning the Holy Gospel, our faith and religion, our friendly and submissive requests, reminders, proposals and requests have been made in many ways and so difficult for us.

that we have publicly protested against this article, do not want to heal it, and have also appealed against it, as is proper. Likewise, that certain princes and estates of ours, in appearance of their spiritual jurisdiction, as they call it, of which they believe we have deprived them unreasonably and by force, have complained and have undertaken to defend us, or may henceforth complain and defend themselves, not to visit and examine the pastors and preachers in our authorities on account of their doctrine, conduct and character, not to change the unfit, infirm pastors and church servants, and not to make some improvement in that which is divine, Christian and honorable, and also in part necessary and beneficial to our subjects, to which every authority is obligated; From this, then, it is to be feared that the Word of God and our opponents might subject themselves to forcefully penetrate us and ours from the Word of God by all kinds of means, practices and ways, and to coerce us to re-establish the old un-Christian abuses, or to prevent by force in the future that which is in accordance with the Christian faith and the Word and command of God, for which reason they might also openly hostile us and ours, violently attack us or damage us in other ways. Whether anyone, whatever his status or nature, would like to or would subject himself in time to this our understanding, to attack our one or ours because of the holy divine word and gospel, also because of the same doctrine and attitude, or because of the above-mentioned ambivalent Speierian imperial treaty, as far as it affects our faith and religion, as well as the changed and abolished ceremonies and church customs, also on account of the ecclesiastical jurisdiction and visitation reported beforehand, and what is pending on all of them straightforwardly and without means, and against our made appeal, so against the next Speierian decree of this ninth and twentieth year to the imperial majesty and the future council, whether the counterpart would bring and object to the imperial order or mandate to the cover, by too lenient a report, since we nevertheless request to inform imperial majesty again of the truth on our behalf. Majesty again to report the truth on our appeal; to overdraw, rape, secretly or publicly to feud, to damage and to complain, or that the imperial regiment and chamber court, or someone else, who would be, on the accusation and indictment of our repugnants, or for himself, from office and authority, should be

We do not want to act against us, either in particular or in whole, in the matters and articles now reported, one or more, with the eight or other burdensome findings and proceedings, also the subsequent physical execution and implementation of the same, which may cause public damage to us and ours, and which may cause us undue hardship: For all this, and nothing more, nor for any other case or matter which may otherwise occur against us and ours, we shall be obliged to save each other, to help each other faithfully, all and especially, according to the form and measure mentioned. However, in matters outside the above-mentioned cases, concerning the word of God and faith, as expressly stated, each of us shall and may use ordinary law or other measures, ways and means, as may be convenient to him in each case, to his own need and advantage, in which we shall not be obligated to render any assistance to one another.

(5) With our assistance, however, which we are obliged to render one another, as reported, it shall be held thus: If, at the time of this our understanding, one of the above-mentioned estates should be in danger and distress of unreasonable rape, violation, burden, or damage, either to ourselves or to ours, on account of our property and faith, so that the same should have certain information, notice, or suspicion of the same, or that we and ours have been attacked, overrun, warred against, feuded against or damaged, or that our or their land, people, castle, towns, villages or fortifications have been taken away by force, because of the aforementioned things: Then the same estate, being thus troubled, violated, invaded, or damaged, shall describe and require us, the others, to a place situated, which he shall have power to name, with a statement of his distress and concern; and then we, the princes above mentioned, send three of our wise councillors, and we, those of the cities, also three of our councillor friends or others of ours, who are related to us with duties, services or offices, and no more, to the named place and at the appointed time, according to the description, without any delay, delay and hindrance. The same six persons, who have been sent and discharged by us, as reported, shall also be discharged of their duty, so that they are related to us, in the matter reported, for which they have been sent, and for as long as it lasts, and shall herewith be obliged and bound to be equal and common to us of all parts, and to one as well as to the other among us the most faithful, best and most honorable, his

He shall advise and help us according to his understanding, and in our affairs, for which he is needed by us as his lordship, he shall act faithfully, diligently, and uprightly, and also not undertake, speak, act, and give advice in any other form for the settlement, rescue, and help of any grievance that may be before his eyes, except whether it concerns our, as his lordship, or his own affairs and concerns. If, however, any of us should wish to send more than the number of persons and councillors mentioned, and that is to say, one to two more, he shall have the power to do so; but that it shall always remain with the six votes, and that they shall not be increased, we shall therefore, according to the opportunity of the time, runs, and more persons whom we would take to us, compare ourselves with another. And when these six councillors come together, and the aforesaid case and the plight of the afflicted estate is brought before them: Then they shall diligently consider, consider, and deliberate upon the same matters in the most expedient manner and without delay, in what manner and by what proper means such complaints and objections are to be prevented, averted, or brought to an amelioration and way that will be agreeable to the aggrieved party, by proposing necessary legislation, sending our embassies or writings, attending and accepting amicable days, or in any other manner. If, however, one or more of the advised ways and means are not provided or accepted by the opposing party, or if the distress and damage should occur in such a hurried and unmistakable manner that no other than a public violent damage, assault or damage can be provided for, or if the distress and violence were present in the work, so that in such a case the help and salvation could not be obtained in any way: Then the said six of our dispatched councillors and envoys shall have the power to recognize and decide, at the time of the aforesaid their duties, according to the occasion of any complaints arising and incumbent upon them, also of the part of the country and fortune which is damaged, how and in what manner, also with what number, assistance, ordnance and armament on horseback or on foot, assistance is to be rendered to the damaged or damaged estate, be it for rescue, defence, garrisoning of towns, castles or other fortifications, for an addition or a patrol, as may be most conveniently effected, but that the number of the aforesaid aid, which has been determined and is in accordance with the same, shall not in each case exceed the sum of the aid on horseback and on foot, which we have united with each other as follows, or that it shall be possible, by the advice of the councillors, to obtain the same.

knowledge be increased. And what is at any time discussed, recognized, decided and complied with by the same our sent councils in the matter of our all incumbent emergencies and complaints, half of the above-mentioned cases and matters, or by the more part of the same, it shall remain so, and it shall be followed by us in all parts without refusal, and by no means be hindered or withdrawn by anyone from us or from ours. If, however, the attack and violence of our enemies should turn into a full-scale war or otherwise prove so burdensome that this assistance we have agreed to provide will not be sufficient, either in whole or in part, to avert this formidable obstruction, even if our appointed councillors and envoys, depending on the nature of the war, should deem it necessary to provide more assistance: They shall not have the power to recognize or moderate a greater or greater number of people on horseback and on foot by their own judgment, outside of the aid hereafter stipulated, but shall then send us, as their masters, their concerns and advice, with the necessary reasons for their movement, together with the designation of another convenient day and place, and we will then send our prudent councillors and embassies together on the named day and time at a convenient place, with necessary and perfect authority, to discuss and debate such important matters and the need at hand with their circumstances as diligently as possible, whether and how the aforementioned agreed assistance is to be increased, and also in what way the trade is to be carried out in the most useful and bearable way, and the least burdensome end is to be sought therein. And if one of the states, reported, to which the assistance, as mentioned above, is recognized, becomes necessary, the state in question shall have and decree such assistance for itself in its lands and territories. The same burdened part shall also maintain and use the reported ordnance without our, the other estates', cost and disadvantage for necessity.

6. And so that we may all and especially prevent ourselves and ours from such probable harassment, assault, violence and damage, keep the peace, and withstand the adverse authorities, in matters as mentioned above, the sooner and do necessary rescue and resistance: So we have voluntarily united and agreed to the following help and armament, thus: that we, the towns, declare to the said our most gracious and gracious lords, the Electors and Princes, where their Electoral and Imperial Grace or theirs should be attacked, raped, damaged or encumbered as reported and assistance would be necessary, want to send three thousand fit, mustered footmen, with their armour and armour, as is due to rural use and necessity, at our, the cities', expense and maintenance. If, however, we, the towns, should encounter such a violation, encroachment, damage or burden: then we, the Elector and Princes, shall and will send to the city complained of fifteen hundred fit, mustered, armed horses, also at our, the Princes', expense and maintenance, to use the same aid on horseback and on foot, as long as necessity requires it after consideration of the councils sent together, for the counter-defence; but all this on the prior knowledge and moderation of the above-mentioned councils ordered by all of us. And we, the other estates, shall nevertheless send our due number on horseback or on foot, and the burdened part shall be equipped with its number in the same way, so that there will be no loss of such united help, and how it is to be provided each time. And if it will be necessary and the invasion will be in sight, the burdened estate shall occupy its spots for necessity, and be prepared with all its might to resist such invasion all the more handsomely, and to cover itself with emergency supplies. If, however, it should happen that, due to necessity or hindrance, the recognized aid on horseback and on foot cannot be brought to the state in need of it, and to which it has been recognized by the councillors, by any means: Then the money for such aid, as has been recognized and appropriate, and at the time of the recognized aid of the cavalry and footmen, also for their remuneration, shall be sent and delivered by us, the others, to whom the aid is due to be sent, without delay and hindrance, to pay others with it as necessary. The highest diligence shall be used in all cases to do and render the moderate aid with people, and not with money, where it is always possible to exist. And whichever part of us will send some aid on horseback and on foot to the other and weighed down, it shall dispatch its captains and men-at-arms with the same stately and serious command, nor shall the men-at-arms take any other form than such that they may act to the benefit of the overdrawn, violated or weighed-down part, promote their piety, and prevent harm to themselves.

also let them be used to the same burdened state's need and concern faithfully and without objection; also to be obedient and obedient to their sub-chiefs, likewise to the supreme captain who is assigned to them from time to time, also to the appointed our war councillors, whom we shall assign each time as hereinafter provided, and in no way to resist due honest duty, which would be held against them by the same supreme appointed captain, or the appointed war councillors, but to perform it obediently, and to want to live according to it. And if we, the Elector and Prince, are aided by the other estates: we all, or he to whom aid is thus given by the others, shall have a chief captain over all the people of war; If, however, assistance is sent to us, the cities, or to one of our most gracious and merciful lords, the princes, we, the cities, or all those to whom assistance is sent, shall have the power to appoint and decree a chief captain of the people of war; to this same captain all the people of war shall then be obedient and swear as hereinbefore safely reported. The said captain shall not, however, at any time undertake for himself any march, raid, assault, battle, pillaging, or any other proper action, but shall do such things as the necessity and occasion of the things and the exercise of war may at any time require, with the knowledge, order, and command of six of our councillors reported beforehand, and also of the other councillors of war whom we shall assign to the same, as follows, and shall live obediently to the same order and command. But so that in times of need we may act all the more fruitfully and stately: We, the princes, shall and will assign and appoint to the aforementioned six appointed councillors another two, and we, the cities, also two war councillors who are knowledgeable and experienced in war; with the knowledge and will of the councillors the supreme captain, as first mentioned, shall and may act in the field and otherwise, even if not otherwise, to whom all the people of war shall also be obedient and subject, and, as is proper, shall do homage and duty. The same six and their assigned councillors of war shall also have the power, where some field or other action will occur out of our distressed emergency and counter-defence, on which this agreement is also based, that they shall consult, act and consider the best for the sake of the muster, fire chief, booty and recovery, as it shall also be held with that which would be conquered each time; and what is thus consulted by them for the sake of such matters, is considered fair and decided, it shall remain so,

and that at last it shall be lived and obeyed. Likewise, it shall be in their power, with the knowledge, consent, and allowance of the party that has been overdrawn or damaged, at any time to make an amicable settlement of the pending war action; however, they shall not accept or decide on a final report, unless it has first reached all of us together and in particular, and has been approved by all of us. If some sum of money would be necessary for the daily exercise of war, the said six and their assigned councillors of war shall have the power to recognize, moderate, and reduce it, so that there may be no lack of it. The same sum shall then be laid out and distributed from us to both parts in the most equal manner, and according to the measure of each of our shells, and in such no part or estate shall be preferred before the other, and no part shall appear to be in default with the payment of such moderate money. And if the councils, as stated above, decide to give aid for a campaign, occupation and preservation of our cities, castles or fortifications, or for an addition or a patrol, it shall be in the power of the party to whom the aid is given, to be recognized and authorized to accept it in whole or in part. In particular, however, we have united and agreed with one another, both jointly and specially, that none of us shall undertake any campaign, war or siege for ourselves, on account of the above-mentioned agreed and expressed matters, or do anything from which a war exercise may be presumed to take place; But if any of the above-mentioned matters should become troublesome or necessary to one of us, he shall let it be communicated to us, the others, in the manner described above, and then, with the help of our councillors and their advice and moderation, he shall act as necessity requires. Our Elector, Prince and City, who are related to this alliance, shall also be obliged and bound in all ways what the several part of the appointed six Councils shall consider convenient and most useful in the above-mentioned matters and shall decide to live up to it without any refusal, and not to undertake or approach anything about it, even if he would be willing to do such for himself and on his own adventure, without our, the others', help: unless someone should be obliged to attack and damage one or more of us or ours, without warning and unawares, on account of the cases and things mentioned above; against whom or the same ours would have a pressing emergency or counteraction.

We are at liberty to defend ourselves, or to take appropriate action where we see fit; and then, after that, the goods shall nevertheless be brought to us, and therein, as is proper and has been stipulated above, shall be acted upon and the necessities considered. At the time of such acts of war, all our castles, towns and villages shall be open to those who have been violated and damaged, so that they may help themselves to the necessities of life against the violators and violators. To this end we shall and will also diligently order and be diligent that those who are sent to us for help shall be given supplies and other necessities for their money at the same reasonable price. Above all, however, we, the Elector, Princes, and cities, are to have our diligent inspection, attention, and experience at all times, whether it be against us in general or in particular, or against ours, in a hurry, or in any other difficult or dangerous matter; And what we thus learn each time, that each of us, to whom such things would come by notice, shall make known to the others, so that each of us may act accordingly, the more nobly and with better care and providence. And if thereupon it shall be necessary to name day and place, to send together and to consult, how such aforesaid complaints and coincidences, by means of divine grace, shall occur, or what else necessity shall require to be done, that shall be done and executed in the same manner and to the extent as aforesaid. And if afterwards any of the princes, counts, cities, or other estates should wish to enter into this confidential understanding and agreement of ours, they shall not be taken into it, nor shall any final promise be made to them, except with the knowledge and advice of all of us. And if then all of us, or the greater part of us, should decide to accept one or more estates into this alliance, it shall first be considered, consulted, and decided with and by us, or our six appointed councils and embassies, with what measure, assistance, or votes the estate or estates shall be accepted into it; so that in assistance and votes a right equality may be kept among us. And this understanding or agreement of ours shall be effective on the date, namely the ... day of the month ... of this present 1529th year, and for five years next succeeding, that is, until ... . Day of the said month, to be counted would... The Lord's will is to be kept and carried out by all of us, especially in the most faithful way, and to be lived without any confusion or hindrance.

7. And if it should happen that, after the conclusion of this understanding and union of ours, someone, whoever he may be, should approach and ask one or more of us for matters concerning the word of God, our Christian faith, and the above-mentioned expressed cases and matters, pending on the same, which have gone and left during the time of our union: therein, according to the measure and content of this our union and prescription, we shall nevertheless advise and assist him, or them, to the end of the same matters, in like manner as if this union were still subsisting.

And all this for constant true testimony and witness, so we have 2c.

867. Letter of the Landgrave Philip of Hesse to the Elector of Saxony, in which he shows himself impatient that the Elector wants to express himself to the Confederation for the sake of the article of the Lord's Supper. July 18, 1529.

From Müller I. c. S. 256.

Our friendly service, and what we are able to do dear and good, always before, highborn prince, friendly dear uncle, brother-in-law and godfather ! We have taken the leave, so of your love, Margrave George of Brandenburg, our friendly dear uncle and brother, and our counsellors, next Thursday after Ulrici [July 8] at Salfeld 1) with, from received from our councillors, all the contents read out. And we do not want to leave it undisclosed to your dear friends that our councillors had no order from us to consent to this; but after the others had decided on it, they had to consent to it as well. For we have so instructed our councillors on all and every point and article, on account of which there might have been speech or consideration (as we have provided that your beloved has also done), that also by them everything necessary might finally have been negotiated, and our own personal meeting and this taking into consideration would have been without necessity. As we again therefore consider our personal meeting quite unnecessary; For the reason that our meeting might be considered necessary, and especially those of Strasbourg, Ulm, and others, who might be suspected of the discord of the sacrament, we are completely resolved, since there is not so much in the article that is so highly excellent, than that our faith and salvation would finally be interested in it, and in addition, Strasbourg is not at all in disagreement with us about the article, but also confesses Christ in the Last Supper just as we do, that for this reason and for other reasons that follow, we do not disassociate ourselves from Strasbourg. In case, however, they were in dispute with us in certain matters, it is not necessary (according to Scripture) to cast down or despise the erring person, and especially those who may receive instruction and teaching, in whom it is to be presumed that they will be corrected, since those from whom they receive such teaching and instruction are obliged to come to their doctrine for friendly consultation and instruction. Therefore we are confident, where your love continues, that Doctor Martin Luther, and the others (as we have written E. L. have come together, and your beloved desire them to compare themselves with each other in a Christian brotherly manner, regardless of their own honor or glory, to the good benefit of all Christians and to avoid annoyance, they will, with the gracious grant of the Almighty, amicably report their opinions and reasons to each other, and therefore compare themselves, and those who adhere to them as their leaders in the Word of God will also be united for this reason. If we were to separate Strasbourg, we would also have to worry that the other cities would not come to an understanding with us. In addition, Ulm is as committed to these matters as Strasbourg, and will therefore by no means separate itself from Strasbourg.

nor perhaps those of Nuremberg would then join us in the understanding; and whether we already had those of Nuremberg without Strasbourg and Ulm would be of little help to us. It is also necessary that we do not allow ourselves to be separated from one another in such an unethical manner, even if our scholars are divided for the sake of easy or otherwise disputatious matters, in which our faith and salvation do not depend. For if this were so, it would give birth to new disputes every year; for from day to day and year to year much unnecessary and disputatious division in the Scriptures occurs now and then between the scholars. And in addition our scholars agree on the main articles concerning faith and our salvation. Now if on these matters we should be divided from one another, if our scholars should be divided: How often would your love and we have had to part company, and especially for the reasons that Luther and his followers must confess that they have done wrong by attacking our uncle and cousin, Duke George of Saxony, with such invective; just as Eisleben, in his book called The Sayings, which he recently let go out, has harshly attacked the good Duke Ulrich of Württemberg, who was driven out, with some invective and untruth. And if it had already been so, as he writes, he (as a Protestant) should have kept silent and covered up his neighbor's disgrace, as they teach us, and not have raised it so publicly before the whole world as has already happened. Whether all this your love, as the highly intelligent, can easily judge that in this case we have no cause to differ from each other. Therefore, for the above-mentioned reasons, and after the Strasbourg city has sat with us as one of the three cities, we have finally decided that no cause for separation or segregation should be proposed or sought. As for the other articles, however, namely the exclusion of Imperial Majesty, our Allies, and the separation of the towns, we have decided that no cause for separation or secession will be sought. Majesty, our most gracious lord, the others, in which we are all ready in agreement and understanding; item, that this agreement is based on the gospel alone, and what is attached to it, the Swabian union and other of our alliance relatives are excluded from this understanding, but provided that they do not complain for the sake of the gospel; item, the assistance that we are to render one another, whether equal or unequal, too little or too much 2c., the chief captain, the sending together of the six councils, and other things that are needful to be put in the note; all this is thus done, that it may be based upon perfect instruction and

We are therefore confident that our instructions can be carried out by our councillors, and that our personal agreement is not necessary; as we have also given our councillors a sufficient report and order in our instructions for this reason, so that they can finally act and conclude on our behalf. Therefore we are sure that if your beloved and our dear grandfather and brother, Margrave George, give their councillors such a report and order, and our councillors on all sides come together in this way, they will compare notes and save us the trouble. We have also appointed the time for our meeting, namely on Bartholomew's Day [24. August, for the sake of our marital, faithful, heavy obligations, several other of our lords and friends have said that we can by no means appear on such a day; it would be not a little shameful, nor do we know what it would be regarded as by the cities, since at your dear request we have first of all approached the cities, on your dear and our account, that they might want to come to an understanding with us: If it has now come to such a point that it has come to days and actions that now causes should be made for special arrangements, or perhaps, as they might consider it, for evasion and refusal of that which we before desired and sought from them. Your beloved may also consider that it would be almost burdensome and displeasing to us, as we have done the action with the cities, that we would not so easily engage in some more action hereafter either, for the sake of your beloved. For this reason we consider it good and advisable and do not want to agree otherwise than that the day at Schwabach is not announced to the cities, but that its continuation is left to them, kindly requesting that your beloved not take note of this report of ours in any other way than in a friendly good opinion, and to consider the matter; and since, for the above-mentioned reasons, our personal assistance is unnecessary, we will leave it at the discretion of our advisors, will not seek a separation, and will allow the day at Schwabach to proceed as we see fit, so that your love will also be pleased. This we deserve for your love. Date Cassel, Sunday after Margaret [18 July] Anno 1529.

Philip by the Grace of God Landgrave of Hesse, Count of Katzenelnbogen 2c.

868. the Elector John's answer to the Landgrave Philip, in which he insists that an oral conference must take place before the Schwabach Convention. July 26, 1529.

In Müller I. c. Cap. 18 immediately after the previous letter.

Our friendly services, and what we are able to do dear and good, always before. Highborn Prince, friendly dear uncle, brother-in-law and godfather ! Now on Sunday, St. James' Day [July 25], we have received from your beloved a document dated Cassel, Sunday after Margaretha, concerning the union and understanding with several imperial cities, and the parting which our uncle, Margrave George of Brandenburg, your beloved, and our councillors, next to Salfeld, have taken with each other for this reason.

And as your beloved indicate first of all that their councillors, who were next to Salfeld, had no other order than that all and every point on which, for the sake of the aforementioned understanding, speech and concerns might have arisen, might finally have been negotiated, and that our own personal meeting and the taking of evidence had been without necessity: So we do not want to leave your dear ones undisclosed that our council, namely Hans von Minkwitz, knight, has brought us a recorded parting of the said action at Salfeld, in which they expressed that they found that in the matter in question, without the personal meeting of all three of us, their submissive consideration, nothing could be done fruitfully or properly, for reasons that each of them would have to report to his lord; Therefore, they had agreed that we should meet in person on St. Bartholomew's Day in the near future, and that as much as possible of our minds should be united. And after, by virtue of the farewell at Rodach, a day for further action to Schwabach has been appointed, also on St. Bartholomew's Day, where then our grandfather, Margrave George, and your beloved would like their agreement; which both your beloved should ascribe to us between then and St. Jacob's Day, then it shall be written to Nuremberg, and the day at Schwabach shall be extended until Galli [Oct. 16]. Since the extension of the Schwabach day in question, and that we ourselves should personally meet beforehand, has now been considered necessary and good by our counsels on all sides, for reasons of their deliberation, which your beloved has no doubt, due to the above-mentioned farewell, no less than we have been reported by ours, we would not have considered it necessary and good. that your love would have so attracted the same extension on our part. But nevertheless we know your kind opinion, and not to rely on their avoidance, that we ourselves consider it quite good, useful and necessary, from the same of the councils' movements, as well as the following causes, that our personal meeting, before and before further action is taken with the cities, is not omitted, as we are also in our part completely inclined to it, and do not want to let anything happen to us. And so our grandfather, Margrave George, has written to us, where the day might be more convenient than towards Naumburg, and especially towards Schleiz, that he would then, by divine help, appear in his own person; whereupon we have written to his love again, that the indicated place should not be displeasing to us. Although your beloved, we, and the cities, have had talks with each other next to Speier about the above-mentioned union and understanding, also about articles on which the same should stand safely, and have let talk of the day and place for further action: nevertheless, also next to Rodach, all kinds of things have been brought for and into the hotel, which has been set up there, and further the negotiations have arisen, as we meant. And although we note from your love's letter that these articles and matters have no complaint at all with your love, we nevertheless hope that our opportunity and what we, and indeed all of us, want to do in it, will also be kindly considered by your love; which, however, will not be indicated or acted upon in writings according to necessity. Should our grandfather, the Margrave, your beloved and we not be completely unanimous in our decision on this and the above Rodachian matter before the day and the gathering of the councillors to Schwabach, but our councillors and the people there stand and act in a special way: May your beloved consider how fruitful, useful, or beneficial such action would be; and that it would be altogether less objectionable to us if our councils on all sides were to take unanimous action, than if they were to be scattered and go against the cities in threes. Although we also want to hope comfortingly to God Almighty that he will grant his grace, so that we may compare ourselves on all sides of the understanding, also in all other respects Christianly. However, if there should be a lack of this, as we do not want to provide for ourselves, then our mind, will or opinion is not at all to be taken away from us by our grandfather, the Margrave, and your love, as our friends.

because we are already in hereditary and other friendly contracts with each other, but to show ourselves friendly to your love in all respects, and graciously and favorably to the cities. Likewise, we provide ourselves to your love again in desperation. In addition, we do not know by the grace of God that our grandfather, Margrave Georgen, your beloved and our beloved have ever met in matters concerning the faith; we also hope and pray to God that he will more graciously keep them and us in Christian unity of faith, and for the sake of the sacraments he has instituted, for his praise and glory. And although we have never accepted to represent Doctor Martin Luther and Eisleben, or other things of which your beloved further reports, as we also place them at their own responsibility, without doubt they will know how to inform, instruct, and answer them; moreover, we cannot respect what your beloved causes to attract such things and the like of Doctor Luther and Eisleben against us in their letter: nevertheless, they are things that touch history and not doctrine. For your beloved know how we both were condemned against our cousins, and your beloved sisters-in-law, and how we ourselves were partly condemned, and we are all sinners and human beings; but in no way do we hope that your beloved will consider both of them, and especially Luther's doctrine, as wrong; as we have not noted the same from your beloved until now. After the aforementioned our personal meeting by the councillors at Salfeld, the content of their recorded departure, was considered to be a stately, also more fruitful promotion of the Rodachian trade, for which, for the above-mentioned and such other reasons, we cannot consider or consider it otherwise: so once again to your love is our quite friendly request, which is to the things to good and our all-side Nothdurft after with our Oheimen, the Markgrafen, and us on appointed time and Malstatt against Schleiz, personally and friendly conversed, to come together, and to sign the writ, which the aforementioned councillors placed next to Salfeld to the councillors of Nuremberg, and which we send to your beloved besides our part, their part, and not to complain about sending it to our uncle, the margrave; as we are in your love's friendly confidence that she will not refuse the same out of foreknowledge. For where your beloved, for the sake of these important matters, is to meet with us personally at the time and place indicated

If we were to refuse and refuse to come together, we would have to make the same known to our uncle, the Margrave, and on our part let the matter remain so. And so that we may know your love's mind on it, we ask your love's immediate answer. This we do not want to do to your love's friendly opinion, which we are kindly inclined and willing to serve. Date Torgau, Monday after Jacobi [26 July] Anno Domini 1529.

869 Landgrave Philip's replica to the Elector, August 1, 1529.

This letter together with the following ones up to No. 872 is found in Müller's History, Cap. 18, p. 261 ff.

Our friendly services, and what we are able of love and good, before. Highborn Prince, kind, dear grandfather, brother-in-law and godfather! We have received your love's answer to our next letter, to the farewell recently taken by our councillors at Rodach, to our own personal meeting next Bartholomew and to the announcement of the day at Schwabach, the understanding in which your love, our kindly dear uncle and brother, Margrave George of Brandenburg, and we, together with some of the towns we want to leave, are concerned, and we have read all the contents at length. And we do not want to be too polite to your love for a requested answer to this, that not less, as we have indicated to your love in our previous writing, we had dispatched our councillors to Rodach on such a day with sufficient instruction and perfect authority, also for all things for which speech or action could have occurred, so that such a parting or joint consideration could have been without any necessity at all, and ours could finally have acted and concluded in it, that we refer to the same our instruction, which is still present. And we cannot report on this or any other matter for which they have not had sufficient and perfect instruction and command, neither from the parting nor from our councils, who, after having discussed such parting with us and been present at the action, should have helped to discuss such causes at our own meeting, and should have known of them: why, for the aforementioned reasons, we have left it at our discretion for this reason, and by no means know how to grant that the appointed day should be set aside.

Schwabach be announced to the cities, but that we let it continue its straight course and let our councils visit it. For it is no less burdensome to us than it is disgraceful, as reported before, that we, who before sought and intended to seek such things from the cities, now want to reject this and seek a back way. But if your love persists in its opinion, for the sake of our meeting, so that in this as in other things we may comply with your love as much as possible and not suffer anything to be done to us: Although this is most burdensome for us, if your love and Margrave George want to meet in person at Schleiz one day seven or eight before the day at Schwabach, and attend the day at Schwabach as it stands, we will send our councillors there to your two loves with perfect authority and all necessary report, so that they may act and decide for the best in everything that is useful to decide and that we ourselves could do and act in person; For it is not only insecurity and inconvenience for us to come to this in person, because we do not want to pay much attention to this, it is difficult, but also because of other marital matters, which are as much and more important to us and our lands and people, because of which we have summoned other lords and friends to us at this time, it is impossible. To this end, your love and Margrave George can act with our councilors, who will have such a perfect command, without our own presence, and immediately both eight days before and on St. Bartholomew's Day (for which reason it is not necessary to extend the day to Schwabach). And we do not doubt that your love will consider this, please it, and allow the day of Schwabach to proceed, and also provide it with its representatives. For this is what your love will propose: namely, that our councillors, if we do not first meet in person and the deal is decided unanimously among us, go to the day in three groups and each act for himself; so that, however useful and fruitful or helpful it would be, we could consider 2c., prevented, and on the appointed day may be acted upon fruitfully, unanimously and without reference. Accordingly, for your love's sake, we will not provide for anything else, except that the visitation of the day at Schleiz, as we have indicated, will please her, and that the cities will not be charged with the appointed day at Schwabach. If, however, such a day should ever be extended, and should have to be extended, may your dear ones have the proclamation of the

The same (which we herewith send to your love again) for themselves, also to Margrave Georgen, and report therein that both your loves therefore have authority from us. Thus our seal, which would perhaps prolong the matter, is without necessity, and the notice can come to the cities all the sooner. And then, if your beloved will give us further notice, we will send our councillors with complete authority, as stated above, on St. Bartholomew's Day to your beloved and Margrave George to Schleiz. As your dear ones also report that they do not know of the graces of God that your dear ones, Margrave Georgen and our scholars have ever met before in matters of faith, we have not stated this in our letter, and if your dear ones have reported this, our writing has not been properly read to them. For we have set it thus: if we should be divided, if our scholars should be divided 2c., that is future, and not past. As then your love confesseth in their own writing, that we are all men: so it may also easily come to pass, as we have truly experienced b<sup>h</sup>er in other many things with history, and may well yet come to pass in cases 1) before which also we with faithful diligence will diligently beseech the Almighty; and we hope to God Almighty, through His divine grace and mercy, that those who are divided over the sacrament will soon meet in Marburg, as they have attributed to us from all parts, and that they will amicably settle the dispute. In addition, we hold, as your love suggests, D. Martin Luther's doctrine, concerning salvation, in no other way than Christian, honorable and righteous, in which and the holy Gospel, God willing, we want to remain steadfast. But as for the other subsidiary books, which have been written and issued from time to time, we leave that to himself, and let the work bear witness to its master. But what are similar, and which Eisleben has let go out several times, called the German proverbs, that is and should be nothing. We are also opposed to this, and we rightly condemn it as a Christian offense, and with us every pious Christian who is tired of cutting off, persecuting, and afflicting his neighbor's honor. For he, Eisleben, has publicly acted unjustly in this and against brotherly love; as your love can see from the confession of his own handwriting, of which we have told your 870 The Elector's answer to this of August 9, 1529.

Our friendly services, and what we are able of love and good, always before. Highborn Prince, friendly dear uncle, brother-in-law and godfather ! We have read all contents of E. L.'s letter to our next given answer, concerning our councillors' farewell recently taken at Rodach, also our personal meeting on St. Bartholomew's Day and the announcement of the day at Schwabach, which your love's letter holds on the date at Lichtenau on Sunday, St. Peter's Day, and was handed over to us here yesterday by a messenger delivered by our sheriff at Eisenach. And there is no doubt that your love has been told by her counsellors, whom she recently had there in Rodach, for what reasons it was considered necessary and good that your love, such as our grandfather and brother, Margrave George of Brandenburg, and we, should meet in our own person before the day in Schwabach. However, we note that your love is once again inconvenienced for reasons indicated by E. L. in her letter. in her letter, it will again not be convenient to attend the same day in Schleiz in person, but otherwise to dispatch her counsellors there with full force: So we have now written the same to his love by a hurried messenger, and besides this have sent the announcement of the day at Schwabach, made in his love's and our name, with notice that your love has sent it to both of us in the power of attorney, and sent it in part to his love; with a friendly request that his love may send the same letter, if his love also has it sent, to those of Nuremberg without delay, so that they and those sent to the other cities may not travel in vain. That we have also indicated in our next reply how we do not know by the grace of God that our grandfather and brother, the Margrave, your love and our scholars, in matters touching the faith, have ever been in contact with each other until now, has come to pass from this, that we have heard the words which follow next after those which your love repeat in the present letter, at that time from the past, as namely these: How often then would your love and we have had to do with each other 2c. But our opinion is not at all to interpret such or other of your love's letters differently than your love's mind is, but rather to note your love's indication in that, also what your love reports on account of Luther's teaching, which concerns salvation, quite kindly, and also want to hope comfortingly for the Almighty, because those who, because of the sacrament of the body and blood of our Savior JEsu Christ, are divided [come together, as they are attributed by all parts] 1) God would grant His grace that they may compare themselves with one another in Christianity because of this same division. We do not want to let this go unreported to your love, as our friendly dear grandfather, in our friendly opinion, and we are inclined to your love for friendly service. Date Torgau, 9 Aug. Anno Domini 1529.

871: The Landgrave of Hesse's own handwritten letter to the Elector of Saxony, in which he urges an answer as to what he has to provide for himself from the Elector. September 14, 1529.

This letter and also the following one are found in Müller's Historie, Cap. 18, p. 261 ff.

Dear grandfather, brother-in-law and godfather! I have now written more than once to E. L. that such credible opinions have come to me that Imperial Maj. Maj., after she has now brought her things to a treaty, wants to bring the Lutherans to the obedience of the papal church, which I, as I would like to see good for E. L. and for all of us, should not behave otherwise. If now is the time to warn, to advise, or to ask, then now is the time: for truly, I receive such credible warnings from princes, lords, cities, counts, and nobles that I now know not to despise it. Therefore my friendly request to E. L. is, let him think about the things, while it can still be done. I have no doubt that if one wants to get a little involved in the matter, then advice and help can be found from many, since one cannot afford to do so; but if one forgets that our enemies have the advantage over us, then we will not be able to help them.

1) Supplemented by us from the previous letter.

then God help us, as they say, it is truly half lost. One may well send an embassy now to Imperial Maj. and ask for an honest peace or for discord; that would be the next way. For my part, E. L. must not think that I fear so badly; for if I see that no one wants to help, and it will not be otherwise, then I also want to get a hole or a treaty as well as another. But if E. L. and others will seek, do, and consider the time of their children, their subjects, and also the benefit of all of us, and the highest, our salvation and God's word, even if we do not become eternally our own, then my body and my goods shall not be lacking. It is good to find counsel in these matters, if we ourselves do not otherwise *) beat out the people who are eager to help us. Therefore, in summary: I know so much that, God willing, or so many princes, noble and ignoble, must lie and all suspicion must be lacking, your love, I and others who adhere to the Gospel, will be forced away again by force. And if your love wants to know where such warnings come from, send your love a confidant to me, and I will tell him as much as is due me. Now if your love will defend itself against Caesar, if he will force us from it, let your love write it to me; if you will not defend yourselves and suffer, or fall away from it, as I hope to God you will not, let your love write it to me, and what I shall put off to your love, if I be overdrawn. For necessity requireth that one know what he knoweth to put off to another. And please, let your love tell its writers to leave the polite answers, and in your love's name, if your love does not want to write to me itself, let them finally give me the right answer, what your love's mind is in it. For I would gladly serve your love with my body and my goods, as one to whom I heartily wish good things, which God knows best. But if nothing helps, and we all become so despondent that we do not want to defend ourselves, and leave one another and watch one another, then God have mercy, it is nothing but a plague from God on us despondent Germans. And your love will never let itself be persuaded, if I and others go down, that your love will be spared; and whoever tells E. L., he advises E. L. unfaithfully, or does not understand it; and even if E. L. were already in written communication with the King of Bohemia, it will not help. Now what E. L. is inclined to do in the above, and I know myself to be

1) Here we have erased "not" because it is too much.

E. L., let E. L. know that, and what is E. L.'s concern, how to get rid of this burden and burden. And E. L. take my letter in good part, for it is certainly done in good opinion, to E. L. and to all who cling to God's word. I am inclined to serve E. L.. Date Tambach, Tuesday after Nativity of Mary [Sept. 14] 1529. Philip, L. of Hesse.

872 The Elector's answer to the previous letter, September 23, 1529.

See No. 871.

Reverend Prince, kind dear uncle, brother-in-law and godfather! I have received E. L.'s letter, which she has now addressed to me with her own hand, for the sake of her careful plea and warning, and I do not note this and E. L.'s plea and warning in any other way than very kindly. L.'s request and warning in no other way than in a very friendly manner, and I want to earn it for E. L. in a friendly way again, as I can and may do it. And when E. L., in addition to others, asks me to make my mind known to her, whether in such a case, of which E. L. writes, I also want to defend myself or suffer, or fall away from the word, as E. L. did not hope, also what E. L. should provide for me, if she is overdrawn: then E. L. shall, if God wills, not find anything else, if God wills it, shall not decide otherwise than that I, through the bestowal of his grace, shall recover and remain by his word, at the cost of body, honor and goods, or whatever it may be, on this earth. But what E. L. wants to do for me and others who cling to the word, and also wants to agree with God, if Imperial Majesty wants to oppose us to the same. Majesty would allow himself to be moved against us on account of the same things: that, as the most important thing that can happen to E. L., me, and the others at this time, must be considered and discussed. For if ever a matter has come to E. L. or to me that has needed conversation and good faithful counsel, I am sure that it is this one. I hope also that the practices are before, as they always want, so they cannot be spent now before the winter against E. L. or me. However, I understand that our message, which is sent to Imperial Majesty for the sake of the next Speier farewell, will also be returned. Majesty, will also return, and then be heard, what has been the Emperor's answer: according to this, one can proceed, and also consider what is to be indicated to Her Majesty again by another message. And, God willing, we have the whole winter before us, and can move and send our things with all necessity.

-----	----	----	-------	-----

I am obliged to do in this matter before God, myself, my lands and people, and others, as my neighbors, especially E. L., according to our agreements, or it agrees with God and my conscience that I want to do the same and not be the last one with the help of God; only that this be well considered beforehand and decided beforehand, what E. L., I, and others, can and will be able to do with God in such a case, which concerns the Emperor, so that we do not fall into God's judgment because of the word against the same word, and the punishment comes upon us with scorn and ridicule, and with danger to our souls, since the Almighty will protect E. L. and me from it. And that we would like to talk about it ourselves personally without delay: so I ask most kindly that E. L. should come to Margrave Georgen [Oct. 3] against Schleiz. As I then write to E. L. from my office about this, and other things cannot be prevented, I ask most kindly that E. L. will do it at least for the sake of this matter. So Margrave George, whom the matters concern as well as both of us, is then also at hand, and we can then talk to each other confidentially on E. L.'s report, as much as E. L. wants to report, what has reached E. L.: so E. L. shall then be well informed of my mind by me, since I cannot write to E. L. now, before we talk to each other, nor do I want to write about land. And E. L. shall not be burdened with this answer of mine, as I want to provide myself to E. L.. I will earn this for E. L. in a very friendly way. Date at Lochau, Thursday after Mauritius [Sept. 23] Anno Domini 1529.

873 The instruction agreed between the Elector of Saxony John and the Margrave George of Brandenburg at Schleiz for their envoys to the Schwabach Convention arranged for October 16, 1529.

From Müller's History, cap. 19, p. 281.

1st Instruction, what by the grace of God ours, Johannsen, Duke of Saxony, Elector 2c., and ours, Georgen, Margrave of Brandenburg 2c., Councillors, decreed on St. Gall's Day [Oct. 16] at Schwabach, on their riding there, first at Nuremberg with the elders there, and then, shall act at Schwabach, at and besides all other messages sent, in matters concerning the confidential understanding.

(2) First of all, on the Thursday before St. Gall's [Oct. 14], our councilors are to arrive in Nuremberg at the earliest in the evening, and there advertise to the councilors of the Council of the Elders who have knowledge of the matter, according to the announcement of our gracious offer, as follows: After the reason for the understanding has been established, as well as the necessity: If anyone of the covenanting relatives wants to be attacked, damaged, or overdrawn on account of the divine word, the holy gospel, and faith, and what is pending on the same, that the covenanting relatives should save and help each other, and also in such a way cordially and faithfully put together their body, goods, and all property. So that we do not enter into such a union with anyone who is not of the same true Christian faith as us and other relatives, and who also holds the same baptism and sacrament with us now and in the future: Let it be necessary that the articles on which the unity of our faith and Christianity rests be first confessed to one another, and that the same confession 1) be placed in the prescription of the agreement of articles to articles; and whichever state would not be in agreement with us in one or more articles, with him no understanding shall be entered into. If, in the future, any of us who are related to us in unity should credibly feel and discover that a state has fallen away from one or more of the articles of our faith and Christianity, he should, if he persists in his apostasy and does not again unite with us without delay, then he should no longer be able to share in or receive this understanding, and whatever else is due him from us, the other united states, on that account.

(3) Secondly, for the sake of His Imperial Majesty the Roman Emperor. Majesty's exclusion, we have considered: Since this understanding is to be based solely on rescue and resistance (which is permitted by natural and imperial rights), the highest temporal authority has neither the right nor the justification to deprive someone of this natural protection. Since this understanding is to be based solely on rescue and resistance (which is permitted by natural and imperial rights, so that even the highest temporal authority does not have the right to deprive anyone of the same natural protection, neither by itself without means, nor by its business), the reported exception should be made with such a measure, so that one does not commit more in this than one owes before God and rightly, so that the understanding is not unjustified.

fruitful and in vain, and be found more a comforting salvation and handling than a useless pretence, since most of the danger now wants to lie in the place 1); but otherwise and outside of this we and others of our kinsmen would know how to hold ourselves in all ways to Imperial Majesty's obedience. Majesty to all owed obedience.

4. And since there is no doubt that the mind and opinion of an honorable council at Nuremberg is no different than to enter into understanding only with those who are of a right Christian faith, and also to hold one baptism and sacrament with them, and that in such understanding no one is excluded further than as much as one is justly owed before God: So we would not have wanted to conceal such our concerns and resolutions from them in a gracious and good opinion, confident that they would agree with us and send their message to Schwabach on the appointed day, along with others, to act in the same way with the other states, and to compare us all to a unanimous Christian understanding.

(5) What then our councilors encounter with those of Nuremberg, they know how to act well before and after, according to the instruction mentioned, and also with the other estates at Schwabach.

6th And when the said counsellors come to Schwabach, they shall first of all speak that we confess the ground of this understanding, that is, our holy faith, and also what we hold of the holy sacraments of baptism and of the body and blood of Christ, to one another, and forthwith declare the articles of our confession 2) as the same are delivered unto them beside this instruction; and also say on our account, which of such of our faith and holding of the holy sacraments and other Christian ordinances are not in agreement with us, and remain so, but now or hereafter hold or perform another, that we will not enter into any helpful understanding with one or the other. We also declare on our behalf that those who do not agree with us on such matters of faith and the observance of the holy sacraments and other Christian ordinances, but who now or in the future hold or would hold a different one, that we could not or would not enter into any helpful understanding with them. Our councilors, the councilors of the other estates, and the embassies shall hear and take note of this in their minds and opinions (before they further speak of other articles and the substance of the agreements made). And if there are any among them who are not of the mind to confess our faith with us, and to keep the holy sacraments as we do, with him or them our councils shall hear of this.

1) That is, with the emperor.

2) No. 874.

We do not want any further understanding, but only deal with those who have and confess one faith, one baptism, and one sacrament with us, and who subsequently report our reservations to Imperial Majesty. for the sake of exception.

(7) Thirdly, let our counsellors report to the other estates in agreement with us, as we have considered, since matters now rest on it, where something of the divine word and of our faith should be done against us and them, and the others, our kinsmen, that it might be subdued by the imperial Majesty himself or his decreed commanders with the greatest power, and in about a year's time, which the Almighty graciously wishes to avert. If this understanding should be fruitful, useful, and conducive to the salvation of all our people, lands, and kinsmen, that such understanding be thoroughly and heartily intended and directed, so that it may be comforting and conducive to salvation even in the face of great valiant force. For if some of the members of this union, be they the greatest or the least, should be precipitated and drawn in by such things, because they do not receive powerful support and help from the other members, it is to be feared that it might make the adversaries more hearty and give them all the more incentive to act in the same way against the other; Otherwise, if they saw or knew of a valiant resistance, things would be turned to peace, or to other convenient ways, and one sword would keep the other in the scabbard. Therefore, let it be highly necessary and good that the relatives of this settlement do not consider any temporal opportunity or inconvenience, nor neither body nor goods, but consider and reflect with right earnest and Christian hearts what will be in store for us all in the end, for the sake of all eternal and temporal welfare. Namely, if someone among us, as touched upon above, overreaches, and we should be so divided that one would thereby have to fall away from the holy and only saving Word of God to eternal damnation, or at least lose and forsake, not only that which we, the united kinsmen, have been burdened to turn to for salvation and help, or have had theurge, but also all that we would have and are able to do. We would also hardly have to give an account before God that we would have considered a lesser temporal disadvantage more than preserving our subjects and relatives in the eternal Word with God's grace and help.

008      And      for      this      cause      the      haste      of      help,      whereof to Rodach, almost careless, also not sufficient for some constant rescue and handling, and especially half of the following points:

9th First, that the reported haste of help at Rodach is not greater than fifteen hundred on horseback and three thousand on foot, which is a small thing compared with the might and power of our adversaries, and is to be regarded as nothing.

(10) Secondly, it is understood in the Rodachian Charter that any prince, duke, or imperial city that is overrun shall provide itself with the necessary ordnance and ammunition for rescue and assistance. Now, however, if a kinsman were to be overrun who did not have the means to provide and maintain himself with guns and ammunition for the necessities of war, then if he were not helped in this way, the hurried help on horseback and on foot would also be fruitless, since no righteous warriors would go on such a campaign, since they know that the warlord is provided with guns for the necessities of war.

(11) Thirdly, by virtue of the Rodachian Act, where a relative is in need of urgent assistance, that the same, whether it is done in whole or in part, is to be recognized by the appointed councillors. Which, however, would also be troublesome and burdensome. For if it were to remain with the opinion, and a state of this agreement were to be overdrawn, then it could easily happen that the councils, especially if it were to remain with the matters of set opinion, would come together slowly, or would not agree on the matters at all, and thus the urgent assistance would be recognized too late or not at all, or would not be granted, and be of little or no use to him who needs it, though it is to be presumed and feared that if, for the sake of these matters, something mighty is done against someone related to this understanding, it will be done with all haste and with all possible advantage; Therefore all delay, as much as possible, in preventing this part of the union, shall be necessary, useful, and good.

12. Fourthly, although it has not been granted or finally rejected by the embassies of the honorable imperial cities at the meeting in Rodach, we, the Elector of Saxony, as well as the Dukes of Lüneburg, Duke Henry of Mecklenburg, Landgrave Philip of Hesse, Count Albrechten and Count Gebhard of Mansfeld, would like to enter into a preliminary understanding with the city of Magdeburg, Count Albrechten and Count Gebhard of Mansfeld, with the city of Magdeburg, would be considered, although our highest consolation of Christian unity is to be placed in God alone, and not in any temporal power, that we should nevertheless use the ways and means, so the almighty, benevolent God sends to us for our abstention, as His benevolent instrument, should not be despised. And because the power of the adversary is so valiant and great, it can do no harm to strengthen us with those who are also Christians and of our faith, so that all of us may be saved and helped in a more noble and comforting way: Our councillors should therefore continue to urge and act with the other estates, councils and embassies, so that not only the other princes, counts and the city of Magdeburg, but also other potentates and cities in the lands of Saxony, Brunswick, Lüneburg, on the sea and elsewhere out here in the Holy Roman Empire, who are of our faith and hold the holy sacraments, are taken and drawn into this understanding, and so that it is absolutely a unanimous union. Which then may be not a little frightening to the adversaries, and move or urge them the more to keep peace with us on account of the divine word. Thus the princes, counts, and cities of Saxony, Brunswick, Lüneburg, and the sea, 1) which are now thought of, are of such power that they may help us bravely, or, at least, endure so much for us, the other allies, against others who oppose us and God's word, that we may do the more noble and mighty salvation and help to one another.

13. Fifth, necessity requires that the article, which is set at Rodach because of the opening, be further explained and extended; So that it does not apply to a common opening, but also to a situation in which the allies lose a battle, or someone else from among them is so over-hurried that they cannot make a stand, that they then flee to the nearest castles and cities of the other allies, and have an opening with their soldiers, guns, and supplies as long as their opportunity and need requires; But that the state, which has need of such an opening, shall keep and show itself with its men-at-arms in the same manner as the open city's own men-at-arms.

014 Sixthly, in the agreement at Rodach it is stipulated which part of us kinsmen shall be helped to choose a chief captain over all the people of war; therein we consider, if it should happen that a city is helped and that the same has a chief captain over all the people of war.

1) "See" put by us instead of: "See". Meant with it, as follows from Z19, primarily the king of Denmark .

(15) The seventh is the agreement at Rodach that the cities are as many as the princes and rulers have; that the votes should also be the same number, namely six, from which all kinds of division, confusion, neglect, harm and damage arise, and at times no majority can be made, or could not have been decided.

(17) Therefore let us consider that, for the sake of speedy help and mighty pressure, the deficiencies which have been pointed out are to be corrected in the following ways for the comfort, benefit, and good of all those who are united with us, so that it may indeed be found to be a true salvation, and not a pseudo-covenant or union in vain.

018 And first, that after the words of the present bill, that as long as this agreement endureth, the united kinsmen shall mean one another kindly, faithfully, and of a right heart, this opinion shall be set forth: Which of the Uniting Relatives, for the sake of the articles concerning our holy faith and what is pending concerning it, which we now confess against each other and are to be placed in the Uniting Covenant, would or would be feuded against, attacked, attacked or harmed by anyone, whoever he or they might be, that for the rescue, protection, and defense of the same, the other members of the Union shall faithfully assemble their bodies, goods, and chattels, and shall with all their might draw upon him that is so assaulted, or that is in some danger thereof, without any evasion or rebuttal, as follows. Accordingly, it shall also be expressly stipulated in the charter of agreement what princes, lords, counts, lords, cities, spiritual and secular, will in time accept the holy pure gospel, also hold the many-named articles equal to us, and request that they be taken into this agreement, that they shall at all times, for the greater planting and spreading of the gospel and divine word, be taken into such our union by necessary letters of support and reversal:

(19) First, when, or as often as, the united ones come together, and wish to discuss the matters on which this understanding is based, all the united ones, or their skilful ones, shall be heard, since God often gives to the last that which he hides from the first. But nevertheless, as is set forth hereafter, there shall be no more than seven votes, which shall finally have to decide in the matters in question; also the said votes shall be distributed, as follows: namely, the Royal Duke of Denmark, one; the Elector or Electors, as much as at this time or in the future is related to the agreement, one; likewise all the Princes, two votes; the Counts and Lords, one vote, one vote, one vote, one vote, one vote, one vote, one vote, one vote, one vote, one vote, one vote, one vote, one vote, one vote, one vote, one vote, one vote.

                one                vote.                and                one                vote.

One; and the free imperial and commercial cities, two votes, namely, the Upper Lands, one, and the Saxon or Dutch, the other. And each estate shall compare which persons shall have the votes. In order that order be kept in the votes, and also with the questioning in the indicated assembly of the unification relatives, the Elector of Saxony, as he is also otherwise entitled to the questioning in the Empire, shall have to inquire.

020 And if all the estates of the agreement or of their delegates shall be heard, then the same estates or their delegates, if they be of the seven voices, shall meet together every part with them that are of the voice; and what shall be decided by the seven voices, and considered in the council for the best, it shall be so. But if the seven voices do not agree on a unanimous opinion, the greater part of them shall decide.

21 Secondly: Because two kinds of help, one urgent and one persistent, are considered highly necessary in this action, the urgent help, so that it may be comforting and useful to all allies, shall be ordered to two thousand on horseback and ten thousand on foot. Also, for the preservation of such warriors, two months' pay shall be deposited at a certain time at one or more locations, as may be and should be compared at the present time, without danger, for this purpose, according to the order, as each one and his ancestors have commonly been assigned and posted one against the other in the aid of the empire.

22 Thirdly: But after we George, Margrave of Brandenburg, for ourselves and in place of our young cousin, have reported our concern to our dear grandfather and brother, the Elector of Saxony, and that we are not able to support our parents in the realm; as our grandfather and brother, the Landgrave of Hesse, recently considered the same against ourselves at Speier, and gave us Imperial Majesty the right to demand that we be allowed to go on with our work. Majest. We cannot submit to the old demands, nor can we allow ourselves to be ordered to help in a hurry, other than according to our own safe ability, which we also want to take care of with the other states.

023 But whatsoever, fourthly, of earls, lords, and cities, in this Christian understanding, or would yet come into it by the grace of God, who without means are not attached to the kingdom, with the same shall their help and support be taken. For the sake of exposition compare. If it should come about, as follows, that in a hurry one of the covenanting parties should draw comfort from among us to the other, who is being harassed, in the common consolation of all estates, then one traveler shall be counted for three and a half footmen. And in order that the aforementioned money may be used righteously and for necessity for urgent assistance where the need arises, since God is present, the captain shall, as aforementioned, be a prince, or, if no prince is available, then an earl or lord, who is also skilled in such a matter, who has understanding, and who is not too hasty or potherical; who shall also now be ordered to attack such deposited money with the advice, knowledge and will of the assigned war councils, and to order a certain number of warriors on horseback and on foot as quickly and as best they can, and also to use them more effectively for the rescue and help of the person or persons harassed, as this union is able to do. It should also be discussed and decided now what the appointment and salary of such a supreme captain, who is a prince, should be, so that he can maintain himself and receive necessary support; but if the supreme captain has made the agreement with the subordinate captains, he should have this passed on to the other united relatives, who should be more willing to do so and know how to order their salary. And what all our councils and embassies decide with each other in such and other matters, that shall then be dealt with as conduively as it can be done with the prince who is elected to the captaincy, and his mind shall also be heard therein, and now at Schwabach, in addition to other things, it shall be decreed by whom such action shall be done with the prince elected to the captaincy. For it is comforting to God to hope that nothing will be started before or during the winter and before spring with a mighty deed against us united kinsmen, so that there is convenient time for action and regulation of all necessities. The supreme captain, who has now been appointed, should not be appointed for longer than one year, and the relatives should allow him to stay longer, or then appoint another one.

(24) Fifth, six councillors of war shall be assigned to the captain; namely, three from the princes, counts, and lords, and three from the honorable free, imperial, and commercial cities; with which six assigned councillors of war the captain shall discuss all matters, and what the councillors of war unanimously decide, the captain shall be obliged to comply with. But where the councils of war meet in

If the four councillors are of the same opinion, and the same number disagree, the captain shall diligently consider the matter, give a chance, and with his vote make the majority and conclude it. Otherwise, if four councillors of war are of one mind, the captain shall, as if they were all of one mind, follow the advice of the four councillors. And the captain shall not do anything for himself or herself outside of the councils of war, even if they are of a different opinion.

25. The sixth: And for greater prudence the estates shall, each for himself, have and make good inquiries, even as he knows how to do this most easily and conveniently; And what each estate inquires about (which would be practiced or done to the disadvantage of the united confederates by the adversaries), these same estates shall make known to the captain, and also one estate to the other without delay; as is also to be done by the captain himself for the half of the office, and thus good counsel shall be appointed everywhere within and outside the realm. And if the captain receives such reports, which are dangerous and worrying, and should not be despised, so that the things against us united kinsmen may all or especially turn to rebellion, insurrection, invasion, damage, or such acts of war, then the captain shall require the six councillors of war to come to him from hour one, hold the reports before them, and hear their advice on them. If the captain finds in the council of the councillors of war that the reports are so considerable that a counterattack must be initiated without delay, the captain, together with the councillors of war, shall have the power to attack the deposited money for urgent aid, and to order the troops on horseback and on foot, and to use them for the rescue and good of our allies. The captain shall also be ordered to seek, as much as possible, such cavalry and infantry as are not related to the allies or to him, if he were to be a prince of the union, so that the allies may use their cavalry and infantry for persistent help or, furthermore, use them in a mighty assault and be all the stronger, and also cut off such foreign cavalry and infantry from the enemy. If, however, the captain and the councillors of war find and judge that the sum of cavalymen and footmen ordered for urgent assistance is too small in view of the emergency, they shall be allowed to leave.

The captain, after the council of the councillors of war, shall have the power to demand a further addition from the confederates in general, or from the nearest seated one, at the expense of all of us, as much as he and the councillors of war deem necessary and good; so that the urgent help against the adversaries may persist until the confederates arise with their further insistence and power. And as the captain, according to the advice of the ordered councillors of war and several votes, requires each one to such urgent help, he shall be obliged to show himself obedient.

26. For the seventh time, the Captain and the Councillors of War shall, in addition to requesting and summoning the men of war for urgent assistance, confine us, the Electors, Princes, Counts, Lords and Councillors, to a special, peacefully situated place, where to deliberate and decide, if and where necessity will require it, to undertake the great and persevering resistance, how such will be done, and each united person to move in with body and goods, also what and how the most fruitful and useful action should be taken with the urgent help. If, however, the captain and the councillors of war find that things will immediately move and be sent to a main war, and that the urgent aid determined, nor a common supplement, would not be enough to resist the advance, then, without a prior meeting or sending and consultation, all allies shall, at the request of the captain and the councillors of war, give notice of and request for the urgent aid. Especially those who have been sitting closest to each other, shall, without delay or common knowledge of the further help, approach each other on horseback and on foot, with artillery and all property, to the land and to the people, and render help; each in such a manner and not otherwise than as if it were up to him without means; as it is in truth, and would not be otherwise. But with the difference that those among the estates who are in a hurry to help one another shall do so, as before, at the expense and damage of the others, so that no part is burdened before the other, and in this case, as in the like, one traveler shall be counted as three and a half on foot. And since the Christian union and constitution does not mean anything else for the counter-defense, but to precede it by the bestowal of divine grace, so that those who are united, and against the word of God, also right and equity [would be overdrawn, protected]: the captain and his assigned warriors are to be protected by the law.

If the captain and the councillors of war have not considered the certain knowledge and experience of the countermeasures and attacks, or other events, in such a way that urgent and persistent help is still needed, then the captain and the councillors of war shall consult with each other as to how the aforementioned and anxious trouble may occur and be averted with the least harm and damage, either by action for peace or by other suitable means. But where peace is not to be obtained, it will be sought by us, if things will suffer it; that then the resistance, as necessity requires, may be made in the name of the Lord, with heart and all faithfulness.

27 Eighthly: If it were to happen that our adversaries would attack us united kinsmen in many places, as they easily and undoubtedly intend to do, they would be of the opinion that each of the allies or the more parts of them should have so much to do with themselves that one could not come to the aid of the other, so that they would soon be divided and the adversaries would have their way, take over our Christian lands in whole or in part, drive out the Word of God, and re-establish the papacy, which the Almighty God graciously wants to happen, and re-establish the papacy, which the almighty God will graciously allow, it will be highly necessary if the attack or invasion were to occur in more than one place against us united kinsmen, that in the captain's and war councils, ordered to the urgent help, diligent and faithful consideration and decision shall stand, at which place they consider the most necessary, fruitful and best, to watch with the urgent help and to do rescue, that it happens. But in order that the pressure and the persistent help, if the necessity requires it, may also take place in this case, the captain together with the councils of war (as far as it can and may suffer such a delay without harm and damage to the united relatives) shall immediately describe to another place the churons and princes, together with all other states of this union, as reported before, and require it, by which it may then be diligently considered and decided at what place or how the assistance shall further be rendered, so that no one may be charged as if he had not kept his part properly with the assistance, but shall know how to show himself and keep himself in all respects, as has been discussed and decided before.

28. to the ninth: But will attacking

Many places in a hurry with such advantage or power that it could not be delayed without danger, harm, and damage to the preceding gathering or sending, and that the cause of the Gospel, as well as the country and its people, could not be saved in any other way, because the confederates would have to gather together in one group with all their might: Then each member of the confederation shall, at the request of the captain who has been notified, be ordered to render urgent assistance, but with the prior consultation and further decision of the councillors of war, to do so, and be obliged and obligated to assemble with all his might, horse and foot, into one group. They must also do so faithfully, without any opposition, and nothing must be considered in this, except that the word, and subsequently the temporal, as land and people, may be preserved and saved, even if it must happen with temporal damage to us and our subjects. Because the minds and intentions of the adversaries are finally focused on two things: one, that they bring to themselves the land and people of all of us who love the word of God; and the other, that they drive us and ours from the word of God, drive out all Christian preachers with us, and replant and establish the papacy with all its ungodly abuses.

Twenty-ninth, the tenth: Since not all cases that may arise in the future according to God's will can be provided for this time, the reason, beginning and resolution of this understanding must finally rest on the fact that above all things God's glory and His holy word are to be considered, and for this reason, each one of us should treat the other, and all of us together, with a right heart and faithfulness in these matters, and should not consider or want to consider anything in this matter other than what we owe to God, and what each of us would like the other to do or have done.

(30) Eleventhly: If it comes to a persistent or great help, and especially if the same should be divided or rescue should be done more than in one place, that the necessity should require and be good, to order from the electors and princes of the union still a supreme captain with six war councils over the persistent help, as is set before, for the sake of the urgent help. These, together with the other captain, must also be those who otherwise hold the seven votes of all the estates over the whole war business and have the power to command all things: however, the captain over the urgent assistance and his assigned gun, with his war councils, should have their own

The only thing is that he must be obedient to the other highest captain over the mighty shell and his assigned councillors, as the seven main voices, in everything that is created and commanded by them for the sake of the common estates. However, the captain of the urgent aid, together with his soldiers, shall also be heard in the council of the supreme captain and his war councillors, where the troops are together; however, only the supreme captain with his councillors, as the seven voices, shall finally decide.

31 Twelfth: The supreme captain of the persevering help, together with his assigned men-of-war, shall be given their usual maintenance, so that they may be able to keep themselves in good condition for their need, understanding that also the captain in this business, as his own business, will be satisfied with a fair amount. But in all other use or profit, no more than, according to the number of his own people, the due part shall follow them, and everything else shall be drawn and used in the common use of all united relatives; in the same way it shall be held with the captain, ordered to the urgent help, also in the same cases.

Thirty-two: The thirteenth: He who has now been appointed captain of the urgent assistance, together with his warriors, shall from that time on provide an emergency regiment of war, and so keep it in his hands until it is needed, so that then there will be no lack of it.

33 Fourteenth: Where and how the ordnance, together with its ammunition, is to be most conveniently obtained and preserved for urgent assistance, shall be a matter of concern to the captains and councils of war, and such shall be previously discussed and decreed in their rules of war; however, equality shall be maintained in such and other matters, so that no rank shall be burdened more than the other, according to its opportunity.

34 To the fifteenth: The united kinsmen, or the captain and the councillors of war, which is now considered the most convenient and best thing to do at the meeting in Schwabach, shall also appoint rotmasters and captains over the routers and footmen, and give them a waiting allowance to promise and hold up for a time as many as two thousand routers and ten thousand footmen, so that they may get them in a hurry. In addition to this, some of them are to be dealt with, so that they do not have anyone appointed for them.

in their order this unification freely; and so against us unification relatives wanted to be acted, that they may withdraw, also warn us of the same.

35. sixteenth: If it should happen that one or more of the united kinsmen should be in need of an opening in one or more of the other's castles, cities, lands, and territories, the opening shall be arranged and given to the united kinsman or kinsmen, whatever his or their status may be, with their warband, possessions, and goods, in one or more of the other's lands, principalities, dominions, and territories, castles, cities, and other towns, as long as this union lasts. Those who seek and use the opening for their own needs shall be held, defended, and handled with kindness and goodwill by those who permit and give the opening, as if it applied to each of them. In turn, those who seek the opening shall also use it at their own cost and expense, and shall also hold themselves in the same place under siege and otherwise, as the opening's sovereignty's own people of war, helping to guard, protect, and protect the place, nothing less than is due to the one or ones who seek and use the opening.

36 To the seventeenth: What has not been changed and improved by this concern of ours, understood in the Notel at Rodach, we allow to be and remain, thus set.

37 And for resolution: Since we and other Christian estates, because of the matters touched upon and the recent unpleasant departure from Speier, have dispatched our embassy to Imperial Majesty, it will be good and necessary to advertise and act there according to the instructions given. Maj. to advertise and act there, according to the instructions given, it will be good and necessary, when the reported embassy returns, and we receive other than a gracious, good answer, that we then meet again without delay at the appropriate place, or send our fully authorized embassy, to discuss further what can be done by a new sending to Her Imperial Majesty. Majesty, to show owed obedience and attain Christian peace. Where then Her Imperial Maj. Maj. should ever insist on disgrace and offence or complaint against us united kinsmen, we are not at liberty to say what her Imperial Maj. would say about this union of ours. Maj. of this our union, or of others, should or may be reported with the best of grace and good grace. May God the Almighty and Lord of Peace send it all for His praise and the salvation of our souls, through Christ, His dear Son, Amen.

874 The seventeen so-called 1) Schwabach Articles, presented and adopted at the second Schwabach Convention, October 16, 1529.

About this writing J. T. Müller says in his historical-theological introduction to "Die symbolischen Bücher der eoanaelisch-lutherischen Kirche", p. LVI: The first part of the Augsburg Confession, 'Articles of Faith and Doctrine', was based on those 15 articles which Luther had written at the religious discussion held with Zwingli in Marburg [Oct. 14] 1529. These were redacted by Luther and the other theologians who were with him, at the request of Elector John of Saxony, so that the original 15 became 17, then presented at Schleiz in Voigtland to the Elector and Margrave George of Brandenburg, who there reported on the alliance to be established with Landgrave Philip of Dessia, and finally presented and accepted at the second Schwabach Convention (Oct. 16, 1529)." Elias Frick found in the Ulm Archives the original of our step, the second Schwabach Articles "not to be confused with the 23 Articles of the first Schwabach Con- venis, June 14, 1528), and had them printed in the German Seckendorf, p. 968. Thereafter our text. Without Luther's amen and will, "probably in May 153") the Coburg printer Hans Bern had these articles printed under the title: "Die bekenntnus Martini Luthers aufs dem jtzigigen angestciren Reichstag zu Augspurgk eynlegen, In siebentzeben Artikel verfasst. In the XXX. Jar." At the end: "Printed at Loburgk by Hans Bern." 1 sheet in 4. Against this, the papal theologians present at Augsburg, Wimpina, Mensing, Redörfer, and Rupert El- gersma, wrote a counter-script. Luther responded by printing these articles himself and adding a preface under the title: "Auff das schreien etlicher Papisten, vber die sieben- yehen Artikel. Answer of Martin Luther. Wittenberg. In the M.D.X.X. Jar." No place. 14 sheets in 4. With the printer's mark of Hans Bern of Coburg. - The 17 articles are printed in the Wittenberg edition (1569), vol. IX, p. 490; in the Jena < 1566), vol. V, p. 14; in the Altenburg, vol. V, p. 14; in the Leipzig, vol. XX, 2. 1; in Walch, vol. XVI, 681; in the Erlangen, 1st ed, Vol. 24, p. 322 and 2nd Anst., Vol. 24, p. 338; in Chyträus, Historie der Augsbургischen Confession, 2. 45; in Müller's Historie 2c., p. 442, and in Cyprian's Historie der Augsbургischen Confession, Beilagen, A. 159. - Luther's preface is found in the .Hallischen Theil, p. 345; in the Leipzig edition, vol. XX, p. 8; in Walch, vol. XVI, 778 (No. 901 in this volume); in the Erlanger, 1st ed. vol. 24, p. 321, and 2nd ed. vol. 24, p. 337, and in Cyprian I. c. , Supp., p. 159. - The papist counter-script is found in the Wittenberger, vol. IX, p. 402; in the Jenaer, vol. V, p. 16b, and in Walch, vol. XVI, 766 (in this volume No. 900.)

Article from the Elector of Saxony, for the sake of faith.

I. That it may be firmly and unanimously held and taught that there is only one true God, Creator of heaven and earth; that in the one true Divine Being there are three distinct Persons, namely, God the Father, God the Son, and God the Holy Spirit. That the Son is born of the Father, is from eternity to eternity true natural God with the Father; and that the Holy Spirit is both of the Father and the Son, is also from eternity to eternity true natural God with the Father and the Son, as all this may be clearly and powerfully proven by the [Holy] Scriptures, as John I, 1-3. I, 1-3: "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and God was the Word, all things were made through the same [, and without the same nothing was made that was made]" 2c., and Matthew 28:19: "Go ye, teach all nations, and baptize them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost"; and similar sayings more especially in the Gospel of John.

*) of the Son**) of the Holy Spirit.

II. That only the Son of God became truly man, born of the pure virgin Mary, perfect in body and soul, and not the Father or the Holy Spirit, as the heretics of the Patripassians have taught; nor that the Son alone assumed the body without the soul, as the Pharisees have erred; for He Himself often speaks of His soul in the Gospel, when He says: "My soul is sorrowful unto death" 2c. [But that God the Son became man is clearly stated in John 1:14: "And the Word became flesh"; and Galatians 4:4: "When the time was fulfilled, God found His Son, born of a woman, and given under the Law."]

*) received from the H. Spirit, from the rc.

That the same Son of God, true God and man, Jesus Christ, is one inseparable person, suffered for us men, was crucified, died, was buried, rose from the dead on the third day, ascended into heaven, sits at the right hand of God, Lord over all creatures, and so on. So that it is not to be believed, *) nor taught, that Jesus Christ, as man, or mankind, suffered for us; but therefore, because God and man are here not two Persons, but One inseparable Person, it is to be held and taught that God and man, or the Son of God, did truly suffer for us; as

Paul Rom. 8, 32. says: "God did not spare His only Son, but gave Him for us all." 1 Cor. 2:8: "If they had known it, they would not have crucified the Lord of glory," and such like sayings more.

IV. That original sin is a true sin, not only a defect or infirmity, but such a sin as condemns all men that come from Adam, and separates them eternally from God, unless Jesus Christ had represented us, and taken upon himself such sin, with all the sins that follow therefrom, and by his suffering had sufficed for it, and so entirely abolished and destroyed it in himself; as then Psalm 51 and Romans 5 are clearly written of such sin.

V. Now that all men are sinners, subject to sin and death, and also to the devil, it is impossible for a man to work himself out of it by his own strength, or by his good works, so that he may again become righteous and godly, nor can he prepare or send himself to righteousness, but the more he undertakes to work himself out, the worse it becomes with him. But this is the only way to righteousness and salvation from sin and death, if one, without all merit or works, believes in the Son of God, suffered for us 2c. As said, such faith is our righteousness, <sup>f)</sup> which God will accept and hold as right, pious and holy, having forgiven all sin and given eternal life, that they may be received into grace for His Son's sake, and be children in His kingdom 2c. As all this St. Paul and John 1 <sup>f)</sup> abundantly teach in his Gospel, as Rom. 10, 10.: "With the heart believing one is justified" 2c. Rom. 4, 5. "Their faith is counted to them for righteousness" <sup>f)</sup>; John 3, 15. "All that believe on the Son shall not perish, but have everlasting life."

<sup>i)</sup> For God will count and hold them righteous, pious and holy, having forgiven all sin and given eternal life to all who have such faith in His Son, that they may be saved for 2c.

VI. That such faith is not a human work, nor even possible by our own powers, but is a work and gift of God, which the Holy Spirit, given through Christ, works in us; and such faith, because it is not a *) mere delusion or conceit of the heart, as the false believers have, but a strong, new, living will, it bears much <sup>**) fruit</sup>, always does good to God with praising, thanking, <sup>f)</sup> praying, preaching, and teaching, <sup>s-f)</sup> giving to the neighbor with love, serving, helping, counseling, giving, <sup>f)</sup> and suffering all kinds of evil even unto death.

(VII) To obtain such faith, or to give it to us men, God has instituted the ministry of preaching, or the oral word, namely, the gospel, by which he has his faith and his power proclaimed for the benefit of and to the pious, and through it, as a means, he gives faith with his Holy Spirit, as and where he wills; otherwise there is no other means or way, neither way nor footbridge, to obtain faith. For thoughts apart from or before the oral word, however holy and good they may seem, are nevertheless vain lies and error.

<sup>f)</sup> suchfruit

VIII. In addition to such oral words, God has also instituted outward signs, namely, baptism and the Eucharist, by which, besides the Word, God also inspires and gives faith and His Spirit, and strengthens all who desire Him.

IX. That baptism, the first sign or sacrament, is in two parts, namely, in water and the word of God, or that one baptizes with *) water, and speaks the word of God, and is not merely bad water and <sup>**) sprinkling</sup>, as the blasphemers now teach, but because the word of God is with it, and it is founded on the word of God, it is a holy, living, powerful thing, and as Paul says Tit. 3, 5. and Eph. 5, 26.: "a bath of regeneration and renewing of the H. Spirit" 2c., and that such baptism is also to be administered and communicated to infants. God's words, however, on which it stands, are these: "Go and baptize, in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit," Matth. 28:19. <sup>f)</sup> and Marc. 16:16: "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved," where one must believe.

true body and blood of Christ, according to the words of Christ: "This is my body, this is my blood"; and not only bread and wine, as now the devotional pretends. These words also promote and bring about faith, and exercise the same in all those who desire such a sacrament, and do not act contrary to it, just as baptism also brings and gives faith when it is desired.

XI. That the secret confession should not be enforced by laws, as little as baptism, sacrament, and gospel should be enforced, but should be free; But that it be known how very consoling and wholesome, useful and good, it is to the afflicted or erroneous conscience, because in it absolution, that is, God's word and judgment, is pronounced, by which the conscience is loosed and satisfied from its affliction; nor is it necessary to tell all sin; but one may denounce those which bite the heart and make it uneasy.

XII. That there be no doubt, there *) shall remain and be on earth a holy Christian church unto the end of the world, as Christ saith Matt. 28:20, "Behold, I am with you unto the end of the world." Such a church is nothing else than the believers in Christ, who believe and teach the above articles and parts, and are therefore persecuted and martyred in the world; for where the gospel is preached, and the sacraments rightly used, there is the holy Christian church; and it is not bound with laws and outward splendor to place and time, to persons and earth.

875 Instruction of the Landgraval Hessian Envoy, Siegmund von Boyneburg, what he should present to the Elector of Saxony, together with appendix. The 29th of October 1529.

From Müller's Historie, Book II, Cap. 21, pp. 312 and 314.

Instruction, what to the Highborn Prince, Mr. Johannsen, Duke of Saxony, of the H.Roman. Reichs Erzmarshall und Churfürsten 2c., by our, Philipps von Gottes Gnaden, Landgrafen zu Hessen, Grafen zu Katzenelnbogen 2c., because of, our Amtmann zu Schmalkalden, Rath und lieber Getreuer, Siegmund von Boyneburg.

First, to offer our friendly service to his love, and that we are eager to hear of their welfare everywhere. And subsequently indicate to them that our councillors, ordered on the day recently held at Schwabach, have reported to us on their return, the actions now taken there, on which also the abandonment has been and is now based. Which we then noted and recorded everything according to length.

would now have no doubt, such would have been opened to his love by their councilors ordered there. But among other things, they understood in particular what trouble they had and had all of the cities in the list of some questions, so much that from it their unanimous and final mind and opinions could not be taken, that they did not think to let themselves be divided in these actions, means or means. Also that it has been farewell requested to our skilful councilors, if they want to persist in such a pretence of questioning and separation, to compare the same among us, together with our uncle, Margrave Jörgen of Brandenburg, and if it would be on the opinion, then it would be necessary to inform them of this by us, Landgrave Philipsen, before the appointed day, and then to request further action and the appointed day.

(2) And therefore dispatched him to his love to do further kind remembrance and request. Now do not doubt us, his love would know himself out of high understanding to modestly and admonish to our previous manifold writings, what it and all of us would be interested in this doing; how burdensome, shameful and disadvantageous it would be, if it should be destroyed in such a way and go backwards: it would be better that this would have been considered before, would not have been pushed so far, and would not have been let in with the people at all. And we could consider his love, if such a thing were to be made known (as it would hardly remain hidden), what reflection, consolation, comfort, and strengthening it would bring to our opponents, and waste to us all.

(3) Because it is not hidden from his love that, praise God! the highest discord between the most distinguished scholars and preachers of our Christian faith, held at this time in our convocation in Marburg, has come and grown to the point that now D. Martin Luther and his followers understand each other better and agree more closely than before. Martin Luther and his followers, and those who are of the other part, understand each other better and agree more closely than before; for they are one in the main articles, and not yet compared in the one thing alone, namely, that Christ is in the Sacrament; wherein God could in time bestow his grace, and, as we hoped, would bestow it; that even the scholars write of themselves that they want to show Christian love to one another; and in addition it is not yet certain what faith, Luther's or Zwingelin's opinion, in the 1) every person of the council and the community of Strasbourg and Ulm, and thus in his love and our lands, is also common almost everywhere: so we considered it, if his love because of this in these intended matters and dealings had some displeasure, difficulty and misgivings, such should now be mitigated and fallen with her, and his love to the separation the less cause.

4. Accordingly our friendly request, with good faithful diligence exhorting, his love to keep this trade in mind at all times, the circumstances and succession, and to take into consideration not to let this separation happen for himself; to promote the same with Margrave George for the best; and besides to consider how careful, dishonest, scornful and disadvantageous it would be to let these people out of hand, who would be glad to be with us, after all, according to form and convenient things; For not a little to be driven on, where the cities of the upper countries are dampened with the noticeable brave warrior people, who are in them and their lands and are well evangelical, that such a thing would be to us others, who would gladly stay with the word of God, to inevitable and irretrievable ruin and disaster; we alone, who otherwise would have fifty or sixty thousand men more, would then have to defend ourselves. And are we ever sure what would be in this matter for all of us, and his love of us written here before several times, what much more credible warnings reached us, that imperial majesty is of the final will and intention to punish the princes and estates, so dependent on the Gospel. About this he, Siegmund, has received special orders from us to report to his beloved in confidence that we have received credible and certain information from the Dukes of Lorraine and Guelders, from the Court of Cologne, and from many other sovereigns whom we are not allowed to name to his beloved that Imperial Majesty does not want to punish the princes and estates who are dependent on the Gospel. Majesty does not want anything to be done to their bodies, goods and all property, that she wants to bring it back into the old use, order and statute of the Roman Church, and to punish the Lutherans.

Item 5: His love may well find and notice this without that from the concept of the mandate which Imperial Majesty intended to issue and which Christoph Gross brought with him; which might also have been executed if the Turkish attack had not occurred. Majesty intended to issue, and Christoph Groß brought with him; which might also have been executed, if the Turkish attack had not occurred, and is to be suspected even more daily since then.

(6) Further, let his beloved feel what a severe, unheard-of inquisition Imperial Majesty has made against those who have been in prison. Majesty against the, so one calls Lutheran, left, and as that has decreed; besides which providently the above-mentioned Christoph Groß will therefore report his love everything further. Herewith we send to his love copyi of a writing from kaiserl. Majesty to us, in which his beloved, if they pay attention to the incorporated words "according to the old laudable usage", may again note what the mind of the Imperial Majesty is. Majesty is. He shall also report his love in particular that those of Nuremberg will not step aside from the cities, nor will they enter into or establish a special agreement without the others, as such is actually understood by their deputies. And so that in the near future they may not be sent again in vain and in an unprofitable manner, we ask that they do not doubt this to his love, but have good hope that they will promote such a thing with Margrave George, so that it may continue for the sake of his love and not be delayed or delayed any longer, and that they may demand a friendly and confident answer from his love. Date Cassel, under our own signed handwriting, and printed secretes, on Friday the ninth and twentieth day of Octobris Anno 1529.

Philip, Landgrave of Hesse, . Manuscript.

Appendix to the Hessian Instruction.

He is also to inform the Elector on our behalf that this morning we have received writings from the Nuremberg City Council concerning our affairs, which we and the others have with the Imperial Majesty for the sake of the Gospel. This is shown by the copies we have had sent to him for this purpose, and his love has also come to know of those of Nuremberg without doubt. Therefore his beloved can now not hardly judge, accept and understand what the Imperial Majesty's mind is in this matter. His Majesty's mind in this matter, and that she meant either to reject the Word of God with the evangelical ordinances, to force us away from them, and to subject us again to the old papist abuses; or that we have nothing else to expect from her Majesty but disfavor, conquest, and rape, and that we have to go through it every day. For such an act, done against the person sent, has not only brought scorn, ridicule, and contempt upon us, who have dispatched and sent them, but has also brought certain charges of the Emperor's disfavor and disgrace upon us. Majesty's displeasure, and a testimony of her intended ungracious will. Therefore let his love pursue the matters with serious diligence, what is in it for all of us, our lands and people, and promote it with diligence, also for himself. all estates, of princes, counts and of cities of the upper countries, none who accept the gospel, separated, and describe ourselves together on named time and aim, to think about the things with council further, and therefore to compare and decide unanimously what should be done here according to the high unavoidable necessity, and that his love wants to give us to understand its mind in this conducive again. From Müller's History, Book II, Cap. 22, S. 330.

As the most illustrious, and the most illustrious, highborn princes and lords, Mr. Johann, Duke of Saxony, Archmarshall and Elector of the Holy Roman Empire; Mr. Ernst and Mr. Franciscus, Dukes of Brunswick and Lüneburg, brothers, and Mr. Philipp, Landgrave of Hesse 2c., of their own persons; also of the most illustrious, highborn princes and lords, Mr. Georgen, Margrave of Brandenburg 2c., Councillors, Georg Vogler, Chancellor, and Wolf Christoph von Wiesenthau; and then of the honourable, free and imperial cities of Strasbourg, Nuremberg, Ulm, Costnitz, Reutlingen, Heilbronn, Memmingen, Lindau and Kempten, embassies, on Sunday after Catharina [28 Nov.], next to each other, have arrived here at Schmalkalden, from which, of all their electoral and princely graces and favours, embassies have been received. and favorable messages, in matters of protestation and appeal of the recent Speierian imperial treaty, as far as faith is concerned, to the Roman Imperial Majesty. Majesty, to confer with each other and to decide what further action is to be taken before the Reverend Imperial Majesty. Majesty should further act on this matter.

And now the reported message of Imperial Majesty. Majesty have come here on this day, heard them first in their oral and written relation 1), of which also all the above-mentioned Electors, Princes and Estates have taken copies.

But because in the Articles of our Holy Faith, recently brought forward at the Diet of Schwabach, 1) some disagreement has arisen, and the aforementioned Elector and Prince of Saxony 2c., Margrave George of Brandenburg 2c., and the Dukes of Brunswick and Lüneburg, for many brave causes and movements, are not of mind or opinion to enter into such or such an action with anyone who is not in agreement with their Electoral and Princely Grace, and thus of a unanimous faith and sacrament. Their electoral and princely graces have this time given the embassies of the cities, especially to those who before had no knowledge of the articles of our holy faith, and therefore could not have been dispatched on this day, that they bring such articles behind them to their magistrates, and herewith another day is to be appointed, namely on the holy three King's day 16. Jan. 1530<sup>a</sup>, in the near future, at Nuremberg, and thus: Which cities of the recorded articles of our holy faith want to be unanimous with the more-mentioned Elector and Princes with God's help and insist that the same send their fully authorized messages to their Electoral and Princely Grace. Majesty's ungracious leave and mind, to consult with each other, and to decide as much as possible, as should now be done here. Which cities, however, are not inclined to confess the indicated articles of our holy faith with the prince and princes announced beforehand and to persevere in doing so by means of divine help, do not need to be sent to Nuremberg on the appointed day. And so some of the cities would come to their electoral and princely grace. Grace. If, therefore, some of the cities should not send to their electoral and princely graces to Nuremberg on the appointed day or not, their electoral and princely graces will meet with the Counts and Counts of Nuremberg. with the Counts and others, confess and keep the many articles of our holy faith with their Electoral and Princely Grace at the same time. and princes at the same time, according to the gracious will of God, by their electoral and princely grace. ### 878. answer of Chursachsen and the Margrave of Brandenburg, which they have given to the cities of Strasbourg and Ulm.

In Müller I. c. S. 333.

The answer of the Elector of Saxony and of the skillful Margrave Jürgen of Brandenburg, on the skillful presentation of the cities of Strasbourg and Ulm, which they did on the next Schwabachian farewell at Schmalkalden.

His Elector. His Elector's Grace know to remember in what manner at the discretion of His Elector's Grace. Grace. His Elector's Grace and Brother-in-Law, Landgrave Philippsen of Hesse, acted with you, as the authorities who were near Speier on behalf of their lords, next to the envoys of the city of Nuremberg, for the sake of a Christian understanding, and that there a parting and a day was made for further action and discussion towards Rodach on some of the articles in question. Although it is also true that the same articles, so his churfürstl. and Margrave Juergen's counsellors next to Schwabach, have not been thought of so far or in such a way: You know, however, as those with whom the action was taken at Speier, that nevertheless all kinds of misgivings have arisen on account of the discord, whether one is otherwise unanimous in many important articles concerning our holy Christian faith; and that also an opinion has been brought into a list, as to how especially at Strasbourg, on account of the sacrament, the body and blood of Christ is preached and proclaimed, from which it would perhaps be possible to hear, as if there were no troublesome discord in this. For this reason, the matter has been directed to this end, and it has been deemed good that the scholars, for the sake of the conflicting articles, should come together for friendly discussion and dialogue, in the confidence that such articles would then, with the help of the Almighty, be led to a good settlement and agreement, which one can comfortably expect to occur in this area, and especially the Elector of Saxony. And where, according to the will of the Almighty, the same discord would have sufficed for Christian settlement and unanimity in such a way and completely that, with a happy and good conscience, and without violation of the same, as begun at Speier and further acted at Rodach in the indicated hopeful confidence, such understanding could finally have been established and executed with one another: you, the hopeful ones, shall doubtlessly hold that the Elector of Saxony, and no doubt his Elector's Grace, is entitled to the same. Gn. and brother, Margrave Jörgen, to their special will; their electoral and princely graces should not have been lacking, and princely graces should not have been lacking in their part, besides their electoral and princely graces. Gn. and brother-in-law, the Landgrave of Hesse, to finally execute the more touched understanding. But after the Elector of Saxony together with H. F. Gn. Oheims, des Markgrafen, Geschickten, have heard from your presentation that the articles, which were handed over at Schwabach, have been considered by your lords as disputable and extensive, and therefore, as it is understood, they have been reluctant to agree to the same and that the union should be executed thereon: so his churfürstl. His Grace and the Margrave's deputies must also leave it at that, and put the understanding to rest, so that it is not acted against conscience. If the Elector of Saxony had also provided for himself, since the Council of Nuremberg, next to his Elector's Grace, had asked for a delay in the day's proceedings, he would not have been able to do so. for the postponement of the day that should have been here at Schmalkalden by virtue of the Schwabachian agreement on the 15th day of December, for the sake of these matters concerning the understanding, wrote that your lords of Strasbourg and Ulm would later have had, for the sake of articles reported beforehand, as if they were extensive and disputatious, his electors wanted to report to those of Nuremberg. His Electors have indicated to those of Nuremberg to leave them, those of Strasbourg and Ulm, as far as this matter of understanding was concerned, unattended with descriptions. And the Elector of Saxony, together with the Margrave's deputies, have heard with no small misgivings that your lords may not agree with the same articles, considering what, to speak humanly, would have been accomplished among themselves, as well as among others, for the reception of the Gospel's consolation and good: also what joy, if it should become known, the adversaries would feel at such a resulting disagreement. However, since it will not be otherwise, his Electoral Grace and the Brandenburg authorities will have to be punished. and the Brandenburg authorities must, on account of their lords, order the matters to the almighty God, who (although the aforementioned consolation wants to arise) is nevertheless more powerful than all adverse force. And are of the final mind and will, also want to ask and call upon the Almighty, that he may grant their electoral and princely grace in this matter. and princely grace, their body and goods and all temporal welfare in God's will and put them aside, also that they may not be subjected to any violence, to be sure of what is his divine will and good pleasure. Will and good pleasure. Since their electoral and princely graces may also show and prove gracious and good will to the cities of Strasbourg and Ulm, and to your persons as their envoys, as much as may happen in conscience, their electoral and princely graces will be inclined.

2) "hopeful" put by us instead of: "polite". Compare No. 883, § 1 towards the end.

To the careful, honourable and wise, mayors and councillors of the city of Nuremberg, our favourable dear lords and friends.

Careful, honourable and wise, favourable dear gentlemen and friends! To E. F. W. be our most willing and diligent services at all times.

We have recently presented the farewell, together with several articles concerning the holy faith, at Schmalkalden, have heard all the contents, and give E. F. W. to understand in good opinion that we, by virtue of the aforementioned farewell, were willing to attend the appointed day on Iriuni ksAuni in the future: however, in the meantime such business has occurred with us that we do not know how to deliver some message at this time for noticeable reasons. However, we want to firmly persevere and remain with the above-mentioned articles, all of which have been and are still being taught, preached, and defended as Christian with holy scripture by our preachers, because we are not rejected from them with holy scripture and a good conscience. For this reason, what has been protested by the protesting estates now on account of the aforementioned articles, as well as whether something has been said against Imperial Majesty for interrogation and dismissal. Majesty for the interrogation and averting of her Majesty's disgrace. We herewith, now as then, and then as now, have also granted our part, to refund and to submit our number and fee in all ways, E. F. W., the most diligently requesting, that they be granted the right of appeal. most diligently requesting that they will thus faithfully excuse us from our remaining outside against princes, lords and other states, our most gracious, gracious and favorable lords, and that whatever is acted upon and decided at such a day will be sent to us at our expense 1); also that what is owed to us in the costs of those sent in Hispania to Imperial Majesty, who are in the process of sending the same to us, will be paid to us at our own expense. Majesty, so that the surplus money is drawn down, report to us, to direct us the better to know with conducive sending of our fee. This we want to earn for E.F.W. with friendly will at all times. Gracious, in all submissiveness, beforehand. Most gracious and gracious Lords! When our envoy from the recent meeting in Schmalkalden arrived at our house, he handed over to us seventeen articles by your electoral and princely grace, which do not concern the Christian faith, and which we read out all the contents: we respect and consider them to be Christian, which we also believe and hold. However, it is not possible for us to completely refrain from keeping the Mass for the following reasons: we have a member of the German Order with us, who is a member of the Confederation and has his own priesthood; likewise, we have Barefooters as observers, with both of whom we have rights beforehand, and we have been commanded by imperial authority not to make any changes against them. And since the parting at Schmalkalden allows that whoever does not want to accept the articles reported above 2) should not attend the day on Iriuri RsZuiri at Nuremberg, we would have been inclined to attend such a day, if the above-mentioned excellent causes did not prevent us. We have not wished to behave in such a manner to Your Electoral and Imperial Graces in all humility, humbly requesting to have us in your gracious command; for wherever we may serve Your Electoral and Imperial Graces, we wish to be found willing at all times. 2) "not" put by us instead of: "with", which will probably be read from "nit". The city declares its inability to carry out the sixteenth Schwabach article.

Opinion: we did not doubt that your master would again be inclined to remain with the articles of faith handed over to you, and to let himself be heard of the farewell at Schmalkalden this time finally and with a friendly mind. And, if our deputy is informed of this by them, to find out further whether their lord is willing to enter into union with us; then to unite further with the same margraval councillors, and also to speak with the Landgrave's deputy in Hesse, and to ask them how they have been dispatched by their lord to Nuremberg after the farewell at Schmalkalden, with rest of the farewell at Schmalkalden given, which of the property, contents of the written articles, so handed over to each part: Those who agree with us and others on the aforementioned articles of our holy faith, and who wish to insist that the same should send their authorized embassy to Nuremberg on the appointed day for our and the other princes' embassies, but who are not inclined to confess the articles of our holy faith, do not need to send them to Nuremberg on the appointed day. Now if the Landgrave's deputies should so declare that they are prepared to unite with ours and the others who are of one faith and sacrament in an instruction and sending to the Emperor's Majesty, then they will not need to be sent to Nuremberg on the appointed day. Majesty: thereupon ours shall enter into a settlement and further discussion with them, and then continue to act in the same manner with those of Nuremberg and other cities. If it were the case, however, that the Hessians were to hear that their lord did not want to be sent by the other cities, and had perhaps all ready joined with them, if this were to be noted, from which ours would also assume that the Landgrave is not inclined to send with us and the others who agree on Christianity, then we consider it unnecessary for his love to be counsels in the setting up and counseling of the instruction. If his love would not be willing to send with us and ours, then our defender should nevertheless unite with the Brandenburg, Nuremberg, and other defences that want to come to Nuremberg. And the sum is this: whoever confesses the Articles of Faith with us, and with God's help would insist on it, the same shall be admitted to the sending, settlement of the Instruction, and alliance; but if anyone to those of Strasbourg and others who have a misunderstanding in the Sacrament, and do not unanimously believe with us, according to the Articles, that it is the Landgrave, he shall be admitted to the sending, settlement of the Instruction, and alliance.

or anyone else, they are not to be admitted to the council in which the instruction is to be given, nor to anything else. For it is one thing to confess the error of the sacrament, and to enter into alliance and confidential understanding with them; lest we fall into it now, which we fled before. And all this is at stake, if the cities all, or in part, separate themselves from us and from the others for the sake of Christianity. But if they will publicly confess the articles handed over after due consideration, then it remains on the course, as is further reported below. And if the princes or cities, in the event that they are in agreement with us on the matter of Christianity, should apply for alliance, ours shall inform them that because our councilor and dear friend, Hans von Mingkwitz, had previously sent them the articles of alliance, ours would have the order to hear and accept their answer, concerns and report thereon, and to carry all this to us; with the understanding that a day would be set for the earliest, so that a final decision could be reached, since at the present time we do not really know what their minds would have wanted to rest on. If, however, they would not make an appeal to ours for the sake of the alliance, ours shall make mention of it, and take their minds to what they intend to do about it. And to consider this against the Brandenburgs and those of Nuremberg in general and in particular, whether they want to enter into the union in unity or in particular, they shall be accepted with moderation, as reported above.

(2) As many of the other cities' deputies as shall present themselves to ours, our deputy shall inform them of the parting recently taken by their lords and deputies at Schmalkalden: whereupon we the above-mentioned have ordered our chancellor in the above-mentioned name to give the same parting; and ours shall offer to speak of it, to act upon it, and to conclude it. Which of these will now also insist on the main articles of faith, as touched upon above, handed over to them at Schmalkalden, and will confess the same as others: the same may in this case also be admitted to deliberate on the Instruction and other things. If they would also be inclined to enter into a confidential understanding and covenant, like the others, our skilful one shall not refuse such, but accept them in measure, like others.

(3) Even if Brandenburg and those of Nuremberg, as the noblest, are, as touched above,

If any of them are willing to enter into the covenant and union, they should be all the more willing to enter into it with the others. If, however, it were the case that they were all inclined to enter into it, and to confess the articles of faith which they have hitherto held and practiced with them, it would be in the order and the way of the previous trade, ours and the others', which are of one sacrament and faith. However, if Brandenburg and Nuremberg, alone or together with the other cities, do not want to agree on the articles with us and the others, as far as the faith is concerned, they shall not agree on the instruction or answer, neither together nor in particular. If, however, Brandenburg and Nuremberg wish to be in agreement with us on account of their faith, as we have provided for them and noted next to them, and yet do not want to enter into any further new agreement, Magdeburg or other alliance against us, then we shall nevertheless unite with them, be it Brandenburg, Nuremberg or those who alone are in agreement with us on account of their faith, for the sake of the Emperor's Majesty with the Instruction; which is the main article of all this consideration. We also consider it convenient and useful that at Imperial Majesty, and that the Instruction be handed over by them in Latin, French, and German; and that, besides this, a small narrative be made, in which the trade is summarized; and that the sent ones, if they are ordered by the princes and cities, come again to Nuremberg. And that the transfer and exchange would be held, as in the next; and that the sent ones, according to opportunity and demand of the trade diligence and dräulichex weighting, would arrive to the sheerest. That it would also be suggested by ours by chance, as if they were doing it for the benefit of the trade, for themselves, and that it would not be detrimental to the same: would we, besides the other princes, take the trouble to send a count or other brave people of nobility, who are at the imperial court and with that of Nassau, to the Imperial Palace. Court and with that of Nassau in special relationship, to be skilful to Imperial Majesty. Majesty; what the same might be of service to the cause would be well to assume. To consider that the sweat of Nassau and Alexander be answered as it is deemed useful; likewise to consider whether the complaint, protest, appeal, and what our and the other skilful ones encounter in our advertisement and command for this reason should be allowed to come into print, or whether it should be left up to Imperial Majesty. Majesty. Majesty's answer.

(4) To which extent, however, the Instruction to the Imperial Prince is to be applied.

Majesty should be understood, that ours will learn from what we will send him hereafter, and otherwise, according to the occasion of the whole matter, move the same beside its circumstances, and pay attention to it, so that a steady, fair, and Christian lawful answer may be made, thereby Imperial Majesty's ungracious farewell may be averted. Majesty's ungracious leave may be mitigated and averted. Since we have here above considered it good that an earl or several noble men be sent to His Imperial Majesty, we consider that he should be sent to His Majesty. Majesty: we also consider, according to the circumstances and the time, that it would not be unfruitful for one of the princes to be sent, and that Duke Ernst of Lüneburg would be able to personally petition Imperial Majesty. Majesty in person, for prior escort and assurance.

883. instructions for a nme legation to the emperor and his brother, King Ferdinand.

See No. 879.

1. project of the instruction, what to do at the roman imperial majesty, our most gracious lord. Majesty, our most gracious Lord, our Electors, Princes, Counts and Cities, who are named below, are to advertise and act.

1. Maj. our submissive, most subservient, guilty, and entirely willing services in all obedience, as our most gracious Lord and Emperor. Afterwards to Her Imperial Majesty Majesty this opinion in submission: As we at her Imperial Majesty's Majesty's request and description at the next Imperial Diet proclaimed and held at Speier. Majesty! We appeared in our own persons, and our embassies sent by the cities; by some of the estates there, in appearance, as if they had sent a message to her Imperial Majesty. Majest. (about which we have often indicated excellent causes and complaints as to why this is not proper for them, and why we could not consent to it on account of our conscience and souls), to make a supposed decision and resolution, by which we are urged and unavoidably caused to protest against it, as far as the same article is concerned, and further to appeal to their Imperial Majesty, as our unanimous representative. Majesty, as our Lord and Protector, about such and such highly important complaints.

(2) But recently our envoys, coming from Italy from their Imperial Majesty, have returned to us and to our home. Majesty back to us and home. They have reported to us that they have received an ungracious and quite unforeseen farewell from us, and that they are to be sent back to us.

them as from her kais. Majest. The following, among other things, is the final content: that her Imperial Majesty has been reminded of this Speier farewell before our envoys arrive at her Majesty's. Majest, from the fact that before our envoys arrive at her Majesty's, they have been reminded of this Speier farewell, and for the sake of several other causes mentioned, have asked, requested and requested that, according to her Majesty's serious order, which was previously issued to the estates of the empire, we should once again earnestly command that we consent to the farewell and resolution passed at Speier, and comply with it in all respects. 2c.

3) Document No. 846.

further interpreted and formed in the people as without doubt not remained: Because the entanglement of our embassies became known in the Empire of the German Nation a little sooner than the same came to us again, as if it had been carried out of our command to her Imperial Majesty. Majesty that we did not have the right nor the right, but that we were to blame for the fact that our embassy had been sent by our, as Imperial Majesty, subordinate chieftains. Majesty's subjects, princes and cities, and not acted for themselves, of the natural and all peoples' rights, liberties and securities, on account of his Imperial Majesty. Majesty; in consideration of the fact that our skilful appellants, who interceded at Speier after the leave had been granted, out of omission of the described imperial rights, would have been grieved by his Imperial Majesty. Rights, interponed, for Her Imperial Majesty. Majesty. Person, as our Lord and Protector, by us and by our order to her Majesty's Secretaries on the same arduous parting alone and insinuated.

(4) For this reason, out of our special high confidence, which we are to relinquish to Your Imperial Majesty, we have no other choice than that they should be accepted after the gracious interrogation of their necessary commanded action and that they should again be dispatched with grace. 4. Therefore, out of our special high confidence that we should trust their Imperial Majesty, we have no other choice than that they should be accepted after a gracious hearing of their necessary commanded action, and that they should be dispatched again with mercy; since this is also required by natural equity, reason, and all respectability, and has so far been held everywhere against the infidels and public enemies' embassy and legation.

However, we bear Her Imperial Majesty's Majesty. Person so much more excused than we know with what many important and excellent affairs she is overtired, and that she might not have been reminded of all the opportunities, as it would have been proper. For we do not doubt that at the time our embassy was with her imperial majesty, things were in a state of flux. Majesty, the matters were discussed in the presence of impartial German counsellors, as the same had informed their Imperial Majesty of this in her Majesty's presence. Majesty's royal election of a future Roman Emperor at Frankfort for the honor and welfare of the German nation, and Her Imperial Majesty would also have been pleased with the gracious advice. Majesty would also be bound by the gracious obligation, which was given by Her Imperial Majesty there at Frankfort. Majesty there at Frankfort to the members of the empire for grace and goodness, and without the requirement of equity, that her Imperial Majesty should not allow any of the members of the empire to be transferred to her. Majesty not to rape any of the "Imperial Estates" for themselves, nor to permit others to do so, but to graciously allow each estate, where it might suffer proper justice, to remain in the same and otherwise due hearing and equity; and, besides this, also to allow all of the "Imperial Estates" to remain in the same and otherwise due hearing and equity.

Circumstances and Occasion of the Cause of our Rightful Protestation and Appeal, to His Majesty the Secretary. Secretariats, also what is necessary to move these important matters everywhere: His Imperial Majesty would undoubtedly show a more gracious response against us. Majesty would undoubtedly show himself more gracious in his response to us, and would not have been able to order such a mandate against us in any way before now.

(6) Although we stand in hopeful and quite undoubted confidence, since the same mandates have been with us until the time of the dispatch of these embassies and have not yet come to us, that His Imperial Majesty will now have received such opportunity and circumstances without such a report that they will graciously let the same mandates be abolished in the pending appeal. Majesty will have received such occasion and circumstances of the matters without such report now, that she will graciously abolish the same mandates in pending appeal and let them be drawn again.

(7) And after Her Imperial Majesty has indicated in her answer that Majesty indicates in her answer, as if the departure had been made solely to prevent, from that time on, further all kinds of frightening innovations, doctrines and sects, for which reason we should not have sought a refusal 2c.

(8) Thereupon our skilful ones shall inform and report to their Imperial Majesty. Majesty, and especially so that our submissive and obedient will may be noted all the more, and that our protest and appeal may be made not out of any pretension, but out of urgent necessity, for the sake of our souls' salvation.

(9) If, for the sake of the ambiguous article of the next Speierian Farewell, it were so, as would be presented to Her Imperial Majesty, we could also show ourselves by the grace of the Almighty that we would unreasonably refuse to help and close ways that would be harmful. If, for the sake of the next article of the Speier Farewell, the situation were to be as presented to Her Imperial Majesty, then we ourselves could also be guided by the graces of the Almighty in that we would unreasonably refuse to consider and close the ways that would prevent harmful and frightening innovations, doctrines, and sects, and especially from now on.

(10) Thus we would have the honor to say that before this time of the next Speierian farewell and until then the bravest refutations of all such frightening innovations and doctrines have been made and put forward from our principedoms, lands, territories, and from our own, that we invoked the testimony of the whole empire.

(11) And with the help of the Almighty are more determined to avoid these and also the like doctrines, of which there are many notable differences, although they arose before the time, concerning the rebirth, and what the reverend Sacra-

The Lord Jesus Christ's true Corpus Christi and blood, in our principalities, countries and territories. We are not to proclaim, break in, or allow the true Corpus Christi of our Lord Jesus Christ in our principalities, lands, and territories, or in our country, either publicly or secretly. About this, some of our friends, and others from the aforementioned greater part of the princes, princes and estates of the empire, who at the next imperial diet, in addition to one or two of us, have been appointed to the great committee, know what we have let ourselves hear more than once, and for the sake of such troublesome innovations and doctrines, no less than they, in a Christian and unprovable manner.

12. also refer us to the writ which we sent to them next at Speier, with notice of our complaints, to be read and moved, and which we again denied in our appeal: that our protestation and appeal on our part should and would remain and have been put to rest, where it (as to prevent the reported and now henceforth such harmful and frightening innovations and doctrines, as has been suggested to Her Imperial Majesty for the other estates' approval, with almost too little report and to our displeasure) has rested, and not also to some further protestation and appeal on our part. Majesty to the other estates' approval, with almost too little report and to our displeasure), and not also to have proceeded further to some abuses fallen with us by means of public divine writing before this time, to re-establish them and to impose them (as one then subjected oneself to this by a biased majority, unheard and unconsidered of all instructions given). And after the Imperial. Among the most important reasons why we, the Imperial Estates, should accept the resolution and agreement made at Speier, the Imperial Majesty has set this motion: what is to be decided with the majority in the common Imperial Assembly, that the lesser part should not resist it, but live obediently; then our envoys shall submit the following report to their Imperial Majesty. Majesty our report thereupon humbly:

(13) Her Imperial Majesty, as a highly knowledgeable Emperor, knows Your Majesty, as a highly knowledgeable Emperor, knows how to graciously guide himself, not only from reason and from all uniformly just and divine orders, but also from the past histories of practiced imperial actions and acts, so that it will not be found at all that the common imperial assembly has ever subjected itself, or that it has considered it divine, just, and just, in the confusions and divisions of our faith, the salvation of souls, and what may depend on it, to some action or order, However small they may be, but the same things have been from the time of the early church to this time ever and always in the common Christian and ordinary councils, to which not only the holy kingdom, but all the common ranks of Christianity, but especially those who are taught and understand the holy scriptures, are to be called and discussed, Those who have been taught and understand the holy Scriptures are to be called and discussed, to whom it is also due by divine right, by means of divine word and holy Scripture, to do so properly, so that there not the greater, but the more divine and true, is to be decided and accepted.

(14) For what Christian reasonable action could that be, if in a matter by someone, without prior necessary interrogation and diligent investigation of the root, from which the main action and error has its origin, what finally it should be recognized and undertaken, when the imperial and other described rights do not permit such in temporal, civil matters by any means. But it is much more appropriate to act in matters of faith with the utmost diligence, earnestness, and courage, so that this can be justified before God, as the mighty Lord of heaven and earth (whose cause it is without means), with an undaunted conscience.

015 How would we and other Christian men always be satisfied in our consciences, if we were to place the foundation of our consciences and salvation on men, or on the decision of a greater man, made by men, and were to live by that decision, whether it be according to divine truth or contrary to it? Because the holy word of God, as the one foundation of our faith, is more worthy and more powerful than that it should take clarity from men through a greater, as they say, and God the Almighty bequeaths supremely and curses all men who place their trust, that is, their salvation, in men.

(16) Moreover, all natural, reasonable equity and fairness, which concerns many people in common, requires that this should not be done by some alone, but in the presence and with the knowledge of all those who are related to the matter and have an interest. Forasmuch then as this Article of the Covenant, wherein the estates of the realm but, [and which] 1) all Christians in general confess, meets: what is repugnant to order?

1) In the old edition: "therein the imperial estates, but insgesamt" 2c.

(17) However suspicious it would be regarded by all reasonable men, their imperial majesty, out of a high sense, has graciously considered that our opponents, who are opposed to the righteous, true doctrine of the holy gospel, should teach, preach, and write against it to the utmost, not with little persecution, and should be judges in this dichotomy: if they were not permitted to judge in their own matters for a temporal matter, according to the ability of all divine and human rights. And what irretrievable burden and disadvantage our consciences and those of our descendants should be subjected to on account of this, and what should be considered just and equitable, can easily be assumed. Therefore, it is our hope that it will be accepted by Her Imperial Majesty. Majesty. would not consider it fair that in matters of the divine word a majority should take place, and that the counterpart should proceed as a party and judge against us, and that we should be bound to do with it against our conscience; There is no doubt that if we outnumbered and outnumbered the other estates, and if we wanted to move further with such a majority in these matters, they would be considerably burdened by us, and would not fail to protect and preserve themselves by legal means, as has now been done by us to our great need. Moreover, also as Her Imperial Majesty, the Majesty, as the fountain of all rights, know that cases may nevertheless occur where the greater part does not have to conclude against the lesser part; when we then, before Her Imperial Majesty and the common Christian faithful, have the right to protect the same by legal means, as is now done by us to our great need. Majesty and the common Christian Council, according to the form and occasion of this transaction.

The fact is that the other estates need a parting and more of the means, rightly admitted as a natural and cheap protection, for our highest and unavoidable need, and, as it happens, have to protest, also further appeal to their Imperial Majesty and a common, free, Christian council; and that in truth, as their Imperial Majesty may certainly believe us, it is of no disobedience, nor of any disobedience, nor of any disobedience of any kind. Majesty and a common, free, Christian council; and that it is in right truth, as Her Imperial Majesty may surely believe us, of no disobedience, nor other such concerns, lust, outrage or malice.

020 Moreover, that the holy Scriptures exhort us to obey God in things pertaining to His truth rather than men. For whether we obey their Imperial Maj. Maj. and the Holy Roman Empire, as obedient members of the same, entangled with duties without means, and therefore guilty, indeed quite inclined and willing, to obey their Imperial Maj. Maj. as our rightful lord, with our persons, lands, people, and fortune: yet our souls and consciences, like those of her Imperial Maj. Maj. himself, are taken out of the hands of all men and placed under the rule and authority of the commandment alone, who bought and redeemed them with his blood, and to whose obedience, command and government we confessed and committed ourselves in baptism.

(21) Although we also note from the much-reported answer of Her Imperial Majesty that the matters with this palliation of the other estates have been referred to Her Imperial Majesty. Maj.'s answer that the matter has reached her Imperial Majesty with this palliation of the other estates. Maj., that perhaps with such an equal understanding as the parting is capable of, the Turk would by no means be resisted: we know, however, of our own glory, and hope, especially we, those princes, princes and of cities, that we will nevertheless, in the next Turkish emergency, be able to rely on the Turkish army.

Her Imperial Majesty's Maj.'s gracious written request, and of the Royal Dignity of Hungary and Bohemia, Her Imperial Maj. Maj. brother, kindly and graciously request, to praise God the Almighty, to be subservient to Her Imperial Maj. Maj. for subservience, Royal W. for kindly experience, and also for the benefit of Christendom and the Empire of the German Nation, both with the so called resistance of the Turk, at several Imperial Diets held, at the request of Her Imperial Maj. Maj.'s request, and also what has been decided about it in the aforementioned emergency by Her Imperial Maj. Maj. and K.W. and K.W., and, notwithstanding the much-touched discord, let it be heard that in the same, besides that I, Duke John, Elector of Saxony, have not been the last in the parting of the passages which have been appointed each time for the sake of the Turks, nor have we been otherwise in want of anything, we have not been the last; that therefore Her Imperial Majesty Maj. has graciously to accept, with what justification such to her Imperial Majesty. Majesty to a cause to make her Imperial Maj. Maj. the more to disgrace us.

22 Since the Christian and imperial heart of Her Imperial Majesty is now once again directed to this. Her Imperial Majesty's Christian and imperial heart is once again directed to this end, as Her Imperial Majesty has done several times before. Maj. has on several occasions graciously and Christianly put off a common council, and the answer given to Her Imperial Majesty indicates that, in addition to the complaint now before us, Her Majesty has also made a Christian and imperial heartfelt appeal. Maj. that Her Majesty, in addition to the present complaint against the Turks, wishes to consult and help to resolve that peace, tranquillity and prosperity of all the estates of the Empire and of the whole of Christendom may come about for the promotion, increase and permanence of the honour and service of our Lord God Almighty, of our Christian religion and faith, and that all such things may be directed and brought to a godly and praiseworthy Christian being; to which end Her Imperial Maj. Maj. imperial Christian intention the eternal and almighty, merciful God, through Christ his Son, our Beatificator, is pleased to bestow grace, happiness and prosperity.

(23) And a common, free, Christian concilium is always considered the most useful and convenient way for a Christian settlement and reformation of the pending abuses and disputes, as therefore the other estates, with the content of their Imperial Majesty's next answer, again ask for. Maj.'s reply, once again also ask for this, and no other means may be found. And where there is still a Christian, free Concilium and in the meantime it remains with the farewell in the 26th year, then Her Imperial Majesty, also all Electors and Princes of the Realm, will have to be informed. Majesty, as well as all Princes, Princes and Estates of the Empire, will be relieved of all the unrest that would otherwise have occurred at every Imperial Diet held up to now, due to such partings, as should be held in the meantime of the Council, and the disputation that would have occurred as a result will finally be shortened.

(24) And we, then, also without that by prevention, from that time onwards, to which this decree shall be primarily meant, to prevent all harmful and burdensome innovations, in accordance with the same decree, as we also consented before in none, and furthermore in all other things, as we trust to answer for the same against God and their Imperial Majesty in a future Christian Council. In addition, in case of necessity, since we do not want to be left of it, we are obliged to justify and justify our necessary appeal, as this is due to us by law and equity.

(25) And let our envoys most humbly request and entreat Imperial Majesty. Maj. thereupon most humbly request and entreat that their Imperial Maj. Maj. and what has happened in all places up to now, especially the instruction and appeal handed over to our previous envoy, or the reasons and causes contained therein, will graciously consider and move, where in the aforementioned matter, outside the ordinary determination of a common Christian council of all Christian states, even without a prior necessary hearing, a thorough and truthful hearing, even without prior necessary interrogation, thorough truthful enquiry as to how to act in such a brave important matter, what should be undertaken, acted upon and subjected to force, what great repugnance, unrest, division and sedition such should presumably arouse everywhere, and that which Her Imperial Majesty would like to see prevented. Maj. would like to see prevented; and that, after all, her Imperial Maj. Maj. graciously change and rescind her given decree and the order therein, and as a Christian Emperor, who is commanded by God to administer and rule over the Holy Empire, and also to handle the Christian name above others, graciously promote that in this article, concerning our holy faith, a man may, as is just, remain free and uninvolved in his conscience; and that with the next, an entirely free, Christian, orderly council be held in a convenient place of the German nation, and that in it, of these things, orderly and Christian, be the foundation of the church.

and from the root of this ambiguous and important matter, by means that are proper in the sight of God, and thus by such an orderly way be brought to Christian peace and unity, and not acted upon by force and deed against those who would gladly be Christians, seek the truth, and do right: To oppose this, and before our lawful appeal, to which we are obliged to give its legal consequence and prosecution in case of necessity, namely, since we, because of the above-mentioned causes which affect our souls' salvation and consciences, in addition to our petition concerning the burdensome innovations, at the parting of the previous Speierian Imperial Diet, when we promised ourselves entirely subserviently to your Imperial Majesty, to be outside of the imperial constitution. We were not to be left outside of the legal execution of our appeal, to disgrace or in any other way to be tempted to disregard the gracious obligation given at Frankfurt by her Imperial Majesty to the Estates of the Holy Roman Empire. Maj. to let the estates of the realm remain under ordinary law, against us, as their Imperial Maj. Maj. in all possible matters, nor to allow others to attest against us, and especially to attest against our made and pending appeal, nor to act in any other way, but to give once more a gracious order, as we have submissively requested by our embassy to Her Imperial Maj. Maj. by our embassy. This will undoubtedly be a pleasing and orderly act to God Almighty, highly conducive to the right harmony and Christian reformation of all estates and the whole of Christendom, and also the only way to eradicate all confusion, abuses and unbelief, to plant Christian peace, and to have a right heartfelt unity among the Christians, and before that in the German land.

(26) For to what extent the proliferation, discord, and ineptitude of hard-headedness, so far outside of Christian negotiations, have preserved the pending abuses with violent acts of unheard-of things, and the people want to urge such public abuses by deed: that same action has been sufficiently indicated by past history. For this reason we humbly request that Her Imperial Majesty will intervene in this matter as a matter of urgency. Maj. will, as a Christian head, evenly and graciously investigate the truth in this matter, and will graciously show that which is abusive, and will be our most gracious Lord and Emperor. This undoubtedly honors God the Almighty, and will please Her Imperial Majesty with all due respect. Maj. with all

The more they do, the more they will communicate victory and salvation to their leaders, and the more they will serve the Reich and the German nation for peace and harmony.

(27) Moreover, it is quite frightening to hear among Christians that they should persecute one another for the sake of their faith in such a manner and to the point of blood, and that they should do so against their members, brothers, and relatives, as the unbelieving pagan authorities have used against the Christian multitude and the holy martyrs, in order to expose the divine name and its salvific, immortal word. And that her Imperial Maj. Maj. may graciously take note of this highly induced, necessary notice from us, as Christian estates, who heartily desire nothing but the truth and whatever may be conducive to the highest harmony of common Christianity; for Her Imperial Majesty should certainly be pleased with us. Maj. should certainly not have anything else to do with us than to provide us with all obedient servitude and subservience, with all our property; we also wanted to do this, as obedient members of Her Imperial Majesty and of the Holy Roman Empire. Maj. and of the Holy Roman Empire, in order to make their Imperial Maj. Maj. to the most subservient.

What before Imperial. Maj. the skilful shall advertise orally.

1st Most Sublime, Great Emperor, Most Gracious Lord! The most illustrious, noble, high-born Princes and Lords, Lords N. N. and the well-born Counts N. N., together with the honourable and wise towns N. N., have dispatched us to Your Imperial Majesty, their and our most gracious Lord, with credence and command of their high order. Maj., their and our most gracious lord, with credence and command to present their great need, with humble request that Your Maj. Maj. to graciously hear our plea, which we hereby submit to Your Imperial Majesty.

(2) First of all, Your Imperial Majesty offers Her Royal and Royal Grace, as well as the others, her submissive and obedient services. Maj. their submissive and obedient service, and where it is in the interest of His Imperial Majesty to govern happily, to defeat her enemies, and to keep her healthy. Maj. would be well and truly pleased to hear of blessed government, victory over her enemies, and the health of her body.

(3) On the other hand, Your Imperial Majesty graciously accepts. Maj. graciously know, from what constant Christian causes your chur- and F. Grace, also other your kinsmen, may not with good conscience have accepted before God the performed parting of the next held Imperial Diet, as far as it concerns faith; and especially from that, that the same parting is quite contrary to the previous one, in the 26th year at Speier unanimously erected and granted.

rvärtig and entgegen, dass auch ein Mehrers in den Dingen, das Wort Gott und unser Gewissen betreffend, nicht statthatten darf, viel wenig ein Part gegen den anderen, der nicht zugleich in die Handlung bewilligt, fortrücken darf.

(4) For this reason, also their Supreme and Federal Grace, and others, protested against it; and when, after manifold Christian admonitions, entreaties, and requests, they did not want to yield from their authority, they appealed to your Imperial Majesty as their supreme protection and umbrella, and to a free Christian council or national assembly, and thereupon immediately dispatched their messages to your Imperial Majesty. Maj. as their supreme protection and umbrella, and a free Christian Concilium or National Assembly, and thereupon immediately dispatched their messages with it, which your Imperial Maj. Maj. have met in Jtalia, and there have reported in writing and orally by their masters' command, according to their instruction.

(5) And although their Lord and F. Grace, and the others, would have provided, according to the occasion, and since nothing else was sought but what is just and right, your Imperial Majesty would have given them a gracious answer. Maj. would have given them a gracious answer, yet, notwithstanding their previous causes and instructions, an ungracious answer has been given, and in such a way that they should again grant and accept the same leave.

(6) And when the deputies heard the same through your Imperial Majesty's Secretary Sweat. Maj. Secretarius Sweat, by their order, they have interposed the appeal, which was made at Speier, after the parting, before your Imperial Maj. Maj. in the opinion that their Electoral and Imperial Grace, and others, will justify the same in due time.

(7) But before the same appeal was heard and read by Your Imperial Majesty. Maj., the said sweat has taken the embassies into custody, so that they should not leave the inn at Placenz, nor write anything to their masters about it, until further order of your Imperial Maj. Maj. command.

(8) Although the embassies, according to the natural laws and those of all peoples and of Your Imperial Majesty, should be free, and the infidels should not take any action against such persons, and they should have the right of their conduct and good deeds. Maj. written laws, and the infidels should not do anything wrong against such persons, and they should have enjoyed their good conduct and good deed of rights; moreover, that they neither spoke nor advertised anything else than what they were ordered to do, and their Electoral and Imperial Grace, and others, did not provide for this: nevertheless, they could have excused Your Imperial Maj. Maj. in this respect, on account of the many affairs, and believe that if the same had been rightly reported, and, as is proper, remembered and acted in the presence of German, impartial counsellors, the competent ones would have obtained a better decision.

(9) And are their electoral and princely graces, also the aforementioned cities, caused to send us to Your Imperial Highness? Graces, also the aforementioned cities, on account of the unforeseen answer, have caused us to be delivered to Your Imperial Majesty. Maj., with order to inform Your Imperial Maj. Maj. humbly:

(10) If it had this opinion, as it has reached Imperial Maj. If it had this opinion, as it has reached the Emperor's Maj. from the opposite party with an unequal report, that the separation would be made in such a way, as it is touched upon in their answer, as if it were to be placed solely for the prevention, from that time on, of further all kinds of frightful innovations, doctrines and sects, then their sovereign and princely grace and others would recognize themselves that they had sought unreasonable refusal. If, however, in her grace and in other lands and territories, the sects and doctrines of the Anabaptists, and those who do not believe that the true body and blood of Christ are in the sacrament of the altar, are expressly reported, preached, written, and taught fiercely and more than in other places, and her electoral and princely grace, and others, have their mitigation. and others of their kinsmen are again opposed to the same sects and erroneous doctrines, and wish to remain so by divine help.

(11) What they have been asked to do in the great committee and otherwise publicly before all the estates of the realm, they refer to their list, which they have handed over, and the rest of their own statement.

(12) And that Your Imperial Majesty has suggested that a council might not be necessary. Maj. argued that a concilii might not be necessary, since this had once been decided by all the estates: on this we have orders to inform your Imperial Majesty that if one speaks and acts only about matters that concern God's word and conscience, it is impossible to come to a concilii. Maj. that if one speaks and acts only on matters that concern God's word and conscience, it is impossible to come to a decision, since it is still not clear from the root, from which the division stems, how duly and properly God's word has been acted upon.

Thirteenth, then, may your sovereign and princely graces, and others, give notice at the proper time that it may not be concluded. The will and consent of many must also be required, as the law states, first of all because the matter concerns the consciences. And if those who are on their side, and are against one and the other's part, were to conclude as a majority (1) against the others, they would consider it unequal, as reason dictates.

1) This sentence is completely out of order in the old edition. We have corrected it according to s 17 of the previous written instruction.

(14) To what disruption of the common peace in the German nation such a thing would be, where it should be considered that the opposing party wanted to advance with its majority, and that such a thing would be considered a decided thing, then one misfortune would increase the other.

(15) For this reason, all the estates, and also Your Imperial Majesty, consider it most convenient that a free Christian council be convened in these matters. Majesty, that a free Christian concilium be announced in these matters, so that all those who are interested and consider themselves Christians may also be heard.

(16) Nor may a more useful way and means be devised, and that in the meantime it would be held, as any authority "hoped to answer to God and your Imperial Majesty," which is punishment enough if they expect it. Maj. which is punishment enough if they expect the same.

17. and when finally in Ew. kais. Majesty. Answer, as if thereby, where the parting was lived, the more resistance should be offered to the Turk: thereupon we have again orders to send this report to Your Imperial Majesty. Majesty this report, that their Electoral and Princely Graces, on Your Imperial Majesty's request, are to be respected. Their Royal and Princely Graces, on Your Imperial Majesty. Majesty and his brother King Ferdinand's writings and requests, that it may not be charged against them that a shortage has appeared because of them, and that they were the last in need. For this reason, their electoral and princely graces, and those of the others, have been granted. Graces, and the other, submissive request, your Imperial Majesty would like to have this Majesty would graciously consider this important matter, even in honor and acceptance of the word of God, and rescind the mandates and orders, where they have not already been revoked otherwise, and most conduively call for a free Christian council in a convenient place, so that the cause of the discord may be properly traced and acted upon, and decree that, therefore, their message to Your Imperial Majesty in Italy, according to the content, be sent to your Majesty. Majesty in Italy, according to the contents of their instruction and oral request, and consider that Their Electoral and Princely Graces, and others, in the matter of the conflict, are in the best interests of the Church. and others, in matters concerning God's honor, should be more obedient to him than to men. Otherwise, those who have been sent to us will recognize your Imperial Majesty as their rightful lord and master in all matters that are due to us. Majesty for their rightful Lord and Emperor, and also want to show themselves to Your Imperial Majesty with all that is in their possession, as their forefathers and ancestors did faithfully. Majesty so that the latter shall have a good pleasure in it; as they have hitherto been diligent in all matters, and have obediently pursued and paid all that they were ordered to give against the Turk, for the maintenance of the chamber court, regiment, and otherwise.

18. and hand over to Your Imperial Majesty our Instruction. Majesty our Instruction, in which their Electoral and Princely Graces, and the others' needs, are further set forth. and the others' necessities, and ask, as stipulated therein, for Your Imperial Majesty's most gracious answer. Majesty's most gracious answer.

2. draft of the Instruction, what the strict N. and N. want from the most illustrious 2c. Lord Ferdinand, King of Hungary and Bohemia, Imperial Majesty in the Holy Empire. Majesty in the Holy Roman Empire, on our account, and what they should do.

1. beginning of their royal dignity to say our 2c. Service 2c. And then to signify the following opinion: Their royal dignity would not know what happened at the recent Imperial Diet at Speier concerning the parting there, in the article concerning the faith, between the other imperial estates, us and our adherents and fellow relatives, and that we, out of the distressed need of our consciences, also other brave, important causes, which we have reported to their royal dignity and to the imperial estates in writings, but before that, while they have protested against our friendly warnings, exhortations, requests and entreaties, in committee and otherwise, they have continued with such their resolution and farewell, have protested against it, and have also appealed against it in writings, as is proper to do in a formal manner; not of the opinion to cause some burdensome segregation or division among the imperial estates (for that should, if God wills, be far from us), but only to keep our consciences, as is fair, free and unchallenged, also to protect our faithful sovereigns and subjects from unequal grievances of their consciences and souls, and besides from revolts, disobedience, and an irretrievable apostasy, as every faithful authority is bound to do out of dutiful duty of the commanded office of its property.

(2) When we therefore immediately resolved to send an embassy to the Roman Imperial Majesty, our most gracious Lord. Majesty, our most gracious lord, whether to the same her Imperial Majesty has reached us. Majesty, that we may, on account of our protest and appeal to her Imperial Majesty, take another form. Majesty in a different form than we had intended for the action we had taken, and that we had been disparaged without cause; as we reported before and after with faith that we had very hardly been carried to Her Imperial Majesty. Majesty: so we have nevertheless, in honour of her Imperial Majesty, out of a desire to be a part of it. Majesty's honour, out of a but submissive and inclined will, and so that Her Imperial Majesty may have a clear and thorough report to Her Majesty. Majesty may have a clear, thorough report of our disposition, which also moves us to such a proceeding and non-approval, to Her Imperial Majesty. Majesty our embassies and envoys to Hispania, which also her Majesty has met in Italy, and to her Imperial Majesty we have sent our embassies and envoys to Italy. Majesty. of many good, brave and respectable causes, by which we have been driven to our protest and appeal out of necessity, orally and in writing most humbly; with the special request that we accept the aforementioned Speierian decree in all other articles, outside of those against which we have publicly protested, grant it, and carry out that which the same decree imposes on us, on our part, faithfully, also not depending on the Holy Sacrament of the Body and Blood of our Lord Jesus Christ and rebaptism, but on their Majesty, the Holy Spirit, the Holy Spirit, the Holy Spirit and the Holy Spirit., whom we recognize as our rightful lord and superior, and who should be powerful over our lands, people, bodies and goods, and likewise, as faithful members of the holy kingdom, want to show all submissive obedience, support and charity, and what we would be able to accomplish in the temporal, with eagerness. Wherever, on Christian grounds and in accordance with the Scriptures, we have been directed to another, which we held, believed, and professed to be Christian, or by the ordinary determination of a free Christian council, by means of the divine word, we should be directed to another, that in such, as Christian people, we should be obedient members of the church, and those who consider themselves to be obedient members of the church, and who recognize themselves to be obedient members of the Christian Church, and who desire nothing but the truth, as is only fair, and who would neither accept nor defend an insanity, much less persevere and submit to the resolute and submissive request, whether this treaty has reached or is still to reach her Imperial Majesty from someone of another form. Majesty, but to be and remain our most gracious Lord and Emperor, as our envoys' advertisement and the sealed instruction handed over at length indicate, of which we are sending copies in the same wording to their royal dignity herewith, and have also provided ourselves entirely that these important causes of ours, as well as our submissive notifications, high requests and imploring petitions to Imperial Majesty, should at least be as much requested as possible by the Emperor. Maj. should have had so much esteem that Her Majesty, in such a brave deal, which does not affect property, honor, country or people, but souls, our consciences and blessedness, the things until Her Imperial Majesty's future. Maj.'s future to the Empire, or until further thorough inquiry into our request, whether Her Imperial Majesty has ever entertained any doubt or lack of certain report in such matter. Majesty has ever entertained some doubt or lack of certain report in this matter, or have shown themselves in their answer to our envoy in such a way that we may in fact feel a favorable imperial and gracious inclination on the part of Her Majesty, as our Lord, towards our high subservience.

(3) But not only has there been an ungracious, unforeseen farewell in her Majesty's name to our envoys, and it has been delivered to them in writing. 3. Not only have our envoys received and sealed in writing a rude and unforeseen leave in her Majesty's name, of the opinion that we should again accept the Speier leave made, live obediently to it, and do nothing against it, with the appendix that if we were to appear disobedient about it, her Majesty would not want to avoid taking serious punishment against us 2c., further the contents of the same leave 2c., but the thought of our envoys as those who want to insinuate our appeal, which we made at Speier out of necessity, to the Imperial Majesty out of our command, and the instrument of our appeal to the Imperial Majesty. Majesty by our command, and the instrument of our appeal libell Master Alexander Schweiß, to their Imperial Majesty. Majesty's Secretaries, on account of Her Imperial Majesty. Majesty's Secretaries, are also to be informed of the appeal in the name of the Imperial Majesty. Majesty to their hostel at Placentia, where their Imperial Majesty is holding court. Majesty with her court, and besides entangled with high threat, not to give us, as their lords, any written or oral notice of this.

(4) But that we would certainly not have provided for ourselves, according to the form of these things, according to the occasion of the time and course, also the concerns of the Holy Roman Empire and the emergency needs that were present, and the causes that are reported hereafter. For we have sent our embassies this long journey to the Emperor's Majesty as our rightful representative. Majesty, as our rightful lord and superior, with whom we should seek and wait for the cheapest help, consolation and protection, and made the same to her Majesty for obedience, honor and favor. For one.

(5) On the other hand: We have asked Her Imperial Majesty for a quite necessary, friendly, and amicable opinion. Majesty a quite necessary, friendly and mild opinion, which could not have been made more submissive and respectful, from which the Imperial Majesty could not have drawn even the slightest disfavor. Majesty would not have been able to draw even the slightest disfavor from it.

(6) Thirdly: Thus our envoys at that time, on such an unforeseen arduous parting, have alone lodged our previous appeal from the Speierische Reichsabschiede kaiserl. Majesty.

Secretaries, solely according to our unavoidable necessity, in all submissiveness insinuated, and thus us in her imperial Majesty's name. Majesty. Majesty's protection and protection.

(7) Fourthly, we have not made our appeal before any foreign judge or any disorderly, inconvenient place, but first of all before the Imperial Majesty himself as our protector and protector. Majesty himself, as our protector and guardian; therefore, out of special, high trust that we have in His Majesty the Emperor, we are justified in relying on him. Maj., we have no other recourse than that Imperial Majesty, according to his gracious wishes, may grant us the right. Majesty, after graciously interrogating our embassies, should have accepted the necessary action commanded, and should have dispatched them again with grace; even though this is required by natural equity, reason, and all respectability, and up to now embassies and legates have been held everywhere against the infidels and public enemies. But that our messages would have met with a different outcome, her Majesty would easily have to consider, to whom such a thing would not be fair to his mind, first of all, if he should find himself so hasty in such important matters of the Emperor, which do not concern temporal goods, honor or welfare, but the consciences, and the eternal salvation and disaster of souls.

(8) Fifthly: That in the imperial and all written laws it is expressly provided for necessity that all legates and embassies in all places have comfort, liberty, and assurance, and as long as their legation lasts shall not wait for some burdensome action, as also such rights against the Turk's and public enemies' embassies have hitherto been held: much more and cheaper should it be, in our opinion, that against Christian estates, against the empire's kinsmen and members, also obedient to the imperial majesty, the right of the imperial legates and embassies to act in the name of the empire, and that against Christian estates, against the empire's kinsmen and members, also obedient to the imperial majesty, the right of the empire to act in the name of the empire. Majest. Majesty's subjects, as foreigners; moreover, that also the Imperial Majesty should be Majesty has promised and undertaken against all Electors in lieu of the common estates of the Empire, that Her Imperial Majesty shall not take any of the subjects of the Empire as strangers. Majesty will not rape any of the imperial estates for herself, nor will she permit others to do so, but will allow each estate, where it may suffer due justice, to have due hearing and equity, and will order it to do so in the case of others. Item, that her imperial Majesty Majesty shall have and maintain her residence, estate, and court in the Holy Empire of the German Nation, for the honor, benefit, and good of all members, estates, and subjects there. Item, that her imperial. Majesty shall grant their offices, offices at Court and in the empire, with no other nation than born Germans, who are not of a different class or nature, but are truly honest people of princes, counts, lords, nobility and other brave people of good origin.

(9) Let all this be done by our envoys of the royal dignity. Dignity, as at this time Imperial Maj. Maj. in the Holy Roman Empire, shall also indicate our need of official, friendly and subservient opinion, and with the best modesty, and at the same time make it known that we presume to be of service to this Imperial Majesty. Majesty. This farewell and action is due in no small part to the fact that the Imperial Majesty, in the time of her Imperial Majesty's reign, has not visited the Holy Roman Empire very much, and now 1) has not visited it for a long time, and therefore has not reported thoroughly on the occasion of the affairs of the Empire, and before that, as is the case in all matters concerning the faith and the Gospel, and as the necessity of such heavy and important matters demands, and has also been so burdened with much other business of her Majesty's own that her Imperial Majesty has not been able to report thoroughly on the affairs of the Holy Roman Empire. Maj. of the Holy Roman Empire's affairs at this time. So also be Her Imperial Majesty with little German counsel. Majesty with few German counsellors, first of all those who know the actions, concerns and grievances of the Empire and the opportunity of the Imperial Estates and the German nation, that we also have a great deal of interest in this trade, and that it is therefore impossible for the Imperial Estates to part with Speier in the Articles of Faith, for the reasons which have been brought to the attention of Imperial Majesty by our embassies. Majesty by our messages, that we would anger God Almighty as our rightful Lord, Creator, Sustainer and Savior, knowingly act against His divine word and truth, deliberately weigh down our conscience, and burden our obedient subjects with all unpleasantness; which, however, all Christian men, at the loss of their souls' salvation, owe their highest fortune to prevent, and to guard against. Thus it has never been the duty of the imperial estates to first make a reservation about the imperial majesty as their lord. Majesty, as their Lord, in this matter touching faith, Christian doctrine and religion, in which only a Christian man is to be protected against the loss of his soul's salvation and his highest fortune.

1) "now" put by us instead of: "only". - After the Diet held at Worms in 1521, Emperor Carl V left Germany and did not return to the Diet of Augsburg until 1530, after an absence of nine years.

It is the duty of the Council, through the proper Christian means, and not of some of the states of the kingdom, to act and determine, in the form and without interrogation of the principal matters and parties, what is to be recognized and decided, or to forbid anyone to accept it against his conscience; nor should it behoove us, in such high divine dealings, to look to the more or the more unanimous of men, as some suppose, but rather to the one true word of God.

(10) And are therefore determined to again send an excellent message to Imperial Majesty. Majesty, also to report our above complaints of all ends even more and more nobly to her, the consoling confidence to find with her Imperial Majesty a different and gracious mind and farewell. Majesty a different and gracious mind and farewell.

11. Since the holy empire has never been in greater danger in many hundreds of years, and has been burdened with heavier obligations than it is now, and since all true information suggests no other than that the hereditary enemy of our faith, the Turk, will return in the coming summer and perhaps try his luck even more fiercely and bravely than before, it is our time and highly necessary that the Christian states unite with one accord and faithfully stand together as brothers, It is of great importance to us that the Christian nations unite with one accord, sit faithfully in one another, and do their best as brothers next to one another, and each let the other's concerns and hardships be his own affairs, to unanimously resist the hereditary enemy of the Christian faith with the grace and help of God, who above all is to be invoked and asked for daily through faithful prayer. But the way to do this is not at all to make the estates of the empire do what is most unbearable and burdensome to them for the sake of their souls, consciences, country and people, and to act by force without proper, fair and thorough interrogation and Christian determination, as the royal dignity, as an understanding Christian king, to whom the occasion and present need of the holy empire and the German nation is known and not hidden from others, cannot doubtfully consider. And our envoys shall thereupon request and entreat their royal dignity in an entirely official and humbly manner, since we are committed to their royal dignity with all friendship, inclination, and grace, and that their royal dignity of the Holy Roman Empire and Imperial Majesty of the Holy Roman Empire may be granted. Majesty. and Imperial Majesty, as well as Christian peace, harmony and obedience of the subjects with all possible means.

that her royal dignity will then send an excellent message, on account of her royal dignity, in addition to our envoys, to the imperial majesty. Majesty, and to ask and entreat her Majesty most diligently to consider this high transaction graciously, and to consider not only some special estates, but common Christendom, the Holy Roman Empire, and the German Nation's honor, benefit, and prosperity, as well as her Majesty's own highest welfare, and in our protestation or appeal until a common, free, Christian concilium, or to put this trade at rest, where it may be acted upon with proper consideration and necessary diligence, and that which is most useful, most Christian and most conducive to common peace may be promoted and taken in hand: this would actually be the right way<sup>1)</sup> and prevent the imperial estates from much unhappiness and presumably separation, against imperial majesty in the case of men. Majesty, promote a great obedient love and inclination in males, and make the royal dignity much friendship and good will, which we are also willing and submissive to earn for their royal dignity.

Xota: Wherever the Royal Majesty of Hungary and Bohemia of the Princes, Princes and Estates would request instructions to His Imperial Majesty. Majesty, the Embassies of Her Majesty shall also comply with them.

884. derer of Nuremberg's concern why it would be more useful to discontinue these legations.

See No. 879.

Causes and misgivings of the people of Nuremberg, why it might be more useful to stop the sending to imperial majesty for the time being.

(1) First of all, it is no consolation at all that without the royal dignity of Hungary and Bohemia, the protesting estates will achieve anything fruitful at the imperial court, or obtain a change in the previous imperial decree, since these matters of faith and other matters of the empire and the German nation, as is certainly known, are all first discussed, tractated, and debated at the royal court.

002 Now, if the king should not send an embassy, or should he not wish to promote this trade most faithfully, then not only, as reported, would the

The reason for this is not only that the sending is unfruitful and in vain, but also, as every reasonable person may consider, that the matter is worse than before, for then one would have to worry not only at the imperial, but also at the royal court about more disfavor and hardship, also less change of imperial majesty's mind and farewell than before. Majesty's mind and farewell than before.

3. Item 3: Since it is no small advantage to the protesting estates in this matter that the writ or imperial command on which her Majesty's leave is principally based has not yet been delivered; For this reason, the Estates must always excuse themselves and say that they cannot assume anything else from the non-response to such an order than that Her Imperial Majesty has changed her mind, through which the protesting Estates' insistence on the Speier Imperial Decree has even gained a great reputation, and with Imperial Majesty and all the Estates, a great deal of respect. It is to be considered whether, by the present sending, and since it is more doubtful than certain whether a gracious farewell can be obtained from the Emperor, the Emperor will not be induced to hand over such an order, upon which her Majesty's farewell is finally forthcoming, and also to cut off from the Estates the advantage they had with it before, and thus to make the matter much worse than better.

4. Item 4: In case of doubt as to whether one has not shied away from giving the Emperor a gracious farewell and amendment of that which Her Imperial Majesty has refused to give the protesting estates in response to their first dispatch, it is better and less burdensome, depending on all reasonable concerns, to take the safer path, in which the estates are less inconvenienced; But this is that one may still be out of time, and have a sensation at the runnings and the Diet, and not cause a nuisance with that which one has best considered.

Item 5: Everyone must confess that the closer the emperor is to the pope, and likewise the farther he is from the empire, the more difficult it is to deal with him in this matter, which is almost repugnant to the whole world, but especially to the pope, for which reason it would almost be good to expect a change of place, time, and persons at the imperial court, so that one evil does not increase the other.

Item 6: In the meantime, the protesting estates do not need the nearer Imperial Diet, before these runs in the empire, and all because the emperor is not in the empire in his own person, a mighty procession or other so burdensome. The Emperor is not yet allowed to worry about this in the absence of the Emperor's Majesty. For what reason do the estates now want to send to the emperor to prevent and prevent that which they are not yet allowed to worry about in the absence of imperial majesty?

7. It is evident what great costs have now been incurred for the embassies in Italy to the Emperor's Majesty; should one now send again, and perhaps, according to necessity, a brave or respectable embassy; likewise, should an embassy be obtained from the King of Bohemia, which would then also be at the expense of the estates: Consider, each one, what an excessive cost this would be, and how burdensome it would be for the protesting estates, since the lesser part would send and bear it; moreover, that the same cost would be in vain, no less than the previous one.

(8) Therefore it is considered most fruitful, but on the previous advice of our most gracious and gracious lords, the electors, princes, and estates, as the more prudent, to have misgivings that the shipment would not now finally be decided, but that the causes would be brought by their electoral and princely councils behind them to their most gracious and gracious lords, and that they would move whether it should nevertheless be good to send it or not. They have decided that a further day should be appointed for this purpose, each party opening its opinion to the other in writings.

009 And that, nevertheless, in the mean time, when anything troublesome shall happen to the estates, they shall know it of one another, faithfully compose themselves, and thus show themselves to one another as he would have liked the other to do.

885. draft of a letter brought by the Margrave of Brandenburg in Borschlag and to be sent to the Emperor instead of the legation.

See No. 879.

a Letter of the Protesting Estates to Imperial. Majesty.

Most Gracious Sir! Our decreed messages, which we have received after the next Speier Diet, for the sake of our necessary protest and appeal, which is permitted in all rights, have been sent to us out of high submissiveness.

We have been sent to your Imperial Majesty, as our most gracious Emperor, Lord and Protector, with confidence, and report on their return, as they have graciously heard from your Imperial Majesty in their first advertisement. Majesty in their first advertisement, and have also been graciously put off: of this we say to Your Imperial Majesty, most subserviently. Majesty our most humble thanks. But after our embassies reported to us, when they waited several days for your Imperial Majesty's gracious answer and dispatch, and were undoubtedly put off by it (according to their submissive advertisement ordered by us), that they, perhaps due to our displeasers, or those who have not adequately reported this trade and the Holy Empire's opportunity. Not only have they been served with an unforeseen farewell in writs, but also that they, when they had interposed our appeal to your Imperial Majesty's Secretaries at Speier, had alone insinuated it with all submissiveness before your Imperial Majesty had properly read or heard it. Majesty may read or hear them properly and consider them according to equity, arrest them in the hostel, and oblige them not to write anything to us nor to send some servant of theirs to us until your Imperial Majesty's further notice; And although they have graciously refrained from such arrest and obligation, this has been heard of everywhere in the realm, and interpreted by many as if our embassies had solicited and acted something on our behalf that is not proper; but which is and should be far from us. Nevertheless, this does not cause us any slight disgrace and disadvantage; out of loyalty we would be inclined and willing to send other of our noble embassies to your Imperial Majesty, and to have your Imperial Majesty informed of our complaint with a more thorough report of the matter. But since we hear and understand that your Imperial Majesty in Italy is burdened with considerable great business, and is willing to come to the Holy Roman Empire of the German Nation as soon as possible after the completion of his business in Italy, for all of which we wish your Imperial Majesty God Almighty's mercy and all welfare, as those who in truth enjoy your Imperial Majesty's future to the highest degree and humbly ask them to promote it as soon as possible: We therefore abstain from any other than humble, faithful, good opinion, of your Imperial Majesty. Majesty this time with other messages of ours, but are of the submissive will and mind, when your Imperial Majesty comes out into the Empire, to convey the same to your Imperial Majesty.

Majesty's own person, or by our public message, for the sake of matters touched, to make further thorough and, in our hope, such a good report that your Imperial Majesty will not only change her leave, given to our previous message in haste and on unequal report, but will be our most gracious Emperor and Lord. Majesty will not only change her farewell, given to our previous message in haste and on unequal report, but will be our most gracious Emperor and Lord, and will hear from all actions that in all our doings we are more, or ever not less, than someone else to your Imperial Majesty, the Holy Roman Empire. Majesty, the Holy Empire and common Christendom, and have desired nothing better. When we also defended ourselves against the tyrannical Turkish invasion by paying our common imperial contribution in money, we also subsequently asked for your Imperial Majesty's gracious permission to do so. Majesty's gracious request, and your Imperial Majesty's brother, the King. Majesty's brother, Royal Dignity of Hungary and Bohemia, friendly and gracious request, with help, salvation, consolation and other assistance, before and besides other Imperial Estates, in such a way that we have therefore received thanks from the said your Imperial Majesty's brother. Majesty's brother, and hope no less for the same from your Imperial Majesty. Majesty; and we also remember ourselves for this and other things to your Imperial Majesty and the Holy Roman Empire. Majesty and the Holy Roman Empire as pious, faithful, obedient, Christian princes, as far as our fortune, body and goods reach, as from our forefathers and ancestors to your Imperial Majesty and the same forefathers to your Imperial Majesty. Majesty and the same ancestors until their death. And on all this to your Imperial Majesty our all-subject Majesty our most submissive request, whether we have been or would still be brought into your Imperial Majesty together or especially in another form. Majesty, that Your Imperial Majesty may grant the same our right to be a part of it. Majesty will not give credence to our plea for necessity without interrogation, nor will he allow us to be disgraced or otherwise burdened without a prior proper interrogation and judgment of right, as Your Imperial Majesty, as a just man, is entitled to do. Majesty, as a just emperor, is due, and the same your Imperial Majesty to our subject. Majesty will graciously do so in accordance with our submissive high trust. This we wish to do towards your Imperial Majesty. Majesty in all due submissiveness obediently and entirely willingly. Hereupon also command us to Your Imperial Majesty. Majesty, as our most gracious Emperor, protector and guardian; and although we, according to right, also according to all dignity and fairness, do not provide ourselves with anyone else for your Imperial Majesty, we nevertheless ask for your support. Majesty, we most humbly request Your Imperial Majesty's gracious permission. Majesty's gracious reply to this messenger. Date 2c.

By the Grace of God John, Duke of Saxony, Elector 2c., George, Margrave of Branden-bürg 2c., Ernst and Franciscus, brothers, dukes of Brunswick and Lüneburg, Philipp, landgrave of Hesse 2c., Wolfgang, prince of Anhalt, Gebhardt and Albrecht, counts and lords of Mansfeld, and the respectable free and imperial cities, related to the above-mentioned trade.

To the Imperial Majesty.

As the most illustrious and the most illustrious Highborn Prince and Lord, Mr. Johannsen, Archmarshall and Elector of the Holy Roman Empire. Reichs Erzmarschall und Churfürsten; Mr. Georgen, Margrave of Brandenburg, and Mr. Philippsen, Landgrave of Hesse, my most gracious and gracious counsellors, and among them also the counsellors of the noble, high-born and well-born princes and lords, Mr. Ernten and Mr. Franciscen, Dukes of Brunswick and Lüneburg, Mr. Wolfgang, Prince of Anhalt, and Mr. Gebhardden and Mr. Albrechten, brothers, counts and lords of Mansfeld; and then of an honorable council at Nuremberg council message, for themselves and by force of the honorable cities of Winsheim, Reutlingen, Weißenburg at the Nordgau, on the parting recently at Schmalkalden have been with each other: have reported to my most gracious and gracious lords councillors and an honourable council at Nuremberg, firstly an instruction to the Roman. Imperial. Majesty, our most gracious Lord. Besides an Instruction has been issued as to whether it would please their Electoral and Princely Graces and the other Estates to send to the Royal Dignities of Hungary and Bohemia. Grace and the other estates to send to the royal dignities of Hungary and Bohemia. When, however, the Nurembergers had some reasons for considering whether to send to the Imperial Majesty and the Royal Dignity of Hungary and Bohemia. Majesty and royal dignity should still be sent at this time, the deputies of their sovereignty want to report on the simplest of these. And in the council is moved, if some state learns that the others all or some might be entitled to some objectionable burden, to report this to the other in confidence. If also the mandate, of which Imperial Majesty Majesty would go out, however, that the Elector of Saxony, as much as it is possible and always tolerable, would keep the other estates, who agree with his Electors on the articles of faith and Christianity that have been handed over, in peace. He may have them describe in haste to a convenient place, or otherwise indicate in writings, what would be useful and good to do to avert the burdensome care and disadvantage, and may send or write it to Imperial Majesty and Royal Dignity. Majesty and royal dignity, or in other ways. And since it is presumed that Imperial Majesty will send it on the first day. And since it is presumed that Imperial Majesty will call an Imperial Diet on the first day of March, and perhaps not all the estates will appear in person, it is considered good that in the meantime everyone should consider what should be brought forward or otherwise acted upon at the same Imperial Diet, where it is to be attended, so that hereupon they may have to compare and decide with each other in a more respectable manner. All of these things the deputies have agreed to carry to their sovereignty, and what will be the concern of each of them in all of this, is to be submitted within a month to the Elector of Saxony, and later by his Electoral Grace to the other estates. His Grace to the other estates. Actum Nuremberg, Wednesday after Trium Regum [12 Jan] Anno Domini 1530.

The thirteenth chapter.

About the Imperial Diet in Augsburg in 1530 and the Augsburg Confession handed over at the same, also about Luther's stay in Coburg during the Imperial Diet.

First paragraph.

What was negotiated between Emperor Carl V. and Pope Clemens VII. at Bologna, and how the former announced an Imperial Diet to Augsburg in 1530; as also of the coronation of the Emperor which took place immediately thereafter.

887 A speech by the Imperial Grand Chancellor Mercurinus Gattinara, delivered at Bologna in the assembly of the Pope and the Cardinals, also in the presence of the Emperor, in which he asks the Pope, in the name of the Emperor, to write a Concilium. End of February or beginning of March 1530.

Translated from the Latin by I. F.

Most holy father, most venerable lord! According to this, the most invincible Emperor Carl the Fifth, always greater, my most gracious Lord, at the beginning of his reign, did not become aware without the most sensitive pain of his mind that a great and very harmful disagreement had arisen among the most distinguished teachers of the Church of God, and that this is increasing day by day, he must see how even now these theologians differ from one another in doctrine and in their opinions, and how thereby the Church of God is being most miserably harmed, and how many pious people are being greatly annoyed by such a performance and evil example; indeed, that the heat of teaching, writing, arguing, and quarreling has now come to such a point that, if one does not in time by good counsel come to the aid of Christendom and the wretched condition of the Roman Empire, and serve against the present far-seeing disaster If the Emperor were to provide for the same means, in which the Church, all of its ranks, and also private and common life throughout the Roman Empire would be in the greatest danger, his Imperial Majesty has, from the beginning of her most noble reign, cared for nothing so much, and thought of nothing so eagerly, as that she should endeavor and fall upon a means. Majesty, from the beginning of her most praiseworthy reign, among many other important imperial affairs, has been so concerned about nothing, and has thought of nothing more eagerly, than that she should endeavor and fall upon a means to restore peace and tranquility to the church and the empire, which are in danger, and to abolish and remove from the way everything that seems to be contrary to the general welfare.

(2) Although even Imperial Majesty is well aware that the science and investigation of disputes in the Church is the responsibility of His Holiness. Majesty is well aware that the science and investigation of the disputes that arise in the church because of doctrine and customs is primarily the responsibility of Your Holiness, the authority and mediation of the church. Without this nothing should and may be done and decided in a right, beneficial and lasting way, and that the care of such important matters is entrusted to Your Holiness by God, and that she takes care of the salvation of the Church and of the sheepfold of Christ in a right fatherly way, and also, as an old, godly and prudent Lord, takes painful part in the general ruin with His Majesty, nevertheless, the Imperial Majesty, although she is an old, godly and prudent gentleman, has not yet taken any action against His Majesty. Majesty, although she is currently involved in many imperial affairs and sorrowful wars, has often wished and requested of God that she might once on a day come to speak with Your Holiness, and deal with such important matters and take counsel.

3rd That now Imperial. Majesty has granted her wish, and at this respectable coronation ceremony acte and [the] journey to Germany has been given the opportunity to venerate Ew. Heil personally and to engage in conversation with her. Majesty testifies to her heartfelt joy and offers God the greatest gratitude for this; in view of her firm and firm belief that Ew. Heil will find a remedy in this highly honored assembly, by which the decayed condition of Christendom will be remedied and a strong remedy for the spiritual wounds and for the evil life of mankind will be procured in these gloomy times. For the Emperor is assured by Ew. Hail, that they, like His Majesty, as the two highest heads of the Church and of the Empire, direct their care and effort to the promotion of the glory of God, to the preservation of peace, and to the vigilant prevention and abolition of that which may diminish the excellence and majesty of both; which is especially to be preserved in this way, if one applies diligence and makes every effort to show the eternal God his due honor, namely, to know him rightly, to serve him, and to call upon him; that the right and wholesome doctrine in the Church be kept pure and clean; that, where errors, false doctrines or superstitions have crept in, they be prevented, the decayed church discipline be restored, the vicious customs, both in the clergy and among the common rabble, of which there are unfortunately many and various, be improved, and the falsified doctrine of the Church be purified and cleansed. Whereby his majesty. according to her wisest insight, considers that, if one is not anxious with all zeal to compose a certain doctrinal book from the word of God, to bind up and heal the damage of the church at times, and to introduce a stricter church discipline, in a short time a still greater confusion, a still more miserable and thicker darkness, a still more heinous barbarism, and more considerable damage and fall than has ever been experienced before, is likely to follow; Not to think that through the safety, wickedness, and sins of all men, the severest and most just judgments will be brought upon the authorities and subjects.

(4) When then Imperial Majesty, after the very difficult wars have finally ended. When, after the very difficult wars had finally ended, and other efforts had been put aside, the Emperor began to think about this whole matter often and much, and to consult righteous and knowledgeable men, she could not have devised a more salutary means, and one that would be more in keeping with papal and imperial benevolence, than if, on this day, in this General Assembly, the disputes of the Church were to be settled in a proper manner, in the fear of God, and decided according to the rule and truth of the divine word, and that pious and learned men be called together from all nations, and that these be given free authority to speak publicly, to debate, and to show the truth, and that opinions be honestly and sincerely held against each other, and that discourses be held thereon, and the previous disputes are completely settled, and finally either papal sanctity, or else skilful and impartial judges, as many as are chosen for this purpose, take care that, after they have seen and examined everything well, they hold stiffly and firmly about what agrees with the evangelical doctrine and the unconquerable truth. On the other hand, that the harmful errors and abuses in doctrine, which conflict with the bright and clear word of God, be condemned, and that their authors either be brought to the right path, where possible, or be left to the lawful authorities for punishment, but that everything be done out of love, nothing by force, and that finally all teachers and hearers, and that finally all teachers and listeners, after the improvement of the doctrine and the abolition of the abuses that had gone on during the pregnancy, be encouraged to true worship and to the uncolored service of God, as well as to the obedience of the church, to believe rightly, to teach purely and to walk blamelessly, so that in this way one glorifies God, establishes a lasting and constant peace for the church, and promotes the welfare of all Christians in the best possible way.

(5) But because Imperial Majesty is unaware that the Papal See has been established. Majesty is not aware that papal saints have the right and power to call public meetings. Since it is not concealed from the Imperial Majesty that the papal saints have the right and the power to call public assemblies and to convene them, and that the disputes arising in the church are to be submitted to their prestige and judicial decision, the Imperial Majesty seeks all the less to infringe upon the rights of the Roman See, since she has recently given an oath to that effect. Majesty seeks so much less to infringe the rights of the Roman See, since she has just before sworn 1) to remain a friend and protector of it with all reverence and fidelity, but she nevertheless recognizes that the urgent need exists, and present circumstances and the general welfare of the church require it, and all righteous people desire this with great desire, nor any other way that would be right, just, customary, and praiseworthy, may he-

1) From this, the time to which this document belongs can be approximately determined. The oath that the emperor had to take to the pope before the coronation is found in No. 892 of this volume. The coronation itself took place on February 22 and 24, as we can see from the papal bull dated March 1, 1530 (No. 893).

If the Church is to see that the salvation, prestige, and rights of Your Majesty are preserved, that the decayed Church is raised up, that the afflicted souls of the pious are comforted, and that the truth of the evangelical doctrine of Christ is asserted, than by the convocation of such an assembly, Your Imperial Majesty requests that the Church be given the opportunity to be heard. Majesty. Ew. Heil, for the sake of Christ and the general welfare, that in this her noble and highly honored estate and office, the sheepfold of Christ, the will and desire of godly souls, the counsel of understanding and prudent men, and her own honor and reputation, she will not arise, and as soon as possible proclaim a concilium in a convenient place, and believe that this means, which has been in use for many hundreds of years, and has been instructed by God and the apostles themselves, is as necessary as it is useful, since such important disputes cannot possibly be settled by the judicial pronouncement of one and the other, or only to a lesser extent; but this must necessarily be done in a free assembly of rulers and teachers.

(6) But the fact that Imperial Majesty is so eagerly seeking this for your salvation is not with the intention of increasing your salvation. Majesty so eagerly seeks this from His Holiness, she does not do so with the intention of increasing His Holiness' already important and accumulated business; rather, she sincerely recognizes and confesses that her duty, her love for the true religion and the service of God, and the examples and deeds of the most praiseworthy emperors who have preceded her in government, drive and encourage her to make such efforts. For His Imperial Majesty knows well that Christian princes are fathers of the Church, and are appointed to save the honor of God, and to punish severely all that either teaches and preaches, or does, in an ungodly and detrimental manner against God and His only begotten Son. She remembers that Constantine was as busy with the preservation of the Christian religion as he was with the administration of the commonwealth and the waging of wars, and that since Arius had spread harmful and blasphemous errors against the Son of God, he held a famous and excellent assembly at Nicaea to investigate and condemn them, and that the proven errors were publicly condemned by the holy bishops and learned church fathers. Nor is it unknown to her that the Emperor Theodosius and Valentinianus, to say nothing of others, were present at such remarkable meetings, and that, after each had freely spoken his mind, a common conclusion was reached, and from the word of God the errors that had arisen were condemned, but the authors of the errors were not condemned. of the same with a severe punishment. Finally, she is certain that such conventions and deliberations have often been very useful and profitable to the Church of God and to the whole world, and just as one can never better examine the truth, see the errors, exercise church discipline, improve the vices, and resolve dangerous disputes than in proper assemblies; so she does not see how in our time the lost peace could be restored in a more comfortable and less troublesome way (since she has reservations about using violent means in this matter).

(7) Accordingly, His Majesty stands in the complete hope that His Holiness will give place to her kind remembrance and request, as well as to the counsel, ardent wish and sighing of so many pious souls, and agree that the beginning of unification should first be attempted by this means, which is the most honorable, mildest and most pitiable in this. She does not doubt that the immortal God, through His Spirit, will direct and govern these proposals for the glory of His name, as well as for the benefit and long-lasting peace of the Church, the Roman See, and the Empire.

8. His Imperial Majesty also promises high and dear that she will at all times faithfully assist your salvation and the entire Empire with her power, good counsel and reputation and, in remembrance of her oath, will be and remain a faithful protector and brave defender of the Apostolic See, of the evangelical truth, and of all the subjects of the Roman Empire.

888 Pope Clement's answer, in which he tries to reject the announcement of a council.

This and the next following Scripture is found in Melancthon's (keelamat, tom. V. , p. 94 84., besides in the places indicated at the preceding number.

Translated from the Latin by I. F.

(1) We well believe that you, Emperor Carl, who, according to your insight, speak reverently of the invocation of God, and appeal to the examples of praiseworthy princes, urge a synod out of good opinion; although in this matter, in which the church is in great danger, it is our counsel and reputation that are most important. For, that we do not now examine our right to do so, it is known that in the Nicene Assembly it was agreed that they should be kept in the occidental church.

We have often consulted ourselves, as well as the present Genutius, Farnesius, and others, about how to restore tranquility in the church. For this reason we have often consulted with ourselves, as well as with the present Genutius, Farnesius, and others, as to how we might restore tranquility in the church; whether we should deal with such matters in an assembly, or rather attack by force those who depart from the decrees and common opinions. Since we do not consider it good to call a synod, we ask you at the outset not to think that we are concerned about ourselves and the riches of the Roman See. It is said of John XXIII that he was sorry that he held a synod at Constance, since this overthrew him from his sovereignty; but we, who likewise experience all kinds of changes in fortune, and were also recently imprisoned, think that not only honor and power, but also this life itself is like a fleeting and transitory shadow, and want to resign our office with a calm and quiet mind, if God or some fate should require us to do so.

(2) After this, the goods of the Roman see, which Ludovicus, Caroli's son, has consecrated to it, in order that we may partly meet the most necessary expenses in our regiment, and partly be able to provide ourselves with more security against unconscionable incursions, do not cause us the slightest grief, but would gladly see ourselves relieved of this burden if we were always to have such emperors as you are.

(3) Accordingly, we are not at all opposed to holding an assembly because of these foolish and foolish desires; let even great jurists speak after all: The reputation must make the judge's sentence valid, and what has been decided before must not be made invalid by new discussions. For, if such a discussion were advisable to the peace and the descendants, we would certainly not want to hinder it, whose mind and thoughts are directed solely and exclusively to the general peace and the welfare of our descendants. However, we want to find out the true reasons for our resolution from the different nature of the doctrinal points themselves.

(4) There are doctrines, some of which are not only fundamentally false, but also obviously absurd and inconsistent, such as the Anabaptist doctrine that all must have goods in common among themselves; that sovereign power, courts of law, lawful punishments, and dominions are things that God can by all means not have.

Everything that happens, even evil deeds, must necessarily take place in this way; the human will has no freedom at all; people are born again without the written word, through secret inspirations, by which the unruly will is broken. Recently, Samosatian errors about the Son of God have come onto the scene, according to which the doctrine of our church is transformed into the Mahomedan doctrine.

005 But as when a conflagration ariseth, every man runneth at once to quench it, so all authorities ought to be busy to suppress these disputes in their first beginning, and it would be a grievous consequence if we should still be disputing about them. Emperor Constantius sat and could hear the dazzler in the assembly recite this blasphemous conclusion: The father is the son is therefore the son is not equal to the father. Is not this a recklessness, or rather impiety, to give ear to such speeches? Shall we think you so careless, we will not say so calm, as Constantius was, that you, sitting in the assembly, would listen to such deceitful speeches without the most sensitive reluctance?

(6) The other kind consists of confused, and, that we may speak so, indissoluble doctrines. If these had not come to light, it would have been much better, because the controversy cannot be settled. To this belong the questions of the adoration of the bread, of the sacrifice, of the mass.

(7) The third kind includes those which the pope has the power to dispense, for example, that he may remit vows, permit marriages, and improve superstitions in food, clothing, and the like. Since these things are obvious and clear, they do not need to be examined in an assembly. If kings and princes demand that these matters be decided, the Roman See can put an end to the dispute by a single judicial pronouncement. We ourselves also wish that superstition and evil customs, which become even more prevalent through thoral laws, would cease; but we do not want to know anything about anarchy. The Roman See should be duly sought for improvement; but we will not let it be deprived of the prestige and authority which it received from the old church. Out of these various classes of doctrines considered, the Cause to be seen why no Synodus should be held.

(8) There is nothing left, then, but to restore peace by your arms. Italy, conquered by the same weapons, is now at peace; the king of France, who fought with you not over Stoic crickets or the Jewish superstition of the monks, but over the empire, is defeated. How much more easily will you bring a moderate part of Germany under your power, in which matter you must also look to the descendants. Wherever the prestige of this see falls, anarchy will follow, and the lapsed church discipline will give birth to barbaric and wild customs, and the untamed freedom of the mind to infinitely new doctrines. Therefore, you will see that in this conflagration, dwelling on it will cause grave harm.

889 Emperor Carl's rebuttal that a concilium is most necessary.

See No. 888.

Translated from the Latin by I. F.

We acknowledge that we are young in years, and confess that we have consulted Mercurinus, who is present here, and other men of understanding, and that we must listen to such as have more insight than we; we have also spoken of this consultation, which is for the glory of God and the welfare of the whole human race, with many wise, virtuous, and honest men, who are of the opinion on all sides that the church is in great need of a synod. Nor are you unaware of the constant longing with which all sensible and righteous people throughout Europe are looking for a legitimate Synod.

(2) Accordingly, after a long consideration of the matter, and well-considered reasons which you oppose, we desire that a synod should be instituted. You should know that Mercurinus made his speech at our command, and that we will not depart from our opinion as long as we live. Your proposal may appear to common people to be apparent and pleasant; our proposal, however, is legitimate and beneficial to the church, and will also, as we hope with divine help, if you do not prevent it, be salutary and beneficial to the whole human race. Nor shall your terrible lecture, that one need not listen to a disputation on inconsistent and indissoluble doctrines, be of any avail to us.

from our opinion. For not everything that is now being disputed is absurd; even in the church there are no questions of necessary matters of faith that are indissoluble. We have often heard the Platonic saying: as the madness in parents is to be patiently borne, so also in republics and religions some errors must be overlooked. In this one must not go beyond the mark, both in the regiment and in the church. The reason must certainly not be abandoned in the church, and the eternal laws, which forbid idolatry and disorderly lusts, must be held fast in the regiment and in the church. Now, however, some worship most detrimental to God has crept into the church, and shameful lusts are at work. To remedy this evil, it is necessary not only to hold a synod, but also to prepare a whole book of faith, which all nations in their churches will unanimously adopt. For you know what disagreements are going on in your party about many important matters. If such inconsistent things are now being spread about, the Synod must counter them with excellent and strong testimonies, and give the people grounds for proof, so that they will not be led astray now or in the future.

(3) But it is not fitting for a priest to say that some questions are insoluble. God has revealed Himself according to His immeasurable goodness, and wants us to accept the doctrine that He has had recorded, which, if it were doubtful, would be an empty sound. We, however, like Theodosii's suggestion, who has had testimonies from credible antiquity sought out and presented in the Synod. For we gladly accept the church itself as a teacher, as Samson said there: "If you had not plowed with my calf, you would not have guessed."

(4) As for the remission, or pardon, to which you offer yourselves, this can be done much more effectively in the Synod, for greater harmony can be expected among the nations if all hear and accept such a pronouncement of pardon at the same time. We stick to the brave saying: Where there is general danger, one must also consult together, and with our services, after examining the nature of the matter, it will not arise. But so that such an investigation may take place in an orderly manner, we will, according to the example

1) This refers to § 7 of the preceding number: "remit the vows" 2c.

The old emperors must be present, and as much as possible they must bring about the observance of these reasonable laws. Both parts must be consulted with one another, and a pronouncement must be made, not according to his tyrannical pleasure, but according to the law, and according to the doctrine which is given us of God.

(5) That we should now, as you will, exterminate good and evil with one another without distinction, we never do, and by no means wish to banish lawful judgments from the church and to have introduced a tyranny. By the way, in the previous war we made clear enough our reverence for the church, the Roman See, and you, which we will not refrain from showing in the future.

890 Emperor Carl V's invitation to the Imperial Diet in Augsburg, as sent to Elector John of Saxony and other protesting Imperial Estates, January 21, 1530.

This document is found in the original in the Weimar archives and printed from it in Förstemann's Urkundenbuch, vol. I, p. 2; further in Müller's Historie 2c., lib. III, ead. 3, x. 412 and in Lünig's Reichs-Archiv, pari. Acn. cont. I., p. 496, and again idia. eont. II. p. 334.

To the Highborn Johansen, Duke of Saxony, Landgrave in Thuringia and Margrave of Meissen, Archmarshall of the Holy Roman Empire, our dear uncle and Elector.

Carl von Gottes Gnaden, elected Roman Emperor, at all times Mehrer des Reichs 2c.

Highborn dear Oheim and Elector! Even though we have returned to our Hispanic kingdoms since receiving the royal crown and holding our first Diet at Worms, we have always considered the dignity and majesty in which we have been placed by divine providence in the praiseworthy German nation, and that it would not only be fair, but also beneficial to the common nation, after establishing some order by which the subjects of our Hispanic kingdoms could pass the time of our absence, but that it would be useful for the common nation, after the establishment of some order, by which the subjects of our Hispanic kingdoms might live the more in peace, tranquillity and unity during the time of our absence, 1) to dispose of us to the noble estates of the Holy Roman Empire, as our natural members, and to make essential changes in them, as well as in the way in which we live.

1) In the original: "ainig Kait".

And that we have therefore been prepared and provided by the mind of the governor, even on several occasions, to do our utmost in the holy kingdom, and to understand the common things and benefits of it: Nevertheless, on account of our enemies and adversaries, such excellent and great things and hindrances have been granted to us that, against our heart's desire, we cannot complete our intention; as your beloved and other estates of the Holy Roman Empire have no doubt sufficiently understood from the notice of our Imperial Diet held, and our appointed Commissars' oral apology at the same Imperial Diet. And even though by these, also in other ways, so noticeable and evident, we have sufficiently shown and proved our eager will and love, which we bear to the commonwealths of ours and of the Holy Roman Empire, and to Holy Christendom: We have now more handsomely and manifestly wished to bear witness to this, when we have seen that, by all possible diligence on our part, we can make it appear that the tranquillity of these Italic lands is in harmony with the height and dignity of the Holy Roman Empire, and the unity of the laudable states and of the holy Christendom, and the unity of the praiseworthy German nation may have been established and set in a constant state, nothing has ever been accomplished, and that all things have become more and more vexed every day, for which reason we cannot consider nor find it more convenient to improve such conditions with us than by our presence, and have had it for that, 3) if the Italian potentates and countries understand our gracious will, that in our undertaking to restore and place them in good essential condition, they would be the more willingly healed, that also in the praiseworthy German nation, so every opinion and opinion would be heard and diligently moved, all disparate and vain things be done with common counsel, and that which would be right and honest be confirmed by papal sanctity and our imperial power, authority and permission, and thus the holy empire of the German nation also be brought back into unity. And for this reason we have entered into a peace with our enemy and adversary, in which we have set aside our own benefit, so that we may promote the common good of holy Christendom.

2) With Förstemann: "Uyande".

3) "Present" here will mean: in our personal presence.

left our Hispanic kingdoms, which at this time are the most satisfactory among all provinces; have considered no expense, nor danger, neither of the sea, nor otherwise, which we therefore do, and to which we have had to expose ourselves 1) and go, and have arrived in Italy according to the will of God, in the opinion not only to bring these lands to rest, as has been reported, but also to indicate to our holy father, the pope, our concerns, intentions and opinions, so that we may know what we should hope for his holiness, for the establishment of this unity in the holy kingdom of the German nation. So the other day, after our arrival, the newspapers announced to us how the hereditary enemy of our holy Christian name and faith, the Turk, had overrun the Christian kingdom of Hungary and our fatherland, the Archduchy of Austria, with his great power, destroying everything with murder and fire, and that the holy kingdom of the German nation, where we do not come to its aid, is in the greatest distress, and that the holy empire of the German nation, if we do not come to its aid, is in the greatest distress, for which reason we have become resolved to leave not only Italy, but also our kingdom of Naples, which at the time was still in rebellion and almost in no less danger, and to march in our own person, with all our people of war, towards the German nation and the greater danger in haste; Therefore, requesting and beseeching the papal holiness, since necessity requires no other than that we be ready not only to retreat or slay the Turks with the mightiest force, but also with the best of our intentions, ways, and counsels, to direct such great and various opinions, that she would meet with us in this city of Bononia, to act for the peace of these Italian lands, the unity of the holy empire of the German nation, and in general for the salvation and welfare of all holy Christendom. In which her holiness, when she understood our mind, not only willingly accommodated us, but also met our arrival there with great journeys of a day, and received us there quite mildly and kindly, in whose person we also had as much and more love and desire to bring the affairs of the holy empire of the praiseworthy German nation to good peace and unanimous understanding and being, and to order in the Christian religion everything that is right and honest, as we had hoped, felt and found. After which, when we had the

1) With Förstemann: "to set up".

We have therefore heard that, after receiving our imperial crown, as we had resolved to do, we would have joined the empire of the German nation in the most beneficial way; but when we understood that the Turk had withdrawn, and that our future was so nearly, as before, to be hurried, it was unnecessary: So we have again considered it useful, on our former undertaking, to place the tranquillity of these Italian lands first in a permanent state, and to keep and confirm them in the faithful will and relationship of the Holy Empire, which we also hope to end within a short time; 2) and therefore, so that we may do it all the more quickly, we have not undertaken or omitted anything that we might consider useful and conducive to this end. And so we have to provide in the meantime and besides in the matters of the Holy Empire of the German Nation. German nation, especially as we have truly learned that, after the recently held Imperial Diet at Speier, your beloved and other estates of the Holy Roman Empire have, to resist the Turk's mighty plans for the Christian crown of Hungary, as the same time of the border against the Turk, assistance followed, that nevertheless such by diligent action on some held days at Regensburg so late and slowly arrive, that to the noble prince, Mr. Ferdinand, King of Hungary and Bohemia, Archduke of Austria, our friendly dear brother and governor in the holy realm, with his and his beloved kingdom, principality and country of the highest aid, it has been impossible to stop the Turks with his excellent, unheard-of power, which he had on water and land in Hungary, we will remain silent on the borders, so that his beloved unfortunately had to watch and tolerate that the same Turk overran the Christian crown of Hungary by force, almost conquered it completely, then immediately attacked our Archduchy of Austria, besieged the capital Vienna in it, worked hard and pressed it; and although by the grace of the Almighty, and the stout-hearted knightly resistance and opposition of the Christian warriors therein, he again abandoned his tyrannical plan, yet by his excellent patrols he conquered the same archduchy, especially in the countryside, especially on the land on which Vienna is situated, up to the water, the Ens, also a good part of the principality of Steyer, with the shedding of much innocent blood, robbery, fire and the removal of many Christian people, as then all this of your love undoubtedly well knowing is miserably devastated and ruined, which every Christian man should take to heart not a little, and move to bear compassion with the afflicted. And because the reported Turk is pursuing all his undertakings earnestly and with assiduous diligence, especially if he achieves victory in it, which appears from the fact that in two campaigns, which he has made one after the other in the aforementioned crown of Hungary, and now recently in Austria, he has devastated and ruined much noble fertile land with fire for more than a hundred German miles, and has no other means at his disposal, even though he has taken his hasty departure from Austria, because, according to his tyrannical, eager mind, he will, in the future, with greater and more serious intentions and greater power than has ever been done, act upon the common Christianity, and subject himself to attempting his salvation and obtaining his will: We, as Roman Emperor and Head of Christendom, being ever glad and gracious to promote the welfare of the Holy Roman Empire, and to prevent it from harm and damage, have, as much as is humanly possible, acted to resist, avert, and prevent the same Turkish project, and in other matters incumbent upon the Holy Roman Empire, have acted in a salutary, stately, and profitable manner, We have decided to hold a common Diet and Assembly on the eighth day of the month of April in Augsburg, our city and that of the Holy Roman Empire, at which time we hope to discuss these Italian matters, so that we may attend such a day in person; as we have purposed to do at last. Which day we therefore hereby proclaim to your love, commanding by Roman imperial power, and earnestly commanding by the duties that you are bound to us and to the empire, and desire that you appear in person on the same day at Augsburg, and together with us and others of ours and of the holy empire's princes, rulers, and estates, which we have likewise described, to undertake, to deliberate, to decide and to carry out, how, to avert the grievous burden and invasion of Christendom by the Turkish invader, with serious rescue, resistance and persevering help, according to necessity, to the action previously practiced for this purpose, to proceed in an orderly manner; moreover, how for the sake of error and discord in the holy faith and Christianity

Religion may and should be acted upon and resolved upon. And that this may be done the better and more wholesomely, to lay aside discords, to leave off unwillingness, to yield up past errors to our Saviour, and to apply diligence, to hear, understand, and consider in love and kindness all every man's opinion, opinion, and opinion between ourselves, to bring them to one Christian truth and to compare them, to put away all that is not rightly interpreted or acted for both parts, To put away all things that are not rightly laid out or done in both parts, to accept and hold by us all one and true religion, and as we are and contend all under one Christ, so to live all in one fellowship, church, and unity, and finally thus to determine, make, establish, and maintain good unity and peace, also otherwise good coin, police, and welfare of the holy kingdom everywhere in these and other matters incumbent upon the same. And therefore, that you do not fail to attend, nor refuse to go to someone else, and that you do not let anything but God's power prevent you from doing so, lest, as has often happened in the past, others, arriving at the proper time, have to wait with annoyance, heavy costs, and detrimental waste of time: that we, in consideration of the fact that we ourselves attend such a Diet with our great inconvenience, but for the benefit and good of the holy realm, as is reported, want to provide ourselves to your love without doubt. Your love also does this, together with the fact that she owes this to the holy realm in the movement of her relationship, our serious opinion. And if you do not appear in ten days, the next after the said appointed day, then nothing less shall be done and decided by us with the present estates, in all measure, as if you and others had been present, which we also want to respect and execute all as firmly, steadily and powerfully as if all estates, those present and absent, had consented thereto. Let thy love be wholly guided thereby. Given at Bononia on the one and twentieth day of January, in the thirtieth year of our kingdom, the eleventh of the Roman, and the fourteenth of all others.

892 The oath taken by Emperor Carl V to Pope Clement VII before his coronation.

In Cölestins list. oornit. torn. I. , p. 16 reprinted from a writing which appeared in quarto in 1530 under the title: Kaiserl. Majest. Coronation happened in Bononia on the 24th day of Feb. on St. Matthias day 1530.

Verdeutsch.

We, Carl, Roman King and soon to be Emperor by the Grace of God, promise, assure, testify and swear by God and St. Peter that in the future we will be a constant protector of the Papal Highness and the Roman Church to the best of our powers, understanding and ability, and that we will do no violence to any freedom of the Church, but will preserve and protect its authority, right and rule as much as we can, in which we call upon God Himself and these Holy Gospels as witnesses.

893 Pope Clement VII's bull concerning the imperial insignia granted by him to Emperor Carl V and the coronation performed on him.

March 1, 1530.

From Lünig's Imperial Archives, pari. Zsn. oont. II., p. 336. translated from the Latin by I. E.

Clement, bishop, the servant of the servants of God, to the constant remembrance of the cause.

Since in the next month of February, on the feast of St. Peter, whom we succeeded, although with unequal merit, but with equal prestige and authority, our beloved son, William, of the title of St. John and Paul Cardinal Priest, wanted to perform Holy Mass at our request in the chapel of our palace in Bononia. We have been succeeded by our beloved son, William, Cardinal Priest of St. John and St. Paul, who, at our command, wished to celebrate the Holy Mass in the Chapel of our Palace at Bononia, where we are at present staying, and who, before we entered the Chapel, anointed our most beloved Son in Christ, Emperor Carl the Fifth, by virtue of our authority, and observed the other customary ceremonies according to the ancient usage: We, after these ceremonies and anointing had been completed, entered the chapel, and during the mass ourselves presented the royal and imperial insignia to this Carolo, and placed an iron crown on his head. From then on, after three days, 2) namely on the day of St. Matthew the Apostle, who celebrated Carolo's birthday.

2) These "three days" are reckoned in the Roman way, including the first and third days. The first day is the feast of Peter's chair, February 22, and the third day is St. Matthew's, February 24.

(him) with a golden crown, and at the end ordered us out of the palace over the bridge built for this act into the temple of St. Petronii. After Emperor Carl himself had performed all that such ceremonies entail, he was first made a canon of the main church of the most noble of the apostles of the city before the altar erected above the scaffolding by some canons of said church who were then staying in Bononia and were present here; Afterwards, after two speeches, one of which was delivered at the entrance to the church by the bishop of Palestrina, and the other by the bishop of Sabina, just above the emperor, he entered a certain chapel, where he put on the vestments and regalia worn by the deacons; From there he rose to the throne prepared for him; there he received the anointing from the bishop of Ostia, and presented himself before his eyes. While he was saying mass and had not yet finished reading the Gospel in Latin and Greek, we gave the Emperor the royal and imperial insignia, which he had received from us three days before, and especially put the ring on his gold finger, and had the sword, which he was to use against the enemies of the truth, girded at his side; then crowned his head with a golden crown, and immediately gave into his hands the scepter, as the special ornament of kings, and the orb, on which the whole world was stabbed, and at last left him to the kiss of peace, that the incarnate, preaching, dying, risen, and reigning Christ might instruct his congregation. Whereupon he sat down on the Caiferial Throne, which stood next to our right side. After the mass had ended and everything had been completed that was customary at such coronations, we rode into the palace from which we had come. And lest there should be any doubt in the minds of those who are presumptuous, whether the iron (or Longobard) crown, which was once worn in the Modenese or Milanese Church, and the gold (or Roman) crown, which the Pope of Rome had been pleased to place on the Emperor's head in the aforesaid Church of St. Peter, and both of which we now, at the humble request and entreaty of the Emperor, and for legitimate motives, presented to him at Bononia, would have as much force as if each of them had been worn by the Emperor.

had been delivered and accepted to the designated place according to ancient usage: In order that this doubt may be removed from the minds, we declare by apostolic authority, by virtue of the present bull, and also wish it to be brought down to the descendants, that all the above, and what has been done in this place, shall be as firm and immovable, and retain its force, as if that coronation with the iron crown at Modena or Milan had taken place, as if that coronation with the iron crown at Modena or Milan, and this with the gold crown at Rome, had been solemnly performed in the aforesaid church, under the usual ceremonies; They also wish, by virtue of the present, that all judges and administrators in the papal palace, as well as in the Holy Roman Church of Cardinals, interpret, judge, and pronounce it in the same way, and do not permit anyone to interpret, judge, and pronounce it in a different way; they add, by infallible science and apostolic authority, all defects and errors, both in what should have been done by right and in what actually happened, if some should have happened. Finally, by virtue of this writing, according to our special gift of grace, we grant Carolo, whom Pope Leo the Tenth, of blessed memory, according to the flesh of our brother, cousin, and predecessor, dispensed in a bull, that he may retain the kingdom of Neapolis in addition to his imperial regiment, to more caution the grace that he may and may freely retain this Neapolitan kingdom beside his imperial regiment, as long as he lives, without regard to all contrary apostolic decrees, letters of grace, statutes, customs, imperial laws 2c. Accordingly, all believers in Christ, vassals and subjects of the said empire, of whatever rank they may be, even if they are emblazoned with the royal or papal dignity, in virtue of holy obedience, and as dear as our grace is to them, are hereby strictly bound and commanded to show the owed obedience to Emperor Carl ever and always. And no one shall take the liberty to offend this written declaration, will, decree, pardon and order of ours, or to act recklessly against it. But if anyone should undertake to do so, let him know that he will incur the disgrace of the Almighty God and of His blessed Apostles Peter and Paul. Given at Bononia, in the year of the Incarnation of our Lord 1530, March 1, in the seventh year of our papal dignity.

894 Chancellor Brück's concerns about the Elector's personal visit to the Imperial Diet, also in regard to the arrangements to be made in the country for occurring burdensome cases, and where money is to be taken from. About March 12, 1530.

In Müller's Historie, Ud. III. eaz. 5, p. 432. From the original in the Weimar archives printed by Förstemann, Urkundenbuch, vol. I. p. 18. The time determination is according to Förstemann. On March 11 the imperial summons to the Imperial Diet had arrived in Torgau.

Most gracious Prince and Lord! Your churfürstl. Your Electoral Grace has told me that Your Electoral Grace desires that I should bring my young master's concerns and those of the counsellors, which I verbally indicated to Your Electoral Grace yesterday in haste, into a brief record. Your Elector's Grace that I should give a brief account of my concerns and those of the Councillors, which I verbally reported to Your Elector's Grace yesterday in a hurry. First, what concerns Your Electoral Grace. Grace. Travels of your own person against Augsburg, will be reported to your Electoral Grace. Grace. Opinion, as of a laudable Elector, it is considered good by everyone that Your Electoral Grace should be on Judica [3rd of July]. Your Electors will rise on Judica [April 3], and try whether Your Electors will go to the Gn. wander for the sake of their bodies, and take the trouble, because Ew. churfürstl. personal presence, if God wills it, would be greatly beneficial; and if Your Electoral Grace would find that they are in need of help. Gn. would find that their wandering would be burdensome and troublesome, Your Electoral Grace would know no one else to advise them. Gn. would have no other advice than, as Your Electoral Grace has said, that Your Majesty is the best. Your Grace himself said that Your Electorate. Their Electors have spared them a distant journey, since physical incapacity is the greatest matrimonial liability; so, nevertheless, Their Electors would have had to accept such a journey. with such journeys have shown their submissive obedience to Imperial Majesty. Majesty, and would like Ew. churfürstl. Grace, in their place of grace, to Augsburg, after Ew. churfürstl. Grace. Your Elector's Grace.

On the other hand, what concerns the article that it should be discussed how before Your Electoral Grace's departure to be ordered and provided for. Grace's departure should be ordered and provided for should, where in the absence of His Electoral Grace. Grace would happen in the country, it is said: Your Electoral Grace would have given my young master this and other things a year ago, when he wanted to travel to Speier. Grace, a year ago, when Your Electoral Grace wanted to travel to Speier, had an order issued to my gracious young lord for this and other articles, which would still be in the Chancellery, the same order should also be given to the judges, who would stay here and would be ordered, for the sake of the article. If, however, Your Elector. that more orders than those of a year ago should be necessary and therefore left to them: that would be in your electoral grace, your gracious favour. Grace, gracious favor, so the order could be put on it, before E. churfürstl. Grace, allhie departed.

Thirdly, concerning the market in Leipzig, everyone in the Council has let himself be heard to advise Your Electoral Grace gladly and humbly in this matter, if he knew. Grace, to advise him gladly and humbly, if he knew it: for one had hoped that Your Electoral Grace would in future at Walpurgis Gnad, would have had to collect as much and more in their annuities on Walpurgis in the future, as the expenditure on the Leipzig market would have been, and especially with the silver, which your churfl. Grace would have received for their share of the tithe in Leipzig, because the same would not have been kept. But after your churfl. Grace had indicated through the Chancellor and myself that the expenditure at Leipzig would amount to almost twenty thousand florins, no further advice was known, because Your Electoral Grace, with the reported Waltz, would have to pay the tithes. Gnad, with the Walpurgisrent and the Zehentsilbern not want to let pay, that your churfl. Gnad, order, to make diligent, whether one takes money from people, and with some creditors, whom your churfl. Grace to make payment in the market, to be patient until Michaelmas or for a year, in which each one who is ordered by Your Electoral Grace to do so, and so to be patient, is to be allowed to do so. Grace, and if the creditors were reported, would not be lacking in submissive diligence. However, and when Your Electoral Grace Graces would again come from Augsburg with the help of the Almighty, Your Electoral Grace could further consider Grace could consider further, and the articles, so next to Your Electoral Grace, by the Chancellor. Grace, have been presented by the Chancellor and myself, but not by Your Electoral Grace. Grace, but have not been heard at that time; so that one may come to the ways, by which Your Electoral Grace, from the Grace, from the

If they wish to come to the fearful burden of their guilt and obligation, God Almighty will undoubtedly grant them grace to do so, amen.

For my sake, as the least of E. C. F. G.'s servants, I shall not lack any possible diligence that I understand or am able to do, and I command E. C. F. G. in all submissiveness.

In Müller's Historie, p. 435 and in Förstemann's Urkundenbuch, Vol. I, p.61 after the original in the Weimar archives.

To the Highborn Prince, Lord Johansen, Duke of Saxony, Archmarshall and Elector of the Holy Roman Empire, Landgrave of Thuringia and Margrave of Meissen, our friendly dear grandfather, brother-in-law and godfather.
At his dear own hand.

Our friendly services, and what we are able of dear and good, before. Reverend Prince, kind dear uncle, brother-in-law and godfather! We have received and read the contents of your dear letter, in which you inform us of the reasons why your love is willing to personally attend the proclaimed Imperial Diet in Augsburg, and consider it good and request that we also personally attend the same Imperial Diet; We take it for granted that there is no need for your beloved to hurry so much to the same Diet, for we take it for granted, although we do not know it to be true, that it will not take place as expediently and quickly as it has been proclaimed. But as for our wanting to attend such a Diet in person, we cannot give your beloved a definite answer this time, for we have not yet finally decided to do so, even though we have reasons that may prevent us from doing so, as your beloved knows for himself that the Imperial Majesty, with her and the others, has not yet decided to attend the Diet. Majesty has acted so ungraciously and swiftly with her and the other embassies, and especially with ours, on account of the booklet handed over, at Bononia: should we

2) and to make an agreement of some kind, we consider what might result from this and what we might encounter; however, we have not yet finally decided on this. If, however, your beloved (whether we would attend such a Diet in person or not, and provide it with our councilors) would deem it good that we send the delegates together beforehand, and let them advise us of all that the invitation brings with it, and the necessity requires that action be taken on our behalf at the Diet; let your beloved in turn let us know this, and we will show ourselves conducive to it. We do not wish to hold back your beloved's friendly opinion, but we are inclined to serve it in a friendly manner. Date Immenhausen, on Sunday Oculi [March 20] Anno 2c. 30.

B. What the Elector of Saxony has decreed for the provisional drafting of a Protestant confession of faith.

897 The Elector's order to Luther, Jonas, Pomeranus, and Melanchthon to draw up a list of the disputed articles in the doctrine and ceremonies. Torgau, March 14, 1530.

This document is in the original concept in the archives at Weimar. Printed in Joh. Joachim Müller's History of the Protestant Estates Protestation, 11b. III. oax. 6, p.438; in Colestin, stist. 6onk. 1,134; in the Leipzig edition, vol. XX, p. 171; in the pre-p. "st.", vol. II, p. 25; in Förstemann's Urkundenbuch, vol. I, p. 42 and in the Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. VII, p. 250. We give the text according to Förstemann.

Our greetings first, venerable and reverend, dear devotees and faithful!

We do not know to charge you in your gracious opinion that we have been informed by the Roman Emperor's Majesty. Majesty,

2) Added by us.

3) ,M" - sorixsit.

Our most gracious lord has received a notice of the Imperial Diet, so that in the future, on the eighth* day of April, we, like other estates of the Holy Roman Empire, are required to go to Augsburg to attend the Diet which Her Imperial Majesty is to hold there in his own person. We are sending you the enclosed copy of the above-mentioned invitation to attend.

Because among the most important matters to be dealt with at such a Diet is one concerning the discord in our Christian religion, and because of such most important matters, it is expressed that such measures are to be dealt with and decided. Namely, to hear, understand, and consider in love and kindness every man's opinion, opinion, and opinion between the estates themselves, to bring and compare this division into one Christian truth, to put away everything that would not be rightly interpreted or acted for both parts, to adopt and hold by all of us one united and true religion, and as we are and contend all under one Christ, so to live all in one fellowship, church, and unity, and finally thus to make good unity and peace: We therefore consider that the high and unavoidable necessity requires, because such a Diet may be held at a Concilii or National Assembly, that we should, for the sake of all the articles, wherefore the discord which has arisen, both in faith and in other outward church customs and ceremonies, be resolved in the most beneficial manner, may be most favorably resolved, so that before the beginning of this Diet we may be constantly and thoroughly determined whether, or in what form, and also how far we and other estates, if the pure doctrine is accepted and admitted by them, may and may suffer action with God, conscience, and good reason, even without burdensome annoyance. Since the matters, as we cannot otherwise understand the aforementioned proclamation of the Diet, are to be carried out in such a way: that then no one can consider and deliberate better, more thoroughly, nor more constantly, than you, as we also graciously request of you herewith; and especially that you want to carry out such consideration, other matters and business in peace, in such a way, so that between now and the next Sunday Oculi [20. March], and on the said Sunday you may all come to Torgau with it; as we, considering that the time until the Imperial Diet is quite short, have decided to do.

1) "Esteem" is used by us instead of "other" by Walch. Cf. No. 890. 891.

is short, and we will have to rise without delay, want to leave completely to you. And although in the foregoing notice there is nothing expressed that each estate should bring its preachers and scholars to such an action in due consideration; therefore we may not well consider how it is to be brought about that each one's opinion and opinion may be heard, and thereupon acted upon in unity: Nevertheless, it is our gracious request to you, Doctor Martin and Doctor Jonasen, provost, as well as Magister Philips Melanchthon, that you take care of yourselves and your things, and that you do as much as possible in our university in Wittenberg to have your absence read in your place, so that you may be with us again in Torgau on the day we appoint you, and then travel with us as far as Coburg, along with Magister Spalatin and Eisleben. In the meantime, God wants to know how the presentation of each part of opinion and opinion is to be done and held at the Imperial Diet in Augsburg. For if the Estates are permitted, as necessity requires, to summon their preachers and scholars to Augsburg, we will then have you summoned to us from Coburg. If, however, the preachers and estates do not wish to be admitted and escorted, you, and especially you, D. Martinus, shall nevertheless remain at Coburg until further notice from us. In view of what is at stake in these matters for all of us and for the whole of Christendom, we want to be unburdened, as we want to be completely provided for; in this you show us a special serious and gracious favour. Date Torgau, Monday after Reminiscere [14 March] Anno Domini 1530.

To Justus Jonas, Visitor in the Duchy of Saxony.

Grace and peace in Christ. The Prince has written to us, that is, to you, Pomeranus, Philip, and me, in a letter addressed to us jointly, that we should come together, set aside all other business, and before next Sunday complete what is necessary for the future Imperial Diet on April 8. For Emperor Carl himself will be present at Augsburg to settle everything amicably, as he writes in his Bull. Therefore, even though you are absent, the three of us will do as much as we can today and tomorrow; however, it will also be incumbent upon you to assign your work to the other companions 1) so that the Prince's will may be done, and to join us here tomorrow. For all things are urgent. May Christ grant that all may be done to his glory. Amen. At noon on March 14, 1530, Martin Luther.

The so-called Torgau Articles on Disputed Doctrines and Ceremonies, drawn up after the above Electoral Decree, which became the basis for the second part of the Augsburg Confession. Between March 14 and 20, 1530.

These articles are found in the supplements to Brück's Geschichte der Religionshandlungen auf dem Reichstage zu Augsburg im Jahr 1530 im Archiv zu Weimar, Bl. 306 bis 323 d, where Förstemann found them and had them printed in his Urkundenbuche, Vol. I, p. 68 ff. Walch has identified them, as has happened until recent times, with the Schwabach Articles, No. 874 in this volume, against which the following writing is directed. Cf. No. 905.

900. of D. Conrad Wimpina, D. Johann Mensing, D. Wolfgang Redörfer and Lic. Rupert Elgersma short and Christian instruction against the confession D. Mart. Luther, from the presently held Imperial Diet in Augsburg, and divided into XVII articles.

This writing appeared in 1530 at Augsburg in quarto under the above title. After that it is included in the Wittenberg edition (1569), Vol. IX, 1) Jonas' co-visitors were Benedict Pauli, Sebastian von Kötteritz and Bernhard von Hirschfeld. Bl. 402; in the Jenaer (1566), Bd.V, Bl. 16d; in the Altenburger, Bd. V, p. 16 and in the Leipziger, Bd. XX, p. 3. It refers to the Schwabacher (not to the Torgauer) articles, as already noted in the previous number.

To the most illustrious Highborn Prince and Lord, Mr. Joachim, Margrave of Brandenburg, Archemperor and Elector of the Holy Roman Empire, of Stettin, Pomerania, of the Cassuben and Wenden Dukes, Burgraves of Nuremberg, and Princes of Rügen: we offer ConEradus Wimpina, Johann Mensing, Wolfgangus Redörfer, Doctores, and Rupertus Elgersma, Licentiatius 2c., our prayers to God, together with willing and diligent service in all submissiveness, beforehand ready.

Most Gracious Prince and Lord! It may not be unreasonable to wonder how and for what reason Luther has now made a special confession of his erroneous faith in XVII articles against this Imperial Diet, here at Augsburg: since he has also issued a final confession of his faith shortly before this, 2) in which he also professes to persevere with death, and yet in this last confession he omits much that he set forth and confessed in the previous one. On top of all this, several hundred articles, some of them unchristian and heretical, others seditious and seductive, are still found now and then in his previously written books, which he did not touch with the least word in his first and this other confession, but rather passed over all of them in silence. If he perhaps wanted to suppose that all of these should be forgotten because he did not raise them again, and that for this reason no further blame should be attributed to him, he would be far wrong. For since he has given cause for many blasphemies, theft of spiritual goods, the seduction of many chaste hearts into sinful fornication, the transgression of oaths and vows, outrages and deaths, along with many other manifold unchristian acts, with his writings and teachings; And whether he would also now refuse and revoke the same, as he will not do after the manner of all heretics (as is to be expected); or whether also the now known articles would be unpunishable, as they do not find all of them; nevertheless so many evil deeds, of which he has been the instigator, assailant and causer, must not remain unpunished with him. For this reason, these articles of his present confession are not held in the highest esteem by anyone, nor are they to be who alone may almost grieve, because the previous ones would like to bite out his jrrsals and public transgression, more than those, much more importantly and these all well, as one says, the eyes.

And so we have heard that the XVII articles of this new confession of Your Electoral Grace, perhaps in such a way that everything contained therein should be good, Christian, and blameless, have been sent here to Augsburg, and although we are certain beyond all doubt that Your Electoral Grace, as a praiseworthy Christian Elector, has not only been brought and inherited from their noble ancestors and forefathers out of innate Christian virtue, but also with a noble Christian spirit. We are also certain that your Electoral Grace, as a praiseworthy Christian Elector, not only brought and inherited from their noble forefathers and ancestors out of innate Christian virtue, but also highly enlightened with well-founded Christian doctrine, and thus fortified, that such and other such unfounded articles of your Electoral Grace do not move anything, much less move us. Grace can move nothing at all, much less seduce:

However, in order that this Luther's preaching may nevertheless be regarded by some as good and right, and that nothing justified against it may be raised, we have briefly explained a special and Christian opinion on each article as to how it should be kept, so that every pious Christian may know how to keep it, without any danger or doubt, according to the order and constitution of the common Christian church. This is attributed to E. Ch. G.'s benevolent opinion, humbly requesting that we graciously accept this diligence and benevolence of ours in ordinary graces; to which E. Ch. G. we willingly acknowledge our property in all servitude, and also owe it to her, to whom we also hereby humbly command ourselves.

To the I. Article.

It would be quite unnecessary that Martinus Luther should have so bravely and highly exalted this first article confession, so that everything and much more than is comprehended in this article by him, has been reported many times before by many concilia many hundreds of years ago, and repeated, also daily in Symbola Athanasii, at prime time, which is taught, prayed, read and sung in the office of the mass, and other tides of the priests, also ordinary by all devout Christians further and wider.

To II. Article.

This article is much less necessary to recover than the previous one. For it has not been challenged in the common Christian church for many hundreds of years. What of the foregoing in the case of the heretics mentioned in the article, and many others, there has been error, everything has been condemned and extinguished by God's help and the knowledge of the fathers in many conciliarities, so that it would not have been necessary to recover from Luther at this time.

To the III Article.

This article, as the Christian church prays it, and especially as the only begotten Son of God, our Lord Jesus Christ, born of the Virgin Mary, suffered under Pontius Pilate, was crucified, and died, 2c., has no challenge; for which reason, as something special, it was unnecessary for Luther to recover it. But what is buried deeper in these words is better explained by schoolcraft than common speech.

It is considered, however, that Luther included these three articles of his confession and placed them at the top, in the opinion that he would like to cover up the other articles of his confession, which are also not included here, and to introduce the following ones all the more apparently.

To IV. Article.

That original sin is a real and true sin, and not only a defect or infirmity, but also such a sin as condemns all men who come from Adam, and separates them eternally from God, is to be understood only before baptism. For after baptism there is no condemnation to them that are in Christ Jesus, Rom. 8:1. Which Christ, by his bitter suffering, working in the sacrament of holy baptism, washes away all sin; though after baptism the affections and provocations of sin, called in Latin lornes xseeuti, and by Paulum lsx irr msrnkris, remain as infirmities for man's reformation, and thus the 51st Psalm, v. 7, and Romans 5, v. 12, are to be understood.

To the V. Article.

We admit that all men before baptism, and also those who are deadly sinners after baptism, are sinners, subject to sin and death, and also to the devil, as Luther confesses in this article; and that even such sinners by their own powers, or by their own works, cannot work themselves out of it, and can neither become righteous nor godly, yea, cannot even prepare or send themselves to righteousness, to hear all things by themselves. For we know, as Paul saith [2 Cor. 3:5], that we are not ge- nugam to think something good out of us, as out of us, 2c.

But that the sinner through previous divine gracious help and mercy, which the Almighty God denies no one, as he also says through John in the Revelation fMp. 5, 10.⁴: I stand at the door, and knock; if any man admit me, I will come in to him 2c., should not be able to obtain, to prepare himself for further grace, by which he would have good works and merit, Luther nor anyone else will not receive. For it is publicly written in Proverbs 16:1: It is man's to prepare his soul; and Sir. 2:20: They that fear God shall prepare their hearts, and before his face shall they sanctify their souls. From which it is to be noted that even the sinner, if he be found by divine gracious help, may, in virtue of the same divine help, prepare himself by good works for further grace and righteousness, and at last for salvation; as publicly the text Apost. 10, 4. by Cornelio, to whom the angel said: Your prayers and alms have come to remembrance before God, through which he has come to the perfect knowledge of Christ's righteousness and to final salvation.

From this it follows that the only way to righteousness and salvation from sins and death is not to believe in the Son of God, who suffered for us without any merit or work, Though faith be necessary in all these things, and there is no scripture that commendeth faith alone to salvation, but faith which worketh by love, Gal. 5:6. This also is the same faith that justifieth, as Paul saith, Rom. 10:10, With the heart believeth one 2c. For faith that worketh not through love is of no profit, as Paul also saith, 1 Cor. 13:3; as also, to speak of it properly, works are more added to love than to faith. Because faith, in the case of many gross sins, can be without love, without merit.

So also the saying Joh. 3,16. that all who believe in the Son of God shall not perish, but have eternal life, is to be understood in such a way as John himself interprets it, when he says 1 Joh. 2, 4.: Whoever says that he believes in God and does not keep His commandments is a liar, and the truth is not in him.

To the VI article.

That faith is not a human work, nor possible out of our own strength, but it is God's work and gift [John 6:29], which the We allow the Holy Spirit to work in us, but he is infused into us with other virtues in baptism, who also, if formed and adorned with divine love, does many good works. But where love is not present, faith is unable to do good works of merit by itself, as St. Paul says in 1 Corinthians 13:3, ascribing good works chiefly to love, for love is the sum and entire perfection of the law, Romans 13:10.

To Article VII.

We also confess that over and above the faith infused in baptism by the Holy Spirit, by which the children are saved (for without faith no one can please God, Heb. 11:6), it is still necessary for the baptized to instruct them in the doctrines and articles of faith, and to proclaim the same to them; which is done by the ministry of preaching, but by means of inward enlightenment, without which the ministry of preaching would be of little effect. From this it is concluded that both the ministry of preaching and the infused faith are all necessary to the salvation of the souls of those who have come to their years.

To VIII. Article.

We confess that not only the two sacraments, as baptism and Eucharist, are expressed in the article, but also five other useful ones, by which God also gives faith and his Spirit to those who desire it; as is clearly and sufficiently founded in the holy Scriptures, here to recover much too long.

To the IX Article.

That the Sacrament of Holy Baptism was instituted by God the Lord to wash away all sin and sanctify those who are baptized, is clearly stated by St. Paul in Titus 3:5: "By His mercy He has made us blessed, through the washing of another's birth, and the renewing of the Holy Spirit, whom He poured into us abundantly. For this reason baptism is not to be regarded as a mere and empty sign, as the Jewish sacraments were, because it sanctifies inwardly those who touch it by heart.

To the X. Article.

In the Sacrament of the Eucharist, that is, of the Corpus Christi and the Blood of Christ, we confess that<sup>⁴</sup> although there is bread and wine before the Confirmation

But after the confirmation we do not confess that bread and wine remain there, but only the form of the same, and under every form the true body and blood of Christ, and the whole Christ, are contained undivided and perfect, and this by virtue of the words which Christ himself has spoken and set forth. And because holy faith must first proceed in this sacrament before it is received, it appears more that divine love, than faith, is increased and nourished thereby; as it is also called a sacrament of unity, incorporation, and love.

To the XI article.

That the secret confession should not be enforced by laws, as little as baptism, 2c. we do not charge; because an unbaptized person does not belong to the church; wherefore the church has not yet to command him, as Paul teaches 1 Cor. 5:12. But a baptized person is now subject to the holy church, and ought also to be kept in the best manner as a child of the kind mother, and, if need be, to be ordained by compulsion. And because at all times from the beginning of the world, first in the law of nature, 6onktz88io iri6ntuli8, and at the time of the written law, among the Jews, sonksMio o6r6irioniuli8, from divine commandment, well heavier than our confession, weaved, and Christ came not to abolish the law, but rather to confirm it [Matth. 5:17.], and he also himself said to the apostles f^John 20:23: Whose soever sins ye forgive, they shall be forgiven 2c., And so in this and other places confession is thus needfully made, signified, and set up; and John saith 1 John 1:9. If we confess our sins, God is faithful to forgive us our sins; which all the holy fathers understood of sacramental confession: so the church hath sufficient and just cause to command such a comforting, wholesome, and useful thing to the unwilling, who otherwise will not know their own profit; as then the common Christian church by the chapter 0irini8 ntrin8M6 äs posQ, which every Christian is bound to obey, because Christ said publicly, He that heareth not the church is a heathen and a publican [Matt. 18:17]. But the Christian church does not admit that each man alone should confess some of the sins he is guilty of inside and some he is not, as he pleases. For St. Augustine calls such a thing more of a gleaming than a true confession. For many people, and especially of this time, who have a holy and torn conscience, yes, who completely trample it underfoot, who also have no conscience at all of broken vows and oaths, 2c., along with other much more gross sins. If absolution, as Luther confesses, is to take away all sin, confession must also be made of all sins, as much as is possible for man.

To the XII. Article.

That there be and remain on earth one holy Christian church unto the end of the world, is signified by our Christian faith, when we say: I believe the common holy church. And that such a church also is in the believers in Christ, there is no doubt. But that in such a church also there is a Christian authority, so that the church may not remain disordered, is shown us by St. Paul, Eph. 4, v. 11, 12, that Christ, when he ascended into heaven, left some behind him, as apostles, prophets, evangelists, pastors, and doctors, for the perfection of the saints, for the edification of the body of Christ 2c. And again, 1 Thess. 5:12, We beseech you, brethren, know them which labour among you, and preside in the Lord 2c. and to the Hebrews 13, v. 17, Be obedient to your stewards, and subject: for they watch, as they that should give account unto God for your souls 2c. Such an assembly of rulers and spiritual governors, because they have power to order and to discern in the church, is often also called the church, to which also Christ directs us, saying Matth. 18, 17: Tell it to the church; for which reason the church is many times put on and discerned, but only for all believers in Christ.

From this it is clear and evident that not those, as Luther confesses in this article, who keep, believe, and teach the above-mentioned laws, articles, and pieces, can be or be called the Christian church, because they have deviated from the unity of the church, and from the obedience of the ordained rulers and spiritual rulers, from the same order and knowledge, with this and many other heretical articles, and have wilfully left. And though they are persecuted and martyred in the world because of their insanity and disobedience, let them know that even the devil has his martyrs.

But that the Christian church should not be governed by statutes and ordinances, is openly contrary to the Holy Ghost, and to Paul, Acts 15:17, 27. 15:17, 27, when he commanded to keep the doctrines and statutes of the apostles and elders, which were ordained at Jerusalem in the assembly.

Ceremonies, which for the glory of God, for the stimulation and increase of the devotion of Christian people, are appointed and decreed by the aforementioned rulers of the church, cannot be counted as useless splendor, but as a Christian adornment and display of Christian love and faith. For this reason it cannot be unreasonable or useless to bind them to place, time, person, and gift, since the church must and will still be on earth in time, among persons, and places. Thus St. Paul teaches in 1 Corinthians 14:40: Let all things among you be done in good order and honestly.

To the XIII article.

This article is not to be disputed in itself, where it is so understood, that the faithful, who have done good, shall be saved unto salvation, as John 5:29 saith, They shall rise again at the last day, they that have done good, unto the resurrection of life 2c. For Christ himself saith Matt. 7:21, Not every one that saith unto me, Lord, Lord, entereth into the kingdom of heaven; but he that doeth the will of my Father.

To the XIV article.

As much as is said in this article about secular authority and rule is also to be understood about ecclesiastical authority and rule; because ecclesiastical authority, out of necessity in the church no less than secular, must be preserved, so that everything may be done in good order and honestly; for which reason pastors and doctors, as sufficiently indicated above in the twelfth article, are also reported by Paulum.

On de" XV. article.

This article is quite vicious, full of falsehood and blasphemy, unless one can prove by documents that someone is forbidden to marry. If, however, the priesthood, by vows, have abstained from marriage, the Christian church has good cause to compel them to keep their vows. This is the way it is done with monks and nuns, and it should be kept. But that the priests and monastics should live chastely has been kept in earnest from the time of the apostles until now, and has been brought to us, since the apostles, according to the teaching of Christ, Matt. 19:29, forgave their wives, and never found that the disciples of the same priesthood had wives. Forasmuch as we know that the priests and Levites of the Old Testament, if they should be in their service, should sanctify themselves, and live chastely, and not be given to wives.

The priests had to abstain from women, Deut. 6, and in many other places; and David was refused the priestly bread by Abimelech, until he abstained from women three days before. Much more the Christian priests, who are now bound to serve not the shadows, but the truth, if they are daily to take the true bread of heaven, the chaste body of Jesus Christ, themselves, and to give it to other people, should keep themselves chaste at all times. For Paul also, for the sake of prayer, exhorted the married man to abstain for a season from conjugal works.

Although the eating of flesh is not in itself a sin, nor is it forbidden by the church, inasmuch as the eating of flesh should in itself be evil and sinful; but because Christians do not of themselves follow the apostolic doctrine, which is called to us, as St. Paul teaches in 2 Cor. 6:5 and Cap. 11:27, the church, as a careful mother, has had just cause to enjoin such fasting. But because Christians do not comply with the apostolic teaching, which St. Paul teaches in 2 Cor. 6:5 and Cap. 11:27, the church, as a careful and kind mother, has had just cause to enjoin such fasting, and not to eat meat for several days, for the bridling of our naughty corpse. So that no one may justly complain with truth that he is forbidden to eat meat other than in this way. Since then also monastic vows, both in the Old and now and in the New Testament, have been variously practiced, vowed, and counseled, as the apostles also prove with the unclothing of many virgins, and have led them to the world: who then can say that such monastic vows, abstinence from women, and eating flesh, should be devilish doctrine (as Luther says)? And he wants to shame this with St. Paul's 1 Tim. 4:1, since Paul himself counseled virginity, and also consecrated Theklam in Jonio as a monastic virgin with many others. And such vows and abstinence are good and certain paths of direction in Christ, which are the right and true way to grace and salvation.

On de" XVI article.

That the mass, which until now has been a sacrifice and a good work, should now be an abomination is Luther's deliberate blasphemy, which he will never be able to prove. As many scholars have commanded him to prove, but he has never been able to do so, and will never be able to do so. Therefore the holy mass, which is kept for a sacrifice and good work for the living and the dead from the time of the apostles until now, as all the holy fathers' writings prove, will remain even longer until Christ comes again, as St. Paul says [Cor. 11:26]: Nvrtem Domini nnnmeiübitis, ÄoN66 betrayed.

But that the sacrament of Christ's Corpus Christi should be administered in two forms to each person's faith is unnecessary. For this would be the cause of great unbelief and heresy, as if Christ should not be perfect under one form, when he is especially perfect in every form, because of the independence, reality, or spiritual fruit, which in Latin is called 6886ntia6 st ökkroaeias. For this and other reasons, as well as for reasons of danger and error, the Church has recognized and decreed in two Councils, at Costnitz and Basel, a form, as has long been held in the Church, to be given to the laity; from which also the laity are not at all harmed, but from which their grace and merit are raised and increased in Christian obedience.

On de" XVII article.

That ceremonies and divine services must be in the church is beyond doubt. But what the ceremonies are that strive against God's word, as Luther reports, is not yet known. If, however, some of these were reported, then they would be spoken of.

But that every man should make new ceremonies every day, according to his own frivolity, willfulness, and inconstancy, would be contrary to the common peace, and cause great vexation. This is also contrary to Paul, when he says, Let all things be kept honest and orderly among you, 1 Corinthians 14:40, and let every man be justified in keeping them, 2c.

01.9 Martin Luther's answer to the cry of some papists about the XVII Articles.

This document is the preface to the 17 Schwabach Articles, which Luther himself published and which have already been communicated in No. 874. The locations are given there. Also the second edition of the Erlangen edition, Vol. 24, p. 334, identifies still, as well as Walch, the Schwabacher and the Torgauer articles, although already Förstemann in his Urkundenbuche, Vol. I, p. 67 and Müller in his introduction to the Concordienbuche have clarified their relationship to each other long ago.

To the Christian reader Martin Luther.

Grace and peace in Christ! Seventeen articles have recently gone out in print under my name, with the title as if I wanted to submit them to the present Diet, of which I have never had any thoughts. It is true that I have helped to introduce such articles (for they were not introduced by me alone), not for the sake of the papists, nor to be introduced at this Imperial Diet), but for the sake of which they were introduced. I would not have provided for them to come to the day, much less that they should go out with such a title under my name. And whoever did it would have preferred to leave it to me, as he knew well that he had no order or permission from me.

002 Not that I am afraid of the light, or that I do not think such articles right; they are all too good, and far too delicious, that I should deal with the papists about them. For what do they ask of such beautiful, divine, high articles? It would be just as if I wanted to trade with sows of pearls, and with dogs of the sanctuary. There belong articles of marc and bran, of bones and legs for such saints. What should the sow Muscats? It would be the last three articles, which I think they would consider as being against them. For they have a little of their marrow and bones, which they do not like to let go.

003 Or if their marc and bones were not to be traded, there would have been for them, out of the holy spiritual law, viper's poison and the devil's filth, as one that is called 8i ? apa, wherein they teach: And if the pope lead so shameful a nature, that he thereby lead innumerable souls to the devil daily into hell, yet he shall not be punished nor defended for it. These are the right knots and articles, for which they devour the goods of the world; and yet all unpunished, obdurate, unrecognized, while murdering and burning, since even their own right does not permit it. So they shall receive the reward of their error in themselves, until they perish, amen.

004 Wherefore I pray the printers once more, that they proceed not so, and with their untimely printing make displeasure to me, and a monkey's tail to others. I would have gladly kept silent here, and let what goes, if the tiresome pawing, boasting, defiance, and blasphemy had not resulted from the fact that these swine and dogs search so closely that they also almost began to search out my thoughts and write about them.

1) The opponents had been misled by the title given to the Schwabach Articles by Hans Bern in Coburg. See No. 874.

5. Let us now look to pray with all diligence and earnestness and call upon God to give His grace at the present Imperial Diet, and to grant His Holy Spirit with power to the pious, good Emperor Carol, who sits like an innocent little lamb among many such sows and dogs, yes, among many devils (with whom there is no praying to God, but only defiance and insistence on their own wit and power), but only defiance and insistence on his own wit and power), give his Holy Spirit power to establish peace and good government in German lands, so that we may all escape from the rut that is already bound over our skin and that we will not lack. God himself must create good in the Diet with his own power; otherwise both emperors, princes, and all the estates of the empire will be nothing; the devil is so angry and bitter. And each of them should think that such a Diet should be of the highest value to him, that he should enjoy its beauty where God will be present, and that he should repay it with evil where the devil will be the abbot, as he has in mind, and that he intends to introduce other articles that are also cruel to look upon. God help us, amen.

902 Philipp Melanchthon's letter to Luther, in which he reports to him, among other things, that he is working on the production of the Augsburg Confession. May 4, 1530.

The original of this letter can be found in the Leipzig City Library. Printed in the Lpp. Melanect. , lib. I. , x. 4; in the London edition of the same, lib. I. , 6P. 3rd; in Cölestin, dist. eorn. VuA. vol. I, p. 39; in Dav. Richter's OenealoNa Idutderioruna, p. 355; in the Oorp. Lei. , vol. II, p. 38; in Chyträus, dist. eont., p. 26, and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. VII, p. 323. German in the Hist. of the Augsb. Confession of Chyträus, p. 26 d and in Walch. We have translated according to the Erlanger Briefwechsel.

Newly translated from the Latin.

To D. Martin Luther, his most dear father. Hail! When we wanted to write to you today through the messenger of Jonah, behold, contrary to our expectation, yet exceedingly desired, your letter 1) delivered. Your kindness is very pleasant to us, and we ask that you write to us as often as possible about all your affairs. From Nuremberg we have addressed a letter to you, about which I have also given orders to this messenger that he should demand that it be handed over to him if the same had not yet been sent. At Augsburg we have received more certain news, for yesterday the young man 2) of Count Albrecht returned, who had been sent to reconnoitre the Emperor's travels. He reports that the Emperor has departed from Trent, and, if our account does not deceive us, he has already arrived at Innsbruck.

Count Heinrich von Nassau has written a letter full of goodwill and kindness to our Prince, admonishing him to come to the Diet early. 3) Although the talk of the people is of many kinds, we still have good hope for the Emperor's will. But the matter, as you know, is in God's hands. Therefore you must pray what you do, as I know. . . Besides ours, there is no other prince here. It is said that Duke George will be here in three days, who will bring with him the Cochläus 4) from which, by changing a few letters, the bird xxxxxxx [jackdaw] will be made, of whose kind you have written to us how sweetly they practice their oratory in your neighborhood. Therefore a divination from the birds hath taken place. And that thou mayest know that this is by no means void, Eck, who, when he is doubled, emits the cries of jackdaws, has brought together a great heap of theses 5). He demands of the princes that a disputation be set up against the Lutherans. He has my old friend Billicanus 6) to join him, but he threatens us.

1) No. 5 in the appendix to this volume, dated April 29.

2) Here he is called puer, whereas in a letter of Jonas to Luther of May 4 aäoleseens X. äs Hütten.

3) The letter of the Count of Nassau was written at Brixen on May 1 and received by the Elector at Augsburg on May 3. The latter's answer of May 4 is found in Förstemann's Urkundenbuch, Vol. I, p. 162.

4) In the original: Coeüleain - the snail. Compare St. Louis edition, vol. XIX, introduction, p. 30 d.

5) no less than 404 theses, which he had printed in Ingolstadt for a possible disputation in Augsburg. The disputation note (sedeäa, as he himself calls it) comprises 18 quarto leaves.

6) Billicanus was an extremely fickle man. At first he held with the Lutherans. (See Luther's letter to Hausmann of Jan. 20, 1526, St. Louis ed. vol. XIX, 515.) But as early as Jan. 16, 1526, at which-terrifying. There are many others I cannot enumerate, in truth jackdaws and ravens upon ravens, and may be hereafter. The Chancellor of Hesse, namely Feige, came yesterday, and said for certain that his Prince was on his journey. At the same time with him came Schnepf, a very good man, who is very friendly to you, who gives us some hope that his Prince can be kept in the right, although he does not hide the fact that there is great danger. He tells how great a struggle he has to endure with him on account of the Lord's Supper. He says that he is continually besieged with letters from the Swiss, and that almost every month the town master Storm approaches him to urge his master. This grieves me very much. Perhaps it would be useful if you wrote to him, or at least to our younger Prince, in order to fortify Philip's heart 1) in the right doctrine. He often seems to be moved by slight impulses. I have made the entrance to our protective writing (apologiae) 2) a little more oratorical (kseials) I wrote it at Coburg).

...I had. In a short while I will either bring it myself, or, if the prince does not allow it, send it.

At the same time as Luther wrote the letter just mentioned, he addressed a letter to Oekolampad, in which he went over to the latter in the main. On March 18, he wrote quite differently to Pirkheimer. (Cf. Erl. Briefw., Vol. V, p. 311, note 4.) In 1527 he again approached the Roman Church, and in September, 1529, applied to the old-believing faculty at Heidelberg for a master's degree, but was refused, and then turned to the faculty at Wittenberg, which he had just deserted, in order to obtain a doctor's degree. When Eck listed him in his 404 theses as one of those to be fought, he was so frightened that he recanted before Campegius in Augsburg on October 30, 1530, and had himself released from the priesthood by him. Then he engaged in merchandising with his father-in-law in Nördlingen for a time, until the people of Nördlingen received word of his atrocious apostasy and their anger against him broke out. Since the danger from the emperor was over for him, he privately and publicly denied the Augsburg process, renounced the merchants and became a Protestant preacher again.

1) In the text: roL of the Macedonian; so calls

Melanchthon often called the landgrave Philip of Hesse because of his resemblance to Philip of Macedonia after the rain and after the manner.

2) The exoräium is not to be understood as the preface to the Augsburg Confession addressed to the Emperor, which Brück wrote and Jonas translated into German. To refer it to the articles of faith themselves, as Förstemann, Urkundenbuch, p. 460, assumes, does not seem feasible to us; it is rather a preface to the Torgau articles, as Knaake concludes from the letter of the Nuremberg envoys to the council there (6orr>. liek. II, 83).

I almost forgot to mention your Cajetan among the jackdaws. For they say that the Emperor brings this one with him.

3) At Nuremberg I had heard of Campegius, but here they say it is Cajetan. Of course I would rather it were Campegius, a man experienced in civil matters. The other is an inconsistent and rude man; there is nothing to be done with that sort of person. Doctor Caspar 4) sends a letter and medicine; Christ keep you. The letter from your wife I send back to you. I have kept Caspar's letter 5); with regard to him, if God gives us a happy return, we will see to it that he gets into a more adequate position. If I were there, it would not be burdensome for me to support him with the deed. Farewell, and write again. Wednesday after Philippi and Jacobi [4 May] 6) 1530.

Philip.

903 An extract from the copy of the Confession, which Spalatin wrote at Augsburg with his own hand, before the complete establishment of the same.

This extract is from Cyprian's Beilagen zur Historie der Augsbургischen Confession, p. 167. The original of Spalatin's whole record is in the Weimar Archives L61. L. Vol. 37, no. 1, pp. 32-62, reprinted in Förstemann, Urkundenbuch, vol. I, pp. 310 ff. The 32nd leaf has the inscription in another, contemporaneous hand: "Articles of Faith and Report of the Articles in Dispute." Spalatin's handwriting goes no further than the first third of the 27th article of the Augsburg Confession.

Articles of Faith and Doctrine.

First, it is taught and held in our churches with one accord, according to the decision in the Concilium Nicenum, that there is one Divine Being, which is called and is true, and yet there are three Persons in the same Divine Being, equally powerful, equally eternal, God the Father, God the Son, God the Holy Spirit, all three One Divine Being, eternal, undivided, infinite in power, wisdom, and goodness, one Creator and Sustainer of all things visible and invisible; And by the word is understood, not a piece, nor a quality in another, but an independent thing, as then the holy fathers in this

5) Cruciger.

The word "person" was used in the first place. Therefore in our churches are rejected and condemned all heresies contrary to this article, as the Manichaeans, who set up two gods, one evil and one good; likewise the Valentinians, Arians, Eunomians, Mahometans, and all such like; Also the old and new Samosatians, who put no more than one person in the Godhead, and make sophistry of these two, Word and Holy Ghost, pretending that they need not be three distinct persons, but that "Word" signifies the bodily Word or Voice, and that the Holy Ghost is a created impulse in [the] creatures.

Art. 6. Furthermore, it is taught and preached in our churches that touched faith should bring forth good fruits and good works, and that one should do good works and all things that God has commanded for the sake of God, not to merit God's grace by such works; for forgiveness of sins and righteousness, which is valid before God, are given by grace for Christ's sake to all those who believe that God will be gracious to them for Christ's sake.

Art. 10. Furthermore, it is taught and preached in our churches concerning the Sacrament of the Altar and the Passover of Christ our Lord, that the true Body and Blood of Christ are truly present in this Sacrament in the form of bread and wine, and are distributed and received there; for which reason the contrary doctrine is also rejected.

Newly translated from the Latin.

To D. Martin Luther, his most dear father.

Hail! One sends you our protection writing (apoloAiu?) but in truth it is more a faith-

1) The Augsburg Confession was initially usually called Apologia. But here it is a matter of The emperor does not have time to listen to long disputations. For the emperor does not have time to listen to long disputations. But I have said that which I believed to be most useful, or quite so. For this reason I have summarized almost all the articles of faith, because Eck has issued the most diabolical calumnies against us. 2) Against these I have wished to oppose a remedy. You will judge according to your spirit about the whole Scripture. The Duke George and the Margrave Joachim have traveled to the Emperor. There an Imperial Diet will be held about our necks. Therefore you will ask God to destroy the counsel of the heathen [Ps. 33:10] who like to get [Ps. 68:31]. A question is brought to thee, which I very much desire thee to answer. There is no doubt that the Emperor will forbid the Zwinglian sermons. 3) We therefore assume that under this pretext our sermons will also be forbidden, because Eisleben is already preaching in a public church 4). What is your opinion now? Is not the public place to be given up, if the emperor will so demand: he desires this, so that the Zwinglian sermons can also be prevented without unrest? I answered: one must yield to the will of the Emperor, in whose city we are now guests. But our age 5) makes difficulties. What now seems good to you in this, you want, I ask, to write in German on a special note. Be so kind as to answer about this matter. We think that the Emperor cannot arrive within a fortnight. For a Diet of the Austrian territories is now being held at Hall am Inn. Moreover, we have nothing new, and with such a great difference of opinion we cannot judge what to hope from the Emperor's advice, but expect help from Christ. Fare thee well. Wednesday after Jubilate [May 11] 1530. Eisleben sends you its best regards. Philip.

John 2c.

Our greetings first, venerable and reverend, dear devotee. After you and other of our scholars at Wittenberg, at our gracious request, have recorded the articles that are disputed on account of religion, we do not wish to conceal from you that now U. Philippus Melanchthon has further overlooked the same and drawn them into a form, which we send to you herewith. And it is our gracious wish that you may continue to read and move these articles. And where you consider it so convenient, or to add something of it or to it, let it be recorded next to it, so that we may then be prepared and sent for Imperial Majesty's arrival, which we will shortly provide, and then send the same to us again without delay, well preserved and in good condition with this messenger.

We do not know how to behave in newspapers that we have received a letter from those of us who are now at Imperial Majesty's Court in Jnsbruck, among other things, about how they intend to deal with us for Imperial Majesty's arrival, so that we do not want to have preaching in the churches, as we have begun, as you will have to safely hear the opinion from the list submitted. And even though we have reservations about this, we nevertheless want you to give us your opinion on the proposal that should be made to us here, so that we can do right in the eyes of God and our conscience. In this you do us a gracious favor. Date Augsburg, Wednesday after Jubilate [May 11] Anno Domini 2c. 1530.

Stände Protestation, p. 488, and translated into Latin in Ooelestiv., vol. I, p. 40.

To the most illustrious, highborn Prince and Lord, Lord John, Duke of Saxony and Elector, Landgrave in Thuringia and Margrave of Meissen, my most gracious Lord.

Grace and peace in Christ our Lord. Most Serene, Highborn Prince, Most Gracious Lord! I have read over M. Philipsen's Apologia; it pleases me almost well, and I know nothing to improve it, nor to change it, nor would it be suitable, for I cannot tread so softly and quietly. May Christ our Lord help it to bear much and great fruit, as we hope and pray, amen.

To the question:

Where imperial majesty would desire that E. C. F. G. should keep quiet with sermons, it is still, as before, my opinion that the emperor is our lord, the city and everything is his; just as one should not resist E. C. F. G. at Torgau, where they desired or created, as in their city, that one should leave this or that. I would like to see, where it would be, that one could, with good words and the manner of the imperial majesty, turn around the desire and the nobility of the city. and nobility could be turned with humility, that his Imperial Majesty would not be so outrageous. Majesty would not forbid preaching so outrageously, but would let someone listen first to how one preached. It should not be imperial. Majesty should not forbid preaching the clear Scriptures, because otherwise one would not preach seditiously or enthusiastically. If that does not help, then one must use force for justice. We have done our part, and are excused.

Such I have to answer E. C.F.G. to this question know humbly. The barmhearty God be with E. C. F. G. through his Holy comforting Spirit, Amen. On Sunday Cantate [15 May] Anno 1530.

C. What the Elector of Saxony made for godly arrangements and decrees before his departure to Augsburg, and of the journey itself.

907 Letter of Convoy from the City of Augsburg to the Elector of Saxony. 30 April 1530.

Printed from the original written on parchment in Förstemann's Book of Documents, Vol. I, p. 160. In Müller's History 2c., p. 454; the following numbers up to No. 912 in el. which follow immediately hereafter in Müller, are taken from here by Walch. From no. 910 on we have been able to correct again according to Förstemann.

We, the mayors and councillors of the city of Augsburg, publicly confess by this letter, and make known to all men, that we declare to the noble, high-born prince and lord, Mr. Johansen, Duke of Saxony, Archmarshall and Elector of the Holy Roman Empire, Landgrave in Thuringia, and Margrave of Meissen, and our most gracious lord, out of his electoral grace, graciously request, at this present Imperial Diet, which the Roman Imperial and Hispanic Royal Majesty, our most gracious lord, has held here at Augsburg, and has advertised the same to his electoral lordships and to all those who are in need of it, and all those whom they bring with them, also their bodies, goods and chattels, to come here, to be here during the said Imperial Diet, and to return therefrom to their custody, for us and ours, without danger to us, free, secure and escorted, and do so now knowingly by virtue of this letter. However, we herewith exclude whether His Electoral Grace has with him and would bring here anyone who or which has violated the land peace established by His Imperial Majesty and the Holy Empire, and has fallen into punishment and offence of the same, which we do not have the power to pass on, 1) all of which we have not yet done.

1) That Luther is meant by this is beyond doubt, and perhaps it was this reservation of the city of Augsburg that caused Luther to be left behind in Coburg. (Förstemann.)

See No. 907.

Our friendly services and what we more dear and good can do before. Reverend Prince, kind sir and cousin! This day I received E. L.'s letter, in which E. L. kindly informs me L. kindly informing me that they are required to attend the Imperial Diet and are willing to do so in their own person, kindly thinking that I in my own person also want to attend it and not stay away. Now I have herebefore indicated to Your Lordship my friendly good opinion/) that I would also be required to attend such Imperial Diet, with the copy of the mandate issued, and notification of what, after my recent departure from Nuremberg, would be necessary to do on Your Lordship's and the others' advice and consent before attending the Imperial Diet; in the hope that Your Lordship will now have received the same. L. have now received my letter and noted it in the best way; and would in truth be willing and eager to attend the appointed Diet in my own person (although I know little benefit or fruit to be gained there for myself). However, E. L. knows my inability and difficulties, into which I have been led by my father, and it can be well assumed that it will cause me great burdensome expenses, which, according to my present opportunity, would also cause me great inconvenience, since I would have to sit down and get involved in such a great expense; I would have kindly asked E. L. for this, who would be able to spare me this time, and that it would be enough for him to send my advisors with full power. Since, however, E. L. wanted to see my person at the Imperial Diet, and to reduce their number of interpreters a little, according to E. L.'s own pleasure, and to take me along as a servant in place of them, which should all be left to E. L., I wanted to leave my service at once. I would gladly and diligently represent my service like others, and to move with E. L., as far as always possible, to arrange my things; however, in this case, I ask that I not be noted otherwise than for the indicated reasons, and as one who would gladly be willing to be of friendly service to E. L. in all ways. This in order to protect E. L. of my fortune.

Newly translated from the Latin.

To the exceedingly dear man, Mr. Nicolaus Hausmann, the very loud bishop of the church at Zwickau, his superior in the Lord.

Grace and peace! My dear friend, M. Leonhard 1) has given me the book written by you. But I will negotiate about these things with the rest of us, and do as much as I can. For I, too, would not dislike to see the stories and deeds (gesta) of Christ presented in the boys' schools in Latin and German through correct and purely composed plays or comedies, in order to commit the matter to memory and to make a deeper impression on simple-minded people. I hope, however, that everything, as it has begun, can be put in order when peace reigns. I will go with the prince as far as Coburg, and with Philip and Jonas, until it is known what is to be done at Augsburg. Work that your church may pray diligently for this Diet, and be well in the grace of Christ, and remember me also in your prayers. April 2, 1530. Martin Luther.

914 Luther's letter to Conrad Cordatus in Zwickau, in which he advises him not to go to the Imperial Diet. The 2nd of April 1530.

This letter can be found in its entirety in the 60a. Rostock. Printed by Strobel-Ranner, p. 172; by Schütze, vol. II, p. 127; by De Wette, vol. III, p. 567 and in the Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. VII, p. 292. Incomplete (only the second paragraph up to the greetings) by Cölestin, vol. I, p. L9, by Buddeus, p. 83 and by Walch.

Newly translated from the Latin.

Grace and peace in Christ, who comforts you in this your humiliation and affliction, my dear Cordatus, for who else could ease this pain. For I easily believe all that thou writest, since I have experienced such a case as this, which visiteth a father's heart, and is sharper than any two-edged sword, and pierceth to the marrow 2c. But again thou must be mindful that it is not to be wondered at, if he who is more truly and properly the father than thou hast been, according to his zeal hath preferred thy, yea rather his son with him than with thee, for he is safer there than here. But this I speak in vain; that is telling a fairy tale to a deaf man, when the pain is still new. Therefore I will now leave room for the sorrow, because greater and better men than we are have indulged in such grief, and yet are not blamed. But at the same time it is useful to you that you have had to deal with these trials and have tasted the power of conscience, so that you may learn more about the power of the word and of faith, which has been tested in these battles. For thou hast not yet felt the stake in the flesh, and Satan's angel beating with fists; thou hast hitherto suffered whatever thou hast suffered only in a glorious and confident innocence, that is, with a good conscience. But enough of this.

By the way, since I hear that you want to hurry to the Diet, I advise you entirely against it. First, because I have not been called there, but for certain reasons will be with the prince only on a journey in his territory; second, because the matter of the Gospel will hardly be dealt with, or very late, since the princes will be in the matter of the God-not hurry so, especially as the future trial is most of the Turk. But thou wilt be able to hasten thither at the proper time, and in the meantime work thy pince-nez and make it more supple. Greet the companion of your pain, and at times rejoice more in the living Christ than you grieve over your dead son, rather who is also alive, but taken away. My Käthe and the whole house greet you. ## 915 Letter of Imperial Majesty to the Elector of Saxony to hasten his journey to Augsburg. Mantua, 8 April 153V.

From Müller's History 2c., p. 465,

Carl von GÖttes Gnaden, Roman Emperor, at all times Mehrer of the Empire.

Highborn dear Oheim and Elector! Although we had completely decided and intended that we would certainly come in our own person to this Imperial Diet, which we have announced for the eighth day of this month in the city of Augsburg, our matters, which we have to settle with Papal Holiness and the potentates and estates of other and these Italian countries, have nevertheless come to a head. Nevertheless, our affairs, which we had to do with Papal Holiness and the potentates and estates of other and these Italian countries, which we had to bring into a calm, stable being, also for the sake of our imperial coronation, have been prolonged for and for, and have been protracted until recently, after receiving our imperial crown, we have taken our leave of papal sanctity in the city of Bononia, and are gone and come all the way to Mantua, in the opinion that there the touched Italian, as well as other Neapolitan and Sicilian matters and affairs, which are still unresolved, to dispose of them immediately to Trent, from there to Jnsbruck, and from there to the touched city of Augsburg, to your love and to other members and estates of ours and of the Holy Roman Empire, and with and beside them to the concerns and affairs of the Holy Roman Empire of the German Nation, in virtue of the tender we have made, as it contains it, requesting your beloved with diligence and earnestness, if she is not yet on the way to come to the reported Diet, that we nevertheless do not provide for her to rise in the most conducive manner, and that she may come to the Diet.

We will arrange all things therein, so that at the end of this month she may safely be there in Augsburg, as we then, God willing, also want to be there in person; and that nothing may ever prevent your love from this, as we then finally provide for this, and also think to recognize this for your love's sake kindly and with grace, and she also does our final will and quite serious opinion on this. Given at Mantua, on April 8, 1530, in the 10th year of our Empire and the 15th year of our realm.

916 Letter from D. Mart. Luther to Nicolaus Hausmann. Coburg, April 18, 1530.

The original of this letter is in the Anhaltisches GesamtArchiv. Printed by Cölestin, Vol. I, p. 29; by Buddeus, p. 84; by De Wette, Vol. IV, p. 1 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, Vol. VII, p. 296.

Newly translated from the Latin.

To the dear man, Mr. Nicolaus Hausmann, the faithful bishop of the church at Zwickau, his superior in the Lord.

Grace and peace in Christ! We have done as much as we could for Martin Sānger, my dear househusband, as he will report himself. By the way, he will tell Cordatus and you that we are still sitting here and do not know when we will travel on. For yesterday a letter and a messenger 1) came, which say that the Emperor is still staying at Mantua and will celebrate Easter there. Moreover, it is said that the papists are taking the greatest pains to prevent the Diet from proceeding, fearing that something might be decided against them, and even that the

1) The messenger is Michael von Kaden, the letter is from the Nuremberg Council to the Elector, dated April 16, which arrived in Coburg on Easter Day, April 17. It is found in Förstemann, Urkundenbuch, Vol. I, p. 146. The Elector had asked the city for escort, also that Luther should stay there during the Imperial Diet, so that he would be nearer to Augsburg. The escort was granted to the Elector, but the request was refused because of Luther, since the Edict of Worms was still in force. However, they did not give this refusal in writing, but through their envoy M. von Kaden.

He said that the pope was angry with the emperor because he wanted to interfere in ecclesiastical affairs and hear the parties, while he [the pope] hoped that the emperor would only be his executioner against the heretics and restore everything to its former state. For they do not wish to have anything changed, nor to lose anything, nor to be judged, nor to be interrogated, but simply to be condemned and brought to ruin, but to be restored to the former state; and so they will perish. For in this way we go to utter ruin, so must the wicked be blinded, if they are to perish. Yes, some believe that the Diet will decline altogether and that nothing will come of it. I have been commanded by the prince to remain in Cöburg when the others have left for the Diet; I do not know for what reason. 1) Thus everything becomes uncertain from one day to the next.

Florence is neither conquered nor reconciled with the pope, which the pope also regrets 2). For the army in it has always cried out that it is also for the emperor's rule. By the imperial (imporio), therefore, nothing has been done by force against them from without, but the siege has been lifted, and they are liberated. From this you can see how much our prayers can accomplish if we persevere.

It is said that the Turk has promised or threatened that in the coming year he will again come to Germany with the highest power, and then also bring the Tartars against us in no small force. But it is written [Ps. 33:10], "The Lord maketh void the counsel of the heathen." The word and prayer will fight against it. Pray for me and be well in Christ. Coburg, 1530 on the second day of Easter [April 18].

917 Luther's letter to Wenceslaus Link that he must remain at Coburg by order of the Elector. April 22, 1530.

The original of this letter is at Wolfenbüttel in the 6ott. Hs.rust. 285 L; printed from it by Wideburg in the Helmstadt School Program 1818, p. XIII; also by Schütze, Vol. II, p. 129 from the Kraft Collection at Husum; by De Wette, Vol. IV, p. 5 and in the Erlanger Briefwechsel, Vol. VII, p. 299. Only one piece, namely the second paragraph, by Cölestin, Vol. I, p. 30; by Buddeus, p. 86 and here (German) by Walch. We give the whole letter after the Erlanger Briefwechsel.

Newly translated from the Latin.

To the venerable brother in Christ, Doctor Wenceslaus, the exceedingly faithful minister of the Gospel at Nuremberg, his superior.

Grace and peace in Christ! I am very sorry for this man, Hans Ernst, your citizen who was sent into exile, my dear Wenceslaus; you will understand the matter from these letters of his. I would certainly have written to your council, but first I wanted to consult you in the matter, of which I know nothing for certain. Therefore I ask you to find out the matter, whether it is as he complains, and then you may either report it to me, or act for him yourself with the other servants of the Word. For living like this, without wife and home, is dangerous; then it is quite unbearable that he, as it were, as a dishonorable man, is not allowed anywhere to work and to seek his living, because his absence from his home is suspicious. Therefore, my dear Wenceslaus, see to it that as much as is in you, the poor man is advised.

By the way, we are here at Coburg, uncertain about the Imperial Diet and the Emperor's arrival; perhaps you have more certainty. Although the other colleagues are going to Augsburg, the Prince wants me to stay here. You will see them, namely Philip, Jonas, Eisleben, and Spalatin, when the Imperial Diet has its course. From them you will learn everything.

I almost passed over this: Your father-in-law has implored me at Altenburg to intercede for him with you, that you would leave him the debts you have outstanding in this region for his maintenance. He acknowledges that you have given him much, but his poverty compels and urges him to ask for this as well. Yes, he has better confidence in you than in your wife, his daughter. He is a good and understanding man. Thou shalt know what thou oughtest to do. Farewell in Christ, and greet thy flesh with thy children, amen. At Coburg, 1530, on the evening of George the Martyr [April 22, 1]. 1)

Your Martin Luther.

Concerns of Philipp Melanchthon, what would be "z" thn "if the emperor should request that the sermons in Augsburg be discontinued.

If Imperial Majesty should desire that our most gracious Lord Majesty should request that our most gracious Lord discontinue the sermons in Augsburg, we believe that your C. F. G. will most humbly object and request that Imperial Majesty neither demand nor insist on such a thing. Majesty neither demands nor insists on such a thing.

First, because this doctrine has been heard before, even in the Diet, and it has never been heard that anything false or seditious has been preached.

1) De Wette has erroneously the 23rd of April. In the night from April 22nd to 23rd Luther was brought from the city of Coburg to the fortress, and this is the last letter of Luther, which is dated from Coburg.

2) Because nothing controversial is preached, but the useful doctrine of Christ and what is most necessary for the improvement of life.

3) Because this doctrine was not condemned at the Diet, but was referred to a council, and no article is preached that has been condemned, nor has any false doctrine crept into the places where this doctrine is preached. If there had been such preachers in other places, who could have kept consciences safe, there is no doubt that the contagious disease would not have come there.

4) Some articles have been spread in this city which ours contradict, and it is hoped that this doctrine will be of much edification.

Secondly: If the emperor should forbid by public command that preaching should not be done before the people, and that it should be done only in silence, I think that one ought not to oppose it, because it is only a change of place, as we have also heard that it was done at Speier. For this our most gracious lord has no dominion in this city, so he must be content with the change of place.

Third, if the emperor forbids such things even in the inn, I think that one must obey the emperor's command, nor do and act anything against it, just as one who is taken prisoner cannot defend himself. Let all disputes be left aside, that one might leave the place and take leave without having achieved anything. For this would give the appearance of not trusting one's cause and not wanting or being able to give an account of one's religion and one's faith, especially since the Imperial Majesty holds the opinions of both parties in the same way. Majesty wanted to hear the opinions of both parties most graciously, and 1 Petr. 2 is written: Be ready for the responsibility of everyone who demands reason 2c.

The foregoing articles and reasons, however, with the mature and earnest counsel of theologians, have been somewhat more emphatically and fully furnished, and have been presented in the following writing.

II.

Other concerns of the theologians of the Elector of Saxony, whether the sermons at Augsburg should or can be discontinued and abolished? 2)

(1) If the Imperial Majesty should wish and request that the Elector of Saxony abolish the sermons. Majesty should wish and request that the Elector of Saxony, our most gracious Lord, abolish and discontinue the sermons.

2) The Oorx. lief-, vol. II, 71 puts this concern "about 28 May 1530".

so we think that their C. F. G. should be presented to the Emperor's Majesty. Majesty. and should most humbly, as much as she can and may, present that the human frailty of the present time is of such a nature that it always needs and requires godly reassurance, admonition and consolation from God's Word and promises, so that the afflicted do not despair and lose heart, and on the other hand the fallen and erring are uplifted and rebuked, and strengthened and affirmed in the many and varied dangers, hardships and misfortunes to which our lives are always subject.

(2) Moreover, the Scripture says that the word of God is not bound. But that we do not present and explain to the people any doctrine that departs from the word of God can also be proven and demonstrated from this, because the very doctrine that we now practice and profess by the grace of God was also publicly heard in two kingdom assemblies that were held at Speier, and yet the outcome was never shown that we either taught false and inconsistent opinions or dreams of men, or brought something on the way or presented it to the people that did not agree with the reason of the prophets and apostles, or gave rise to more controversy.

(3) After this, that no controversies are taught by us, but that the doctrine of Christ our Mediator and Saviour is badly expounded, every sensible man easily discerns from this; for it is clear that the people cannot become worse, but better, by this. Nor will it ever be possible to prove and show with any certainty that in the places where our doctrine has hitherto been presented, any uproar or cause of quarrel has been given, or that any other freaks of mad heads have broken into the church in ugly opinions. Rather, we can assure you that such harmful poison of foolish opinions would never have been spread so far and wide if such preachers had been ordered and appointed in all places, who could have comforted and raised up the frightened and wounded consciences, instructed the minds of men in the true knowledge of God, prepared remedies against the cunning and mischievousness of the devil, and kept the poor ignorant people safe from the false brethren and the masters of the sect. For those who do not want to hear the truth of the divine word and the true teaching, nor approve of it, must, as a punishment for the despised truth and sound teaching, hear foolish and untruthful opinions and consider them good.

(4) Our doctrine has never been entirely rejected and banished from the church, but has been admitted until a general concilium or national assembly has been held and something definite has been concluded and agreed upon in this important matter, which can be seen from the conclusions of the aforementioned imperial congresses.

(5) Moreover, we have not yet been convicted of teaching either damnable or heretical articles, which has been done by some preachers of the city of Augsburg, who have violently thundered against our doctrine, and have often refuted it in their preaching. Therefore we are of good hope that great benefit and edification will be brought to many through the spreading and preaching of our doctrine, and that some will either come to recognize their sins from the heart and repent, or awaken others to confess that they have hitherto been in error and want to amend.

(6) Her C.F.G. would also not be acting in accordance with her magnanimity and godly zeal if she were to consent to and give in to such desires of her Imperial Majesty. Majesty, since all eyes are directed to her C. F. G. (as in whose lands and dominions this doctrine first arose in a wonderful and glorious way and was first purified and spread), and take her before them as a common example and pattern, according to which they most diligently take care that they do nothing wrong or commit something contrary to the Word of God. It is also to be feared that, if we were to consent to such a request, we would be opening doors and gates, so that the preachers who are lawfully appointed in Augsburg would give up their sermons and resign such an office.

007 If, however, the Imperial Majesty should command and order by public order that preaching should cease for a time in public places. If, by public order, the Emperor should command and decree that preaching in public places be suspended and omitted for a time, and yet permit it in inns and individual houses, we must not strive against it, but tolerate it, and, at our discretion, obey the order of the Emperor. Majesty. For this does not prohibit us from preaching, but only changes the place; which, as far as we remember, was done at the Diet of Speier. Moreover, her C. F. G. at Augsburg, as in a foreign place, and since she has nothing to command, obeys such a command of Imperial Majesty out of necessity, and since she has nothing to command, obeys such a command of Imperial Majesty. Majesty out of necessity, and the preaching of the doctrine is not forbidden, nor is it to be dismissed, in which one place is distinguished from the other, because the Psalm [Ps. 24:1] says: "The earth is the Lord's, and what is in it."

(8) How about then, if not only Imperial. Majesty, but also all the estates of the empire wanted the sermons abolished and discontinued altogether?

(9) Here the answer is twofold: (1) For first of all, the preachers of the divine word must now obey Christ in all things, as well as the apostles did before, when he said and commanded: If they drive you out of one city and cast you out, flee to another.

10) 2) Hereafter, since Imperial Majesty will hear both parties' doctrine. We believe that, for the honor of the divine name, this injustice must be justly pardoned and that we must be obedient and submissive to the imperial majesty's command in this matter. As he who would be thrown into prison could neither refuse nor resist.

(11) Let their C. F. G. joyfully confess and recount before Imperial Majesty and all imperial states. Majesty and all the estates of the empire joyfully confess and tell them in what wonderful and quite inexpressible way they first came to the knowledge of the pure doctrine and the pure understanding of the evangelical truth, and do not let themselves be frightened by any threats of the adversaries, nor be driven and made flexible from such confession by harsh words, and do not think or speak of departure until the articles of our confession have been read and heard before all the princes and estates of the empire.

012 Let us therefore wait for the end, and give glory unto God only, who will give us and our things happiness and blessing, because he saith, Whosoever shall confess me before the world, him will I confess also before my heavenly Father. But whosoever shall deny me before the world, him will I also deny before my Father. And 1 Peter 1 Ep. 3:15. f. saith, "Be ready to answer to every man that requireth the hope that is in you, and that with meekness and fear, as they that have a good conscience." One could also add this at the end of the petition: their C. F. G. wanted, according to their ancestors' example, to please Imperial Majesty in everything. Majesty in everything, and what they are able to do and know, they would gladly and willingly present for their service and honor, if only their Imperial Majesty would not insist on such a request. Majesty would not insist on such a request, which would burden and depress the consciences of their C. F. G. and their relatives in faith and religion, but would show themselves to be just.

III.

Third objection of the theologians of the Elector of Saxony to the Emperor's request to cease and desist from preaching. 1)

1) This objection will be made on June 16, 1530. Compare No. 943.

(1) At the Emperor's request that the sermons be abolished, we judge that they should nevertheless be continued and practiced, for the following reasons:

(2) Because Imperial Majesty has never yet seriously commanded that they be abolished and discontinued. Majesty has never yet seriously commanded that they be abolished and discontinued, but has only graciously requested that they not be done publicly to the people. However, it is known to all and obvious that it is up to the Electors and other Princes of the Empire to refuse even a moderate and unpleasant, not to mention unjust and unreasonable, command of the Imperial Majesty, and to do so. Majesty and to refuse such.

(3) Moreover, it may be inferred from many signs and circumstances that this command of the Emperor's Majesty was issued and made known before to frighten us and prevent us from our undertaking, than to threaten us with some danger. Majesty was issued and made known before to frighten us and prevent us from our intention, than to threaten us with some danger, or the opinion that the Emperor wants to rely on it; and we think that they only want to test the inconstancy and uncertainty of our part and our doctrine, and see whether we will first let up and concede a little, so that we would open the door and gate for the opposite to think and take more and more on us. If we resist bravely and eagerly at first, we will soon dampen their hope and confidence, so that they will not presume too highly and take everything else against us; and when we have taken off their lion's skin and shown them their errors, we will bring them to understand and see that it is much better and safer to trust in God alone than in a thousand princes.

(4) Subsequently, this also seems to us to be an important reason why our preachers cannot cease or remain silent, because after the sermon has ended, not only the matter that is now before us at the present Diet, but also the princes, princes and all the estates of the empire are commanded to God in heartfelt and fervent prayer, which is especially required now, in this miserable and wretched time, above all others.

(5) But if on imperial. Majesty. 5. If, by order and decree, the gates of the church were to be closed to us, we jointly resolve that no force be used, nor the gates broken open; for this reason, because it might seem that such a thing would be undertaken and committed out of insolence, courage, and hopefulness in that city in which the Duke of Saxony, Elector, our most gracious Lord, with the other princes and estates of the same religion and faith, has nothing to command or any dominion.

(6) But when this is done, the Elector of Saxony and the rest of the princes may again sit on horseback and go home, and look around in their inns and dwellings for a comfortable place and choose such a place where they may set up and hold their prayer and worship. Just as it behooves a righteous householder to be diligent and careful that his household be instructed and taught in the word of God and in the true knowledge of his Son. Christian princes will also do a praiseworthy and decent work if they diligently see to it that their court is well instructed and built up in the word of God.

007 But if the Imperial Majesty should also by public command However, with our reservations we have wanted to leave it until then and postpone it, since the case itself occurs, because commonly by God's will and providence, when the deed comes, advice and means also come as to how one is then to behave.

921: Concern of the Chancellor D. Bruck, to the effect that preaching is not to be omitted. (May 10 or 11, 1530.)

According to Brück's own manuscript in the Weimar archives printed in Förstemann's Urkundenbuch, vol. I, p. 184. Also in Müller I. e. p. 489 and in Oorp. Rot. II, 75. the time determination is according to Förstemann.

Christ.

Imperial Majesty shall graciously seek with Princes, Princes, and Estates that at Augsburg the time how to obtain and safely arrange such shall be with Her Majesty, also electors, princes and estates, and the common preachers 1) of the city of Augsburg are to be kept silent.

Causes:

For if the preachers should now preach against each other without comparison and disputation, it must be considered what trouble and disquietude of mind and conscience would result.

In addition, it should not have the opinion as if the Imperial Majesty wanted to forbid the preaching of the divine word. Majesty would thereby forbid the preaching of the divine word, but should be done solely for reasons of error. And so that the Imperial Majesty Majesty, with the advice and concern of the imperial cities, to reach the settlement of the reported error that much more quickly, the Imperial Majesty would be willing to settle the matter. Majesty would be willing to first carry out the matters of faith here, and the aforementioned proposal should stand for a short time of the Imperial Diet, in the hope that the settlement should take place in the meantime.

Concerns:

From this it is to be understood that the Imperial Majesty does not wish to make this proposal known to my most gracious lord, or to other estates that have the divine word preached, but that the search is to take place publicly and in general against and before all estates; which has undoubtedly been practiced by the Imperial Majesty because our most gracious lord averted the search for a standstill with preaching by constant causes and counter-petitions at the two previous imperial congresses at Speier. This was undoubtedly practiced by His Imperial Majesty, because our most gracious Lord averted the search for a standstill with the sermon at the two previous imperial congresses at Speier through constant causes and counter-petitions, and also because His Electoral Grace here in one place had the right to order the sermon to be preached in public and before all the estates. His Graces are here in a place where the divine word is in the hands of His Electoral Grace. The priests in Speier did not want to refrain from this or to have it decreed by the council, as is the case here. That we should now be overhasty with the greater part of it, or if the greater part of the estates want to obey Imperial Majesty, that we should be overhasty with the greater part of it. Majesty, as a minor act, so that we alone must contest such with disgrace before Imperial Majesty. Majesty.

And although it is true that the proposal has some semblance, in that, if Imperial Majesty is to act for Christian conciliation, it may result in a wide-ranging discussion. Majesty should want to act for the sake of Christian harmony, that there should be a wide spread where the preachers should preach against each other in a disputatious manner: but it is to be feared that it is not meant that way, for such a thing could well be prevented by other means. Namely, that the preachers be commanded to teach the truth of God in their sermons without reproach or dispute.

Item, because the opinion of the Sacramentarians was laid down and forbidden by their departure from Speier a year ago, Imperial Majesty could command that these Sacramentarians stand still with their preaching; for truth should not be laid down for the sake of untruth. But it is to be believed that it would be considered disgraceful, so here in Augsburg, in the presence of the imperial majesty, against the truth. Majesty's presence, contrary to her edict, perhaps also contrary to her Majesty's promises that may have been made to the pope, the new doctrine (as they call it) should be allowed to be led publicly; and that the proposal should only be a compliant beginning of the laying down of the Gospel, until her Majesty comes to the full decision. would come to the decision, which might please the Popes, and especially the Dukes of Bavaria and Austria, in this place of Augsburg, because the city is situated close to their lands. Therefore, if one should want to prefer the majority of the estates in this matter, it will be necessary not to grant it; for if it were granted in the beginning, one would then want to hurry us with it in the whole main matter. And so Imperial And if His Majesty should have the above request made to all the estates, on account of the standstill, and the estates should, as is the custom, discuss it, it will be necessary that it be decided beforehand what is to be done or not to be done to our gracious Lord. For since the Gospel has been preached freely here in Augsburg, and our most gracious Lord has been granted a church for this purpose by the rulers of the city, it must be considered whether His Electoral Grace, by their grant, will allow the church to be built. His Grace may, by their permission, restrain and bind the word, so that it may stand silent for a time. Item, if it were also suggested that His Electoral Grace would once consent to such a thing, graces once agreed to this, it would be to be feared that such bookings would be made thereafter. Therefore our most gracious Lord should have himself heard in the Elector's Council on this: his Electoral Grace would have given the Emperor's permission for this to take place. His Grace would have Majesty's desires and the causes of the same: now his electoral graces would remember what the royal wishes were. Grace would remember what the royal dignity of Hungary and Bohemia, as Imperial Majesty's governor, means. Majesty's Governors, together with their Majesty's Commissaries, at both of the next Imperial Diets held at Speier. Grace, for the sermons 1) and the omission of the same in the same way, and what his Elector's Grace of her royal dignity has sought. Grace of their Royal Dignity and the Commissaries thereupon, with notice of constant original.

1) 6orx. Lei. : "Preaching". Förstemann: "Preacher".

why His Electoral Grace could not consent to the same. Since these are matters that affect the conscience and also God's honor and word, which no man, because of his weak and sinful conscience and the devil's attempts, could do without for a day, His Electoral Highnesses thought it best to inform His Imperial Majesty of this and to request that His Majesty continue the preaching. 2)

922. Melanchthon's misgivings about refraining from eating meat.

The complete concern expressed in the Oorx. Rsk. , Vol. II, 79, and printed by Förstemann 1. e. p. 192 ff. from the Weimar archives, comprises six articles, of which Müller, p. 498, and after him Walch, have included only the first article, and that incompletely. We have supplemented it according to Förstemann. In order not to weigh down this volume unduly, we leave it at that.

At first, from eating meat.

Because meat has been eaten at Speier, it is not proper to withdraw now. But there is much rebellion and fornication with such meat-eating, which those who pride themselves on the holy gospel ought to avoid, and it would be good for my gracious lord to exercise such liberty over his people. For with such fornication one annoys the unintelligent more than bringing them to the Gospel; so one is wont to say: DxtrenE äementiae 68t, krustrg 3) niti, et nid.il nisi oäiuin c'uaerere. Thus it is a bad holiness to eat no 4) meat, and yet be full and mad day and night. It is also to be borne in mind that, although my gracious Lord Imperial Majesty is to be subdued. Majesty refrains from eating meat, where such is desired by reason of her Majesty, nothing has been done contrary to the foregoing. For formerly my gracious lord had implored that his electoral grace be spared, and that he should be spared. Grace to be spared, and at such request His Imperial Majesty "Commissary" had the meat eaten. Majesty's Commissary" let happen that my gracious lord needed Christian freedom, and about that that they have taken it into consideration, they have given my Lord no further answer.

H. no further answer. Where, however, such a thing would be commanded by reason of HM,

2) Here the manuscript breaks off. It would have to be added: "further than until after the same arrival would allow".

3) Förstemann has krusta in the text, but in the margin according to Melanchthon: krustra.

4) "none" is missing in Förstemann and in 6orp. Lsk.

I respect, Philip, that my most gracious lord may forbear the eating of meat without complaint, but that his C. F. G. protested that his C. F. G. thought it right to eat meat, but she wanted to refrain from doing so for the sake of the king.

923 The Saxon theologians have doubts as to whether the Elector of Saxony and other protesting princes can participate in the Corpus Christi procession without violating their conscience. On the evening of June 15, 1530.

This concern is in Latin in Cölestin, Vol. I, p. 67, in German in Müller, p. 525. From Spalatin's copy in the common archive at Weimar in Förstermann's Urkundenbuch, Vol. I, p. 269. He remarks that the original ends with a comma and is not complete. We have added the time determination according to Förstermann.

On the question whether our most gracious lord, the Elector of Saxony 2c., and others, may with good conscience go in the procession of the Corpus Christi? is our concern:

First, that it is most certain that one abstains completely from the procession, and thinks of ways in which one may present to Imperial Majesty a submissive apology, as well as a clear confession that one does not despise the reverend sacrament with the Zwinglians. First, that it is most certain that one abstains from the procession altogether, and thinks of ways in which one can present to His Majesty a submissive apology, as well as a clear confession that one does not despise the reverend Sacrament with the Zwinglians.

For after two great abuses are in this procession:

First of all, that contrary to all Scripture and the command of God, and also contrary to the papal rights, the sacrament is divided, and only the body or bread, without the blood of Christ and the chalice, is administered, although Christ has appointed the whole sacrament to be used at the same time.

Secondly, the sacrament is not instituted for such a use as to be a service of worship and service, as if such a work were a special service of worship, as the Jews worshipped the serpent, though the same was ordained of God to be regarded.

Now it would be considered as if such abuses were confirmed here, since one should stand and confess what one holds, and is especially required for this reason. And if one then preached against it, this example would be set against it, that they were not bad abuses, for the princes had also gone along at such a time, who had previously let such things fall as an abuse.

E. Of two petitions of the Estates to the Emperor, and his answer.

he Estates petition the Emperor to come to Augsburg soon.

From Cölestin, vol. I, p. 55.

Translated into German by U. A. Tittel.

Most invincible, most powerful Emperor, always ruler of the Empire, most gracious Lord! Our obedience and most owed services, in deepest subservience before 2c., and do your Imperial Majesty hereby know. Majesty: Since, according to Your Imperial Majesty's Maj. we have obediently assembled here with other princes and estates of the empire, and some of us have now lain here for a long time, with great hardship and expense. Maj. will deign to come here as soon as possible, considering that the important matter and the need itself require it most urgently, lest a mistake be made in taking us away or in bringing us in, and Your Imperial Majesty be delayed for a long time in the country. Maj. be delayed long in the country, but that everything be done properly, at the right time, and in good and convenient order.

Therefore, without measure and with the approval of Your Imperial Majesty, we deem it good. Maj., and are of the opinion that it would be very well done for the better promotion and organization of all things if Your Imperial Majesty were to send someone of your own with sufficient power here. Maj. would send someone of your own with sufficient power here, with whom, because of the departure and arrival, likewise because of the ordering and better promotion of all other necessary things, we would be kindly and properly consulted, so that the princes and princes who are assembled here and will shortly be coming here can take the appropriate means and ways accordingly.

We therefore most humbly request that Imperial Maj. Maj. will graciously accept and note this well-meant and faithful letter of ours. Whereby we most graciously command Imperial Majesty, as our most gracious lord, and persevere with the most humble offer of all owed services.

925 The Estates' other petition to the Emperor to order the rank of the German princes on his accession.

In Cölestin, vol. I, p. 55.

Translated into German by U. A. Tittel.

1. most invincible and most powerful Emperor, always the ruler of the Empire, 2c. most gracious Lord! We four Electors, and the envoys of Trier and the Palatinate, your Maj.'s counsellors in the Holy Roman Empire, having received the letter of honour concerning the departure and arrival, have at once unanimously consulted and diligently considered how and in what manner the same arrival in honour of your Imperial Maj. would be arranged in the most honest and most effective manner. Maj. could be arranged in the most sincere and most convenient way. We have not been able to devise a better way than to adhere to the order of the Golden Bull in such a procession, which, as far as our persons are concerned, we have diligently considered, and in which we expressly state that in Your Imperial Majesty's presence (it is to be acted upon), the procession is to take place in the presence of Your Imperial Majesty. Maj. presence (be it what it may) we, the Archbishops of Mainz and Cologne, go to both sides of your Imperial Maj. Maj. on both sides, and our friend the Archbishop of Treves immediately in front of Your Imperial Maj. Maj., and on his right the Elector Palatine, and on his left the Elector of Saxony and Brandenburg.

(2) As the bull in gold also directs the King of Bohemia in the processions to the place nearest to his Imperial Majesty, and wishes to have such order in riding and walking that no one may pass between them. Maj. and wants to have just such an order in riding and walking kept that no one goes in between, by determining in clear and explicit words to every prince his place unchangeably, and does not want that any other prince, he may be of whatever rank, dignity or honor he wants, is preferred to them: so it also prefers the king of Bohemia unchangeably to all other kings, they may be as high and great as they want, and have arrived from whatever causes it may be, that he<sup>1)</sup> is above them.

(3) We therefore hold that the order which was used for the consecration and coronation of Your Imperial Majesty at Aachen shall also be used as far as our persons are concerned. Maj. in Aachen for the consecration and coronation, will also be used as far as our persons are concerned. Concerning the cavalry of the Electors, however, we find, among other things, that this order was observed in the reported procession, that my cavalry, that of the Elector of Saxony, first, then that of the Elector of the Palatinate, and then that of the Elector of the Holy Roman Empire.

1) "he" put by us instead of "she".

of Brandenburg, finally the Mainzian, Trierian and Cologne archbishops' cavalry. The same order, we think, is to be kept now, but in such a way that my, the archbishop's, namely of Mainz, cavalry, since the entry takes place in my territory (or dominion), first goes before Your Imperial Majesty. Maj. But since the King of Bohemia, according to the Bull of Gold, follows first behind your Imperial Maj. Maj., we deem it proper that the royal cavalry should go behind the Imperial Maj. Maj. In this way we, the Electors and the absent envoys, have agreed to keep an order in moving in; however, with the mild reservation that in this and similar cases no one of ours will be deprived of anything by this settlement. We also wished to act with respect to the other Princes, but found, after consultation, that between the most prominent Princes of the Empire, as between those of Bavaria and Saxony, those of Brandenburg and Brunswick, the Hessians and the Pomeranians, there have been various disputes for many years about the seat, the migration, and the place, and that no settlement has yet been reached, even though it has often been attempted. It seems that such disputes have come to such a point that, even if all of the same princes were present and acted between them, all trade would be fruitless and would not be concluded.

(4) Since it is easy to conclude that a dispute could arise in the country (or outside the city), we consider it good and necessary to prevent such mischief and rebellion in time, but believe that no one can advise and help better than Your Imperial Majesty. Majesty, to whom such princes might sooner yield. We therefore humbly ask your Imperial Maj. Majesty to consider the matter most graciously for the advancement of this entire work, and with good and proper reasons (in which we do not set any measure for Your Imperial Majesty) to persuade the Princes mentioned that they should, in honor of Your Imperial Majesty, assist in the establishment of the new government. Maj. that they keep the order of riding, which Your Imperial Maj. will prescribe. Maj. will prescribe; however, with the reservation that no one's liberties or rights will be infringed thereby, also with the most gracious promise that Your Imperial Majesty will, immediately after the entry into the country, grant them the right to ride in the same order as your Imperial Majesty. Majesty will, immediately after the entry, take care to settle the dissenting princes therein. If then Your Imperial Majesty Maj. find our proposal acceptable and graciously grant our request, we, the Electors and the absent envoys of your Imperial Majesty, also offer ourselves to your Imperial Majesty's full service and support. Maj. to all our service and favour, and we promise to be of service to you.

humbly request that we do everything possible to resolve this dispute, to unite the minds and to contribute to the honor of Your Imperial Majesty and the benefit of our friends, cousin and uncle. Maj. and the benefit of our friends, cousin and uncle.

(5) This, most invincible Emperor, most gracious Lord, we have done at your Imperial Majesty's request. Maj.'s request, concerning the departure and arrival, we have most faithfully and diligently done and consulted, but in such a way that your Imperial Maj. Maj. we are at liberty to maintain or improve the same, with the most humble request that Your Imperial Maj. Maj. may graciously inform us of what they may wish to do with regard to this consultation and the stated order in the collection and return it to us in writing, so that we know what we, and especially I, the Elector of Saxony and Archmarshall, are to follow with regard to the order in the riding. Wherewith to Your Majesty's Your Majesty's protection and protection most humbly commanded. Given at Augsburg.

926: The Emperor's declaration sent to Augsburg concerning the entry.

In Cölestin, vol. I, p. 56.

Translated from the Latin by Li. A. Tittel.

Carl von Gottes Gnaden Roman Emperor, all times Mehrer of the Empire.

Instruction (or order), concerning which the Reverend Philip, Bishop of Speier, and Johann Albrecht, Margrave of Brandenburg, Coadjutor of the Churches in Magdeburg and Halberstadt; and Wolfgang, noble Count of Montfort and Retenfels, Princes and Councillors, our dear faithful, with the most reverend and most illustrious, our dear friends, cousins and grandparents, the Electors of Mainz, Cologne, Saxony, Brandenburg, and of the envoys of Trier and the Palatinate, who are now assembled at Augsburg, are to act and confer 2c.

(1) First of all, let them report our imperial grace and friendship to them. and friendship to them and wish them every good fortune, and then further state: that we, as our counsellors in the Roman empire, have heard their cries. The letter, which they recently gave from Augsburg, has been well received. And since they consider, among other things, how they, at our request, have begun to act on the matter of removal and collection, and how and in what way everything should be done and arranged in our honor in the best and most glorious way, they have diligently considered and pondered; for this reason they also consider it good that the way and manner prescribed and set forth in the Golden Bull be observed, with the addition of everything that is expressly touched upon and reported therein by the Elector's person.

(2) We have graciously seen and heard all that is contained in the same letter, and for this reason we thank them; but they also see that they either do not know, or have not thought so carefully and have not remembered, or do not want to bring and show us that immediately after receiving the crown of Papal Holiness we decided to set out and make our journey to the German nation of the Holy Roman Empire. We have decided, immediately after receiving the crown from Papal Holiness, to set out on our journey to the German nation of the Holy Roman Empire and to put an end to the disputes pending between them and the other estates of the Holy Roman Empire, and to restore everything to an amicable, Christian, and praiseworthy state. To accomplish this the sooner, the better, and the more salutary, we have not only deemed it necessary, but also useful, to take to us an envoy of the papal holiness with full power, who has also been led up to this point and has enjoyed such honor and position as he shall also have when he arrives. Therefore, we have diligently seen to it that we do not, if we act and seduce according to the letter of the Golden Bull or contrary to it, put any obstacles and impediments in the way of the transaction and conduct of other business; which we want to find ready to avoid and avert completely. For this reason we would not argue about the golden bull, but would endeavor to leave it in its value and dignity, and to dispose of everything in such a way that the same collection in our honor (which they desired), as we did not doubt and also saw from their letter, may not be to their detriment or that of other estates and orders, but rather to the benefit, welfare, and promotion of everyone, as it also seems to be necessary for all of us. Which, at our discretion, could thus be done.

003 For since the princes, the absent envoys, and other estates of the realm may well be would know by what business we have hitherto had to postpone the arrival, even against and beyond our thinking, and on what occasion and for what causes, indeed, in what sense we, now that we have received the imperial crown, are minded to come to them: then they could also easily conclude that we want and desire the most illustrious prince, Lord Ferdinand, King in Hungary and Bohemia, our beloved and united brother, and in our absence appointed administrator of the empire, to be and remain with us.

4. Since they have also heard from us for what reasons we, in the most gracious opinion, have taken the legate with us and kept him with us, so that the papal holiness Legatus a Latere is not only with us in the same place and as a stranger (to whom it is proper to show honor and respect before others), but also takes their and the Holy Roman Empire's, especially the German nation's, complaints and oppressions very much to heart, and wants to do everything so that they may be removed, relieved, and lessened: Therefore I believed that his arrival would be the more pleasant and pleasing to them, and the more honor and respect would be shown to him. Now, for the present reasons, and because when Papal Holiness and we send our envoys to other princes, Papal Holiness' envoys are always supreme, and our envoys, when they are sent to them, are also preferred to all princes, princes, and estates, we hoped that the electors would not be unwillingly found in this.

(5) Furthermore, because the streets of the city of Augsburg, through which we, God willing! are wide and spacious, so that more than three can ride next to each other, and they have already spent a great deal of money in Augsburg before we can come to Augsburg and begin the Diet because of other business and delays; of which we have already written to them, so that they would not let the time pass in vain, graciously requesting, and enclosing important and high causes that move us, which we now set aside because of the shortness of time.

For these reasons, and that our long-desired arrival may be all the more preferable to them, we wanted to permit and allow the secular princes to come before us dukes, for their love and pleasure, but not out of obligation or according to the contents of the Golden Bull.

6th But from behind the cardinals, archbishops, and bishops with the envoys, namely, three in order (or a row), follow, as namely, the papal nuncio between the king of France's envoy on the right, and the archbishop of Bremen or another bishop on the left.

Then the Venetian ambassador between two other bishops in the middle. After the ecclesiastical princes, the envoys of the Dukes of Milan, of Ferrara, and of the Marquis of Mantua, and others.

8. Between these two ranks of ecclesiastical and secular princes and envoys, as I said, we with our beloved brother, who, as we thought before, because he is King of Bohemia (without which high dignity, in which he stands, we would not otherwise desire such things), should go on our right, but the legate, because of the above-mentioned and other highly important causes, should go on the left under a canopy and between the ecclesiastical and secular princes, so that the princes ride beside us; as the Golden Bull directs.

009 As for the cavalry of each retinue, we would have the cavalry of the Elector of Saxony, as Archbishop of the Empire, go first, then the Elector of Brandenburg and the Palatinate, and then in order that of Trier, Cologne, and Mainz, as Archbishops, and after them our brother Ferdinand, and then our cavalry go first before us.

010 But after the ecclesiastical princes and ambassadors shall our satellites (hatchet men) follow armed.

011 But the whole line or procession shall consist of the cardinals and ecclesiastical princes and ambassadors, and afterwards also of the secular princes and other estates' cavalry.

Of Emperor Carl V's rather long stay at Insbruck and the true cause of the same.

927 Philipp Melanchthon's letter to D. Martin Luther from Augsburg, the 22nd of May 1530, in which he reports how the emperor would not arrive there so soon, informs him about different suggestions of the imperial councils, attaches great praise to the chancellor Mercurinus and adds other important news.

This letter is handwritten in Ms. Manliainin, p. 15. Printed in Melanchthon's epp. lib. I, sp. 2; ea. r-onā. 1.6P. 2; in Cölestin, vol. I, p. 44 (incomplete); in the Corp. Rsk., vol. II, p. 59 and in Erlanger Briefwechsel, vol. VII, p. 342; German in Chyträus, Hist. p. 62 (in part) and in Wilhelm a Vallo, II, d. p. 56.

Translated from the Latin.

Hail! We had already hired a messenger who was to go to you and then to Wittenberg, for Jonas had learned of the death of his son from letters of the scribe Viola. Under the letter, however, your last letters came to me through D. Apel's messenger. Apel's messenger to my hand. Jonäs is quite satisfied after he has learned that his wife is healthy. For he was only worried about her, and I also had no small fear. My suspicion and worry were increased by the fact that you had not sent Pomer's letter, which he had mentioned in a letter to you.

(2) The Emperor is not yet here, and, as I think, will hardly arrive before Pentecost. He has not summoned either the Dukes of Bavaria or Duke George of Saxony to discuss religious matters, for he wants to remain impartial. It is reported that there are two voices in the Emperor's council: one that he should not interrogate the Lutherans, but condemn them immediately by an edict; the other that he should interrogate them properly and abolish the abuses in the church. This latter opinion is said to be held by the imperial chancellor Mercurinus, 1) an excellent and very moderate man; who is said to say that, in his weakness, he followed the emperor chiefly in the hope that he meant that matters of religion would come to a good end, he will not take part in violent counsels. We have heard nothing here that would be more worthy of our consideration to write. And I am particularly pleased with this speech and judgment of this highly knowledgeable man. May Christ take care of us and preserve us, and may he govern all actions so that they flourish for peace and the common good. Mercurinus also said this: at Worms it was well seen how nothing fruitful could be accomplished by violent attacks. For he was in the emperor's retinue and council at Worms. We are all, including the Prince, very concerned about your health, and therefore ask God to preserve you for the sake of His word. It is also our request to you that you take good care of your health. Doctor Caspar sends you some medicines through the Elector's messenger, which serve to strengthen your heart and soul. For he loves you very much.

(3) We make many changes to the Confession (Apologia) 2) every day. I have taken out the article on vows, because it was a little too small, and put another, more detailed explanation in its place. Now I place the article on the power of the Church. I pray you to overlook the Articles of Faith; if you will find no lack in those, let us fairly draft the rest. For there must always be some change in them, and they must be adapted to the occasion.

(4) The Landgrave of Hesse is now going about signing the speech of ours, and it seems that he can easily be brought to ours; but for this your letter to him is necessary. Therefore I beg you most earnestly to write to the Landgrave, and exhort him that he will not weigh down his conscience by defending any false doctrine. I do not want you to write again to the younger prince; 3) for he now hates no one.

2) By Apologia are here to be understood the Torgau Articles, which form the basis of the second part of the Augsburg Confession; immediately following, "the Articles of Faith" are the Schwabach Articles, the basis of the first part of the same.

3) This is contrary to Melanchthon's earlier letter, No. 902; - the first following reads with the old translator: "for he is now no one more ungracious than 2c."

than him, whom he seemed to love more than the apple of his eye. But his mind is very changeable, and that does not come from his young years, but rather, as I think, from nature. Schnepf is a good, steady man. I would like you, in his honor, to write to him on a suitable occasion. As for the Frisians, the Elector has ordered D. Pomeranus to look for an able man who knows the Saxon language and to send him to the Frisians. To this opinion you may reply. I send you a painting of the siege of the city of Vienna. By Apel's messenger we will write more. In the meantime you shall give this messenger of ours letters to your honest wife, for he will be able to bring back answer. Farewell and pray for us to Christ our Lord. Given on Sunday Vocem Jucunditatis [22 May 1530].

928 Letter of the Elector John to Luther from Augsburg. 4 May 1530.

This letter is found in the Altenburg edition, Vol. V, p. 23; with Walch and in the Erlangen correspondence, Vol. VII, p. 327. In a regest with Burkhart datirt of 20 May. Köstlin, M. Luther, vol. II, p. 653 aa 207 gives the corrective: May 4, which results from the sending of the medicine. Cf. No. 902.

Dear he Doctor! Be in love with all of us, do not let the time be long for you. We are all very concerned about the health of your body, and we ask God to keep you in good health for the sake of his dear word; indeed, we exhort you yourselves to take good care of your health. O. Caspar, our physician, send you medicine by this messenger, to strengthen your head and heart with it; for he is your faithful friend. And we also remain well inclined to you for all graces 2c.

This letter is found handwritten in Wolfenbüttel, Copenhagen and in the Ooä. Ho8toeli. Printed in Flacius' German collection of letters; with omission of the beginning in Chytraeus' Hist. of the Augsb. Conf. p. 26 b Latin, and German p. 67; also in Cölestinus, vol. To the most illustrious, highborn Prince and Lord, Lord John, Duke of Saxony, Elector of the Holy Roman Empire 2c., Landgrave in Thuringia, and Margrave of Meissen, my most gracious Lord.

Grace and peace in Christ our Lord and Saviour, Amen! Most Serene, Highborn Prince, Most Gracious Lord! I have now long delayed with answer to E. C. F. G. first letter from Augsburg, graciously done to me, with notice of new newspaper, and admonition that I should not let my time in this place be long 2c. And it is truly without need that E.C. F. G. so graciously thinks of me and cares for me, for we should think of E. C. F. G., care for him and ask, as we also truly and faithfully do. The time is not long for me, we live as gentlemen, and therefore these weeks have passed so that it seems to me hardly three days. But E. C. F. G. is and must be in a dull place now; so help our dear Father in heaven that E. C. F. G.'s heart may remain firm and patient in his grace, which he shows us so abundantly [Jac. 1:4, 4:6].

(2) For in the first place, it is certain that C. F. G. must bear such toil, fare, journey, and long journey, truly for the sake of God, since all angry princes and enemies have no other blame for C. F. G. than the pure, tender, living word of God, otherwise they must confess that C. F. G. is an innocent, quiet, pious, faithful prince.

003 Forasmuch then as this is certain, it is a great sign that God has given E. C. F. G., as to whom he so abundantly gives his holy word, and makes them worthy of it [2 Thess. 1,11.], that they must suffer such shame and enmity for its sake [Apost. 5, 41.], which ever makes for a comforting conscience. For to have God for a friend is more comforting than to have the friendship of all the world. On the other hand, we see.

How God esteemeth not the fierce and wrathful princes to know or to have his word. Yea, they are blinded and hardened, blaspheming and persecuting the same, as the froward and foolish: which is a terrible token of his great displeasure and wrath against them: of which they ought to be justly terrified, and to be desolate in conscience, as it must be in the end.

(4) Over and above this, the merciful God shows Himself even more gracious in that He has made His word so powerful and fruitful in E. C. F. G. land. For indeed, the C. F. G. Land has the very best and most good pastors and preachers than any other country in all the world, who teach so faithfully and purely, and keep such beautiful peace. Now, therefore, the tender youth of boys and girls are growing up, so well instructed in catechism and the Scriptures that it makes me feel good in my heart to see how young boys and girls can now pray, believe, and speak more about God and Christ than all the monasteries, convents, and schools were able to do before, and still are able to do.

5. there are indeed such young people in E. C. F. G. land is a beautiful paradise, the like of which is not in the world. And God builds all these things in E. C. F. G.'s bosom, as a sign that he is gracious and favorable to E. C. F. G.. As if he should say: "Well, dear Duke Hans, I entrust to you my noblest treasure, my merry paradise, you shall be father over them. For I will have them under thy protection and rule, and do thee the honour to be my gardener and keeper. This is certainly true. For GOD the LORD, who hath made E. C. F. G. the father and helper of this land, feedeth them all by E. C. F. G.'s office and service, and they must all eat E. C. F. G.'s bread. This is no different from the fact that God Himself is a daily guest and mouth to God, because His word and His children who have His word are daily guests and mouths to God.

006 Whereas, behold, in other princes their rages do harm to the dear youth, that they make of the paradise of God sinful, foul, torn puddles to the devil, and corrupt all things, having also vain devils daily at table and as guests; for they have are not worthy of honor with God, that they give His word a cold drink of water from all their goods [Matth. 10, 42]. Yes, they have to give vinegar, myrrh and gall to the thirsty Christ on the cross [Matth. 27, 34]. Although many pious people are secretly among them, here E. C. F. G. Paradise and the promised land are eagerly desired, and they heartily ask help for it.

7. because God is so abundant in E. C. F. G.'s land, that he so graciously allows his word to prevail, that through it E. C. F. G.'s office, goods and possessions, all of which go in a blessed custom and service, and actually all of which are vain daily alms and sacrifices, are presented in honor of the holy word of God without ceasing; in addition, E. C. F. G. is gifted with a peaceful heart, which is neither bloodthirsty nor murderous like that theology. C. F. G. is gifted with a peaceful heart that is neither bloodthirsty nor murderous, as that part is, and must be: then E. C. F. G. truly has great cause to rejoice in God, and to take comfort in such great signs of His graces. For it is a glorious great honor that God has given E. C. F. G. has chosen, consecrated, and made worthy that body and goods, land and people, and everything that E. C. F. G. has, stand and walk in such beautiful worship, that His divine word is not only not followed, but is also nourished and preserved. It does not hurt that some of us are not well off; nevertheless, C.F.G.'s service and protection is in the work of preserving the Word.

(8) Lastly, E. C. F. G. have now also previously encouraged faithful, heartfelt prayer among all Christians, especially in E. C. F. G. lands, and we know that our prayer is right, and the cause good; wherefore we are also sure that it will be acceptable and heard, 1 Tim. 2, 3. O, the young people will do it, who with their innocent tongues so heartily call and cry unto heaven, and E. C. F. G. as their dear father so faithfully to the merciful God. On the other hand, we know that that part has evil things, and cannot pray, but go about with clever suggestions, putting it all on their wit and power, as one can see before one's eyes; so it stands on the right sand.

9. this my writing E. C. F. G. would graciously accept from me; God knows that I speak the truth, and do not hypocrite; for I am sorry that Satan E. C. F. G. heart would grieve and sadden. I know him well in part, and know well how he is wont to play along with me; he is a sad, sour spirit, who cannot bear that a heart should be happy, or have rest, especially in God; how much less will he be able to bear that E. C. F. G. should be of good cheer? F. G. be of good cheer, than he who well knows how much is at stake in E. C. F. G.'s heart for all of us, and not only for us, but almost for the whole world, I almost wanted to say, also for heaven itself, because of course a great part of Christ's kingdom of heaven is in E. C. F. G., but also in God. C. F. G.'s country is built up by the salvific word, without ceasing; he knows this, and sees his displeasure in it. Therefore we all owe it to E. C. F. G. to faithfully assist her with prayer, comfort, love, and whatever we can; for where E. C. F. G. is happy, we live; but where she is sad, we are sick.

(10) But our dear Lord and faithful Saviour, Jesus Christ, whom the Father of all mercies has so abundantly revealed and bestowed upon us, may He send His Holy Spirit, the true, eternal Comforter, over all my words, who will always sustain, strengthen and protect E. C. F. G. against all poisonous fiery arrows of the sour, heavy, evil spirit, Amen, dear God, Amen. Given on May 20, Anno 1530.

Enclosure.

Doctor Apel has also asked me, most gracious sir, 1) that I should ask and excuse him from E. C. F. G., that he now takes leave and leaves for Prussia. For he would have liked to do so long ago, but E. C. F. G. has always been so overburdened that he, being very shy and modest, has always not wanted to trouble E. C. F. G., as I see that he will continue to report to E. C. F. G. himself. E. C. F. G. will know how to graciously comply with this. Hiemit Gott befohlen.

1) Doctor Johann Apel, who belonged to the electoral council in Wittenberg (see Förstemann's Urkundenbuch, Vol. I, p. 126), accepted a call from Duke Albrecht of Prussia as Chancellor, left Wittenberg at the end of May or beginning of June and arrived in Königsberg on July 10. - De Wette has erroneously connected this supplement with Letter No. 1126 in this volume.

Instruction, what the well-born, our and the realm's dear faithful, Wilhelm, Count of Nassau, Katzenelnbogen, Vianden and Diez, and Wilhelm, Count of Neuenar, are to do and advertise to the high-born Johann, Duke of Saxony, Landgrave in Thuringia and Margrave of Meissen, Archmarshall of the Holy Roman Empire, our dear grandfather and Elector, for our sake, and yet as for themselves, but to show this our Instruction 2).

First of all they shall tell his love our imperial grace and all good. Grace and all good things; and hereafter tell how we have heard of his servile, Christian and obedient offer, that we have received a special gracious and friendly favor, and that we give special gracious and friendly thanks to his love. And that we therefore also to him, Obgenanntem von Neuenar, and to our and the realm's dear faithful, Hansen von Doltzigk, his dear council and skilful, thereupon also on the articles which they and the said von Nassau have requested of us on account of his love, as, loan of the regalia, confirmation of the marriage with Jülich, 3) granting of the fair at Gotha, and on account of the carriage of our dear grandfather and Elector of Brandenburg husband 2c., again give such a gracious good answer, to offer his love promotion, as we have provided, undoubtedly have done, which we would have thought, his love, according to custom and form of all occasion, had and still should have good cause to be well satisfied. Non-Desto

2) As one can see here, the intention was that the envoys should not show these instructions. However, it will have become necessary to show it during the negotiations with the Elector, as can be seen from the following document and No. 932.

It has come to us that his beloved should complain of something of which we are most astonished, especially for these reasons, among others, that his beloved is well aware and has to remember in what relationship and good friendship the noble houses of Austria and Saxony have been for so many years, and how the erroneous cause of our holy Christian faith, from which so many disputes have subsequently arisen, has arisen. Let his beloved know, then, that in the same, they have separated themselves from us and the other five princes of ours and of the Holy Roman Empire, its members, and have despised and suppressed against the edict which we and they, all six princes and other princes and estates of the Holy Roman Empire, have unanimously considered and decided with us for the best: which then, together with the above-mentioned insanity and discord (we refrain from speaking of us, as a Roman Emperor, their Supreme Head and Lord, and Protector of Holy Christendom, the highest disgrace and contempt proven to us therein), has reached and brought the Holy Empire and almost the whole of Christendom to such an extent that it cannot now easily be recovered and restored; and about that, that also, so his love with those, who became disobedient and repugnant to us in this matter, made and entered into a 1) but understanding and alliance, contrary to us and touched our edict, and which also, as the head, shall still maintain. What bloodshed and cause for further development this has given to many states in the holy kingdom and the whole of Christendom, and may also give in the future, as long as we do not occur to these things by the grace of the Almighty, to his praise, for which we do not want to spare any diligence: that his love, as the understanding one, easily knows how to judge for himself. And that nevertheless all, as to say, unnoticed, we have to burden ourselves on the articles, which his beloved to us, as reported, has requested, to give any time, it is, that his beloved has sent her message to us, or has written, with term and Indult, reception of the regalia half, also confirmation and other things, up to our future in the realm, and that we would like to hear mentioned our dear grandfather and Elector of Brandenburg himself, who would be one of the most distinguished members of our and the holy realm, at all times nevertheless so with most gracious and infinite answer.

1) Förstemann: "in" instead of: "one" and immediately following: "bypassed" instead of: "entered". In the parallel passage in the following number, § 10: "in sondern Verstand und Bündniß 2c. have let in."

that we ever meant [that] his beloved should have no burden at all, but rather should have understood that from us in a Christian mind and but gracious and friendly favor. For his beloved, if she will well consider it, may ever sufficiently take from all this that we, as a Christian emperor and head of Christendom, desire nothing else ourselves, but that the honor and glory of God the Almighty be sought first, also that our height and majesty be recognized as befitting this, and not only be increased, but also be maintained to the least: And then to prove and show us graciously to his beloved ones, who have no alliance, but who, as a laudable prince no less than the others, are willing and obedient to us, as he is entitled to do. And let this main thing in itself be 2) so great and brave that it cannot be done well over land by writings or otherwise. But we nevertheless have this confidence that, if we and his beloved, according to their Christian heritage, were to be personally with one another, that we would both, by the grace of God, compare ourselves well. And therefore, where his beloved, or, where it would not be convenient because of the impossibility of their bodies, his fine son, or both of them, would come to us; in which case, if it would please them, they would take their way to Munich, and further await our newspaper, they would provide that they would welcome us to our arrival, that we also want to be satisfied with good will, as far as the things are concerned, which might happen or be carried out by both of our persons, where they surrender to us, have no alliance, and want to keep themselves as a laudable Elector, and his son, [as] a prince due to us and the Holy Roman Empire, as is reported above. And what then may concern the remaining articles, we may hear with the grace of God and act with good counsel therein. And his beloved, or the son, will now come or not according to their opportunity, that we well desired that they should wait until we arrive at Augsburg, and in these matters, as we hope that the Almighty will grant us grace, give good order, with their preachers to preach them to burden, stand completely still, to avoid much disputation. That our opinion is not at all, as of his love and his Son's future has been reported to us here above, that therefore we should be all the more careful.

2) Förstemann: "half". This mistake could easily have been improved, because these words are repeated in the following answer of the Churfürst.

We do not want to stay here any longer, but that we only want to talk to his or her loved ones before we come to Augsburg. And what they will find to answer to all this and every other thing, they shall let us know again in the most urgent and actual way, and they shall have to keep us to it. In this they do us especially good favour, and our earnest opinion. Given at Jnsbruck, sealed under our imperial imprinted seal, on the 24th day of May, Anno 2c. in the year 1530, the tenth of our empire, and the fifteenth of our realm.

931 Answer of Elector John, given to the imperial envoys, in which he rejects the above grace, May 31, 1530.

From the copy in the archives at Weimar printed in Förstemanns Urkundenbuch, vol. I, p. 224, also in Müller 1. e. With different text in Chyträus, sheet 32-38. Latin in Chyträus, pp. 37-42 and in Cölestin, vol. I, sheet 50 b.

1. high and well-born, dear grandfather and special. We have received with the most humble reverence, as on account of our Lord and Emperor, the advertisement sent to us by your love and you on the Imperial Roman Majesty, our most gracious Lord, and delivered to us by the Instruction of God's Grace John, Duke of Saxony, Archmarshall and Elector of the Holy Roman Empire 2c., and have understood the same, and also her Majesty's gracious attention, as such: After Her Imperial Majesty's After the arrival of Her Imperial Majesty, as if we should complain about the answer which Her Majesty has given you and ours, also Councillor and dear faithful, Hans von Doltzigk, various days ago, about some of the articles and things mentioned, Her Majesty would be highly surprised about this, especially for several reasons which are listed one after the other in the Instruction. Which nevertheless, 1) as if to say, unnoticed, Her Majesty is not aware of.

1) In Förstemann and Walch: "accordingly", for which according to the preceding writing "nevertheless" is to be read. - The meaning is: although the Elector would not have behaved against the Emperor as it would have been desirable, the Emperor nevertheless took no notice of it, but gave a gracious answer.

to our writings and messages sent, with time and grace, with the most gracious and unending answer, that Her Imperial Majesty would not have been mistaken that we had understood this to be burdensome for Her Majesty's sake; for if we had well considered it, we would have been able to assume from it sufficiently that Her Imperial Majesty would have understood it. Majesty that we would have understood this, on account of Her Majesty, to be burdensome; for if we had considered it well, we could ever have sufficiently assumed from it that Imperial Majesty herself did not desire otherwise. If we had well considered it, we would have been able to assume sufficiently that Imperial Majesty herself did not desire anything else than that the honor and glory of the Almighty be sought first, and that her Majesty's height be recognized as befitting this. But because this main matter is so great and so brave in itself that it could not be well dealt with over land by writings or otherwise, and her imperial majesty would be confident, where her majesty, according to our Christian heritage, would be personally with each other, that her majesty would compare well with the graces of God in both respects.

Therefore, if we, or, if it would not be convenient for us due to impossibility, our son, or both of us, would come to her Majesty, in the case which way would please us, we would then take the way to Munich and await her Majesty's newspaper there, we would be welcome to her Majesty; and as far as the things are concerned, which would be arranged by her Majesty and our person, where we would surrender to her Majesty, would have no alliance, and would hold ourselves as a Prince, and our son, as one of her Majesty's and the realm's Princes, due, as previously reported, would like to be satisfied with good will.

Whatever might concern the remaining articles, their Majesties could, with the grace of God, also hear them and act with good counsel in them; and we, or our son, if we would come or not according to our opportunity, would certainly request their Imperial Majesty that, for the time being and in the meantime, until their Majesties arrive at Augsburg and give good order in these matters, we stand completely still with our preachers, to have them preach, to avoid disputation, with the final imperial request: what you encountered in response to all this and every other thing, that you should let their Majesties know this in the most urgent and proper way. Request: what you encountered in response to all and every one of these things, that you should inform the imperial majesty of these things in a hurry and in the most proper way, and that her majesty should be guided by them.

And at the outset, towards the Imperial Majesty, our most gracious Lord. Majesty, our most gracious Lord, we thank you most humbly for your gracious offer, and especially that your Majesty has been graced and pleased by our submissive and obedient Christian offer.

2. second, that her imperial majesty and tolerate personally with Her Majesty, and thus graciously request to confer with us, or in the case with our son, on the main matters, but with the difference, as the Instruction allows, of our own person graciously. Now we would have been quite willing, out of humble opinion, to go to Her Imperial Majesty personally, together with us. Majesty personally, together with our son, beforehand and as soon as we learn of Her Majesty's arrival in Jnsbruck. arrival at Jnsbruck, as several other princes have done. For this reason we have ordered some of ours to send a letter to Imperial Majesty. Majesty. Court to have a safe experience of what Her Majesty might or might not like in it. But it has been indicated to us that our arrival might not be considered convenient because of this, that there is some misgiving and suspicion of special action on the part of the other sovereigns and princes, as well as the estates, and also of Her Majesty's arrival at the announced Imperial Diet. The arrival at the announced Imperial Diet could also give rise to some suspicion. So soon thereafter Her Imperial Majesty has also ordered the Majesty here at Augsburg by some of her Majesty's Councillors. So soon after, their Imperial Majesty at Augsburg, through some of their Majesty's counsellors, graciously let us know, besides other indications, how their Majesty's gracious wish would be that we expect them here at Augsburg, where their Majesty would be willing to go. To which Her Majesty's We are now also a month away, since we have, at Her Majesty's earnest imperial request first and foremost, not omitted to attend this Her Majesty's Imperial Diet. We would also have been pleased, upon Her Majesty's present gracious notification, to surrender to Her Majesty once again without delay, upon the requested advertisement and Her Imperial Majesty's Instruction, to report our unavoidable need, also our Christian and subservient mind and answer, to Her Majesty personally thereupon again: we have, however, noted from said Instruction that Her Majesty's mind, will, and opinion is not yet clear. Her Majesty's mind, will and opinion rests on the fact that both of you, Lords and Counts of Her Imperial Majesty, are to be restored to your Imperial Majesty. Majesty in turn to know in the most urgent and actual manner what you will find in response to everything and anything that is held up to us.

Therefore, and so that we, the Imperial Majesty, in obedience to Her Majesty. Majesty in obedience, also to Her Majesty's Instruction, we, the Imperial Majesty, wish to order our most gracious Lord and you. Majesty, our most gracious Lord, and you, in the place of Her Majesty, to report the remonstrance made:

(3) And first of all, what concerns us is that we have complained about Imperial Majesty's next answer. Majesty's next answer complaint.

You, Count William of Neuenar, know that when you received us for your return from the Imperial Majesty, we were to be given the right to take possession of the property. Majest. allhie, beside our council, Hansen von Dolzigk, the plot and imperial. Majesty. Majesty's answer that fell on it. We have reported to you that we are aware of the gracious audience and answer that Her Imperial Majesty has given to the fiefdom or to the fiefdom. Majesty's fiefdom or regalia, given to the Electorate of Saxony, with all humility. And although we have renewed and introduced the causes against you, by which we stood in comforting confidence that we would also receive a final and gracious answer to the other articles, as you, Count William of Nassau, may have indicated the same friendly opinion back against Jnsbruck: we nevertheless know by the grace of God that we have complained of such action and answer, that we have not allowed ourselves to be heard of the same in any other way than with all humble notification of our need. <sup>1)</sup> For we should be sorry that we have caused the Emperor's Majesty to suffer us by unseemly actions. Majesty by an unseemly turn of events that might justifiably give rise to misgivings or displeasure on our part; we also believe and well believe that, if it had not been for our disfavored ones and those who are partial in these matters, and too much mild reporting, Imperial Majesty would have been able to take a stand by reporting the matter to Her Majesty. Majesty would not have allowed himself to be moved to such burdensome reproaches against us, as the publicity is capable of, by our reported complaints alone. For the relationship and good friendship between the noble Houses of Austria and Saxony has been a custom for many years, as Imperial Majesty has shown. Majest. Instruction indicates, knowingly, and for this reason have shown us so much more kindness to Imperial Majesty. Majesty so much more gracious will in our favorable matters; as we have also appealed to Imperial Majesty's graciousness and to Saxony's graciousness in our favorable matters. Majesty's gracious and manifold request we cannot do otherwise.

(4) But that even through our reported disfavored ones, the Imperial Majesty was moved against us for the sake of the edict, we could not have provided. Majesty against us for the sake of the edict, we would not have provided for it. For Her Majesty has been reminded in the inexplicable, 2) as if six Electors, and thus also our dear brother, Duke Frederick the Blessed, should have considered the Edict, along with other more Princes and Estates, to be the best; for Her Imperial Majesty, along with the other Princes and Estates, should have considered the Edict to be the best. Majesty, together with the other Electors, will be aware of our brother's blessed mind and of the fact that his

1) From here on there is another redaction of this letter in Spalatin's Annals, p. 236 ff., which several times almost literally coincides with this one.

2) That is, reported without just cause.

For the sake of the same edict, as it was intended to be carried out, he has done so, and furthermore has requested Imperial Majesty to be graciously and kindly reminded of it. Majesty to be graciously and kindly remembered, would also be available in case of necessity to this day.

(5) Thus His Imperial Majesty has graciously considered that the matters to which this edict relates are matters concerning God. Majesty graciously consider that, since the matters to which the edict in question applies are matters concerning God, His Word, and our holy faith, we may not be subjected to any special reprimand from our beneficiaries on account of the other Electors. For what concerns Imperial Majesty, Imperial Highness, and the honor, benefit, and welfare of the Holy Roman Empire, according to God:

6th We hope and know for certain that our dear brother, Duke Frederick the Blessed, and we, in particular glory, have promoted the same with the most submissive will, services, mind and our fortune, and have kept ourselves in it, that we, in particular male reduction, know no one in it before to give.

On the other hand, it has never been proper for our brother and us to oppose God the Almighty and His eternal and imperishable Word (in which stands the only consolation of our blessedness). Those who have brought this to the attention of their Imperial Majesty for our disparagement know well themselves how arduous it has been for the Imperial Majesty to hold almost all the imperial congresses after the Imperial Diet in Vienna. Majesty after the Imperial Diet at Worms, the matters were regarded as burdensome because of the edict, and that for this reason a common free Christian council is considered highly necessary, and has been unanimously agreed upon by princes, princes and estates on several occasions. For this reason, our favored ones would have refrained from complaining to their Majesty about the matter with the edict.

(7) Where these things and their origins are to be discussed and disputed, we would, with the help of the Almighty, like to be heard of the submissive, constant, also truthful and irrefutable report, from which Imperial Majesty should graciously note what ungodly and unchristian abuses, both in sermons and otherwise, have occurred in the empire. Majesty should graciously note what ungodly and unchristian abuses, both in sermons and otherwise, have occurred and are occurring in the empire, also from where all erroneous things and divisions have arisen, and are not to be attributed to us.

(8) If God wills, this shall be heard when we, at the Imperial Majesty's Diet now before us, according to Her Majesty's Christian invitation, like other Princes, Princes and Estates, present our opinion and opinion, as we, with the help of the Almighty, the Imperial Highness of the Holy Roman Emperor, have done.

Majesty to obey what is taught in our principality and lands.

(9) And that for the sake of the edict we should now apply to the Imperial Majesty. Majesty, even if we had acted erroneously in these matters in part, as may not be shown, should have been applied for, we would not have presumed, since the imperial decree clearly entails that we are to be granted the right to the right to the right to the right. The Imperial tender brings with it clarification, and the Imperial Majesty desires to have this matter decided. Majesty to act at this Imperial Diet in such a way as may be decided on account of the confusion and discord, so that this may be done all the better and more salutary, to put an end to the discord, to leave behind unwillingness, to surrender past errors to Christ our Saviour, 2c., and to turn diligently to hear, understand and consider all the good thoughts of every one, to bring them to one Christian truth and to compare them, and also to do away with all that is not rightly directed or acted on both sides, 2c. as then the imperial majesty has decided on this in her decree. Majesty graciously knows to remember such of her decree.

Much less has the imperial gracious decree allowed the same claimants to judge the matters, as touched, unheard and unweighed, for itrig, 1) and to complain to her imperial majesty in this way. Majesty in this manner.

(10) When we are also further complained of to the Imperial Majesty. Majesty, as if we should be in agreement with those who have disobeyed and offended Imperial Majesty in this matter. Majesty in this matter have also become disobedient and repugnant, but have entered into an understanding and alliance contrary to Imperial Majesty and the same edict. Majesty and the same edict, and who also, as the head, again maintain: on such too much mild statement of our adversaries our unavoidable necessity requires to give the following notice to Imperial Majesty:

(11) That no man in all the empire may say with truth, or report to the imperial majesty, that our dear brother blessed, and we, have left ourselves to some covenant in the matters of the gospel. Without doubt, to whom more of the states God Almighty has bestowed grace, he will have relied on God alone, and not on any covenant or human comfort.

After we have nevertheless (as we feel from the advertisement) applied to Imperial Majesty about this: our humble request is that Imperial Majesty should let us, together with those who have been complained of with us, speak against the same accusers before Her Majesty. Majesty would have us, together with those who have been complained of with us, to speak against the same accusers before her Majesty, and to have an answer and an interrogation held here.

Your Majesty will again hear our need and reply to the same submission, and graciously find that we have been charged with no blame by Imperial Majesty, as if we had made an alliance against Her Majesty. Majesty, as if I had made an alliance against Her Majesty, that we have been charged with guilt and quite unjustifiably.

(12) For with whom we have left ourselves in friendly and tangible agreement, that is not contrary to Imperial Majesty. Majesty, nor contrary to anyone, but only for the natural and reasonable protection and protection of each and his country, people and relatives, against the violence and injustice that may be done in these matters, contrary to equity and Imperial Majesty's wishes. Majesty's absence, wanted to be carried out. Therefore, this could not have been done by the claimants to Imperial Majesty. Majesty should not have been interpreted to any impropriety against us, but should have been considered, in which way we were bound in obligation, and what strange, also burdensome, threatening speech often sounded in the Empire, by which we, together with the aforementioned our friends and others in s<sup>a</sup>ein friendly and unrepentant understanding, as touched, for protection and salvation alone, until s<sup>a</sup>the matter reached the Imperial Majesty, not unreasonably caused. Where also such pretenders will bring the covenant, so in the meantime and sooner than we and our kinsmen, before Imperial Majesty. Majesty, there shall be no lack of us to make such a presentation, so that His Imperial Majesty may see it, and may not be unreasonable. Majesty to see and note who started it first and gave the other cause for unions).

(13) That we should also leave the preaching in place here, asking the Imperial Majesty most humbly for this, as we also do herewith, we are urged in our conscience to the utmost. 1) For since our preachers preach nothing but the bright truth of God and the Holy Scriptures, as we would not knowingly allow them to do otherwise, it would be frightening to put down God's Word and His truth.

2) So we also, as a man, are of such preaching and proclamation of the divine word, to comfort our conscience and to seek help thereby from God.

1) The preceding passage, which is difficult to understand, reads in Spalatin's Annals, p. 242 f., as follows: "Since even our adversaries will show that alliances have not been made with them before we have united with our friends, we also want to show our necessity in such a way that the Catholic Majesty shall recognize and note which part has raised the first and given the other cause to seek allies. Majesty shall recognize and note which part has raised the first and given the other cause to seek confederates."

In all our troubles, which we and every man daily meet with, to seek him, in all our need, that we may not escape the preaching, if we would have God otherwise before our eyes.

14. 3) To this end, our preachers, after their sermon, daily exhort the people most diligently to pray to God for all the needs of Christendom, and especially that God will grant His Imperial Majesty, as His decreed authority, together with the princes and estates of the Empire, grace in these difficult times to God. Majesty, as His decreed authority, together with the Princes, Princes, and Estates of the Empire, may grant grace to act in these "short runs" for the praise of God, and also for Christian peace and good unity, at this Imperial Diet announced by Her Majesty.

15. 4) They also give a faithful report against the false doctrines that are taught to the people here against the sacraments; for this reason they are burdensome, and for the sake of much improvement, as it is to be hoped to God, harmful, where our preachers should stand still with their preaching. 5) Thus in all ways already and for some years the ambiguous things have been disputed, that now the disputation of it has little to shy away from.

6) Thus it would also be quite burdensome that the preaching of the holy gospel should be omitted for the sake of those who wanted to be unnecessarily angry.

16. 7) And especially because at both imperial congresses at Speier the doctrine of the gospel has been preached most sincerely for us and our friends, also publicly and without any considerable or constant annoyance.

17. 8) For the Imperial Majesty can graciously judge. 8) For Your Majesty can graciously judge that if we and our friends were to stand still with our preaching, it would first of all give many Christian hearts a terrible annoyance, and for Your Majesty's sake be understood to mean that, because Your Majesty's Christian and highly thoughtful invitations and requests for this Imperial Diet have gone out into all the world, how everyone's opinion should be heard and then acted upon for Christian settlement, as if Her Majesty wanted to lay down this doctrine unheard and unacted upon, that Her Majesty no doubt did not want to be told by her, as if Her Majesty's invitation should not be followed.

(18) And if we should advise her Majesty by our relationship, and as we mean her Majesty, out of subservience, to honour and all her Majesty's welfare, we would not know how to advise her Majesty otherwise, than that her Majesty should not by any means neglect the object of her Majesty's tender and bid.

But that in these most important matters, by virtue of which they are to be acted upon in Christian unity and concord, they will be graciously granted: which we have graciously caused the Imperial Majesty to remember, out of good faithful good opinion and in the very best manner. Majesty, out of good faith and in the very best, are humbly compelled to remember; also, in consideration of all these matters, circumstances and occasions, hold it that if it is advised to Her Majesty by someone else, it may not be beneficial to Her Majesty, the Empire and all Christendom, nor may it be meant for the best. And is therefore addressed to the Imperial. Majesty, our most gracious Lord, our most humble request, that he may understand such our necessary and most humble notification, also that we may not commit ourselves nor be heard otherwise than as stated above, not ungraciously, and be our most gracious Lord and Emperor, as we humbly promise ourselves:

(19) Thus, with the help of the Almighty, we wish to remain faithful to the end of our lives to Imperial Majesty as our ordered authority. Majesty, as our authorities decreed by God, in guilty, reasonable, and entirely willing submission and obedience, and then in matters which it is our duty to act with and beside our friends, the Princes, also Princes and Estates of the Empire, for the honor, benefit, and welfare of the same Empire, in such a way as we hope to answer for it to God and subsequently to the Imperial Majesty, also to the said Estates and men. Majesty, and also to the said estates and males, as we hope to answer for the same.

(20) As for the other and remaining articles, we hope that Your Imperial Majesty will, with your gracious consideration, not seek to have anyone complain of a fugue. Majesty, with your gracious consideration, that we do not seek anything that anyone might have a complaint with the fugue, graciously and finally agree to the same, and thus show ourselves in mercy towards us.

(21) We are obliged to do this with our unsaved bodies and goods for the sake of Your Imperial Majesty as our most gracious Lord and Emperor. Majesty, as our most gracious Lord and Emperor, in all subservience.

(22) And it is our friendly and gracious request to both of you Counts in general and in particular, that you, according to the gracious command of Our Lord, bring and let reach Her Majesty this our humble and necessary answer, with the best glimpses and fugue that you know how to do by the grace of the Almighty, which we are also inclined to owe you in friendship, grace, and all good. Given at Augsburg, sealed under our imprinted secret, on the last day of May Anno Domini 2c. 1530.

of God John, Duke of Saxony and Elector 2c.

To the venerable, highly learned, our dear devotee, Mr. Martino Luther, Doctor, to hand.

(1) Our greeting beforehand, venerable and reverend, dear devotee! We have received your next letter, and the Christian exhortation and consolation that you have given us with it, which you have graciously understood, should also, if God wills, be highly comforting to us in these important actions, by the grace of the Almighty.

(2) And we cannot conceal from you that Imperial Majesty has issued an Instruction to us. Majesty has issued an instruction to us here, in which we have almost been highly praised by her Majesty's edict, as well as for several other things. Thus it has also been requested of us (albeit mildly) that we should leave it with the preaching here until such time as Her Imperial Majesty would come here and put things in order.

(3) But we have again answered her majesty, and her majesty is graciously pleased to hear that we cannot consent to these things as they are intended for us. But what will happen further on, we will hear, God willing.

(4) Thus it is said that His Imperial Majesty has set out from Jnsbruck. Majesty has left Jnsbruck, is heading for Munich, and will come here from there after Pentecost. We did not want to let this go unreported to you, and we are graciously inclined to you. Date Augsburg on the first of June, Anno 1530.

Short Directory of both Roman Imperial and Royal Majesties in Hungary and Bohemia r. Train from Insbruck to ge" Augsburg

Anno 1530.

Both Queens, Maria and Anna 2c. together with their children, have this time remained at Insbruck, and both, the Imperial and Royal Majesty 2c., left Insbruck on Monday, the sixth day of June, and all the courtiers (who do not have to wait for the bodies of both Majesties), for the reason that neither sufficient provisions nor lodgings could be obtained on one road, have been reduced to two rooms, one of which is in the town of Insbruck.

The two imperial and royal majesties have been ordered to ride on the roads to Augsburg, and they have ridden towards Munich and further on to Augsburg, as subsequently touched.

(2) The first, that is the sixth day of June, from Insbruck to Schwatz; (1) there the ore miners marched against 5000 men within half a mile, on a high heath or wide open space, with their long spears, halberds, battle swords, hand pipes, and quite a bit of field artillery, according to Landknecht's usage and manner, and formed themselves into two groups against each other (for this reason there were 70 men in one group) in battle order, about 300 paces from each other, and the field artillery was placed on a central hill. Likewise, on one side a troop of 15 or 1600 boys, with shafts half a spear long, was ordered to fall in behind as soon as the two troops attacked and made a mirror fencing. Afterwards, the reported squires and knaves returned to the village of Schwatz in order.

(3) There, Imperial as well as Royal Majesty (but of the same time as Archduke of Austria) is honestly received in the same first arrival by the mountain lords. Majesty (but of the same time as Archduke of Austria) is honestly received in the same first arrival by the mountain lords, as befits, and with a silver penny, in it in the middle the Roman eagle and on the outside all around Imperial Majesty of all kingdoms and countries coat of arms. Majesty of all kingdoms and countries coat of arms, and on the other side (as indicated to me) imperial. Majesty's title, 1700 florins in value; which penny Imperial Majesty (as well to be expected) has been honoured. Majesty (as well to be remembered) with special pleasure.

and graces, then went to the hostel, and in the morning of the 7th day of June inspected the mine from all sides; from there he rode with His Royal Majesty on the water as far as Kopfstein [Kufstein], and in the morning of the eighth day early Duke Ludwig of Bavaria 2c. posted there about four of them to the Imperial Majesty and rode with His Majesty as far as Rosenheim, a small town belonging to the Princes of Bavaria. Majesty, and rode with his Majesty as far as Rosenheim, a small town belonging to the Princes of Bavaria, where Duke Wilhelm (Duke Ludwig's elder brother) also came to the Imperial Majesty.

4th The same, also the 9th and 10th day, up to Munich, on the way by the dukes Wilhelm and Ludwig such a wandering hunt as one has only seen, was held in honor of the imperial majesty; of which there were three, and the first hunt between Kopfstein and Rosenheim, the other in the middle of the way Rosenheim and Ebersburg. The first hunt was between Kopfstein and Rosenheim, the second hunt in the middle of the way between Rosenheim and Ebersburg, at which place a monastery, where her Majesty camped for the night, and afterwards between Ebersburg and Munich, the third hunt. And there have been seen several times three, four, or five hundred pieces of game, roebucks, and stags.

Entry of the Roman Imperial and Royal Majesty into Hungary re. at Munich, Friday in Whitsun Week. Anno 1530.

(1) When both Majesties arrived on the said tenth day half a mile from the city of Munich, the nobility of Upper and Lower Bavaria, belonging to both Princes, together with the same courtiers, almost well armed with hammers and spears, also with beautiful plumes, and Duke Wilhelm's army timpani and trumpets, and also many other nobles, merchants, citizens, and country folk on horseback and on foot, as follows.

First of all, from the gun.

(2) The aforementioned princes had their main and field guns brought to a place outside Munich, on a quarter-mile road, arranged in an almost proper order, of which there were about a hundred, on wheels, namely whole and half carbines, half serpents, falconets, and mortars. Also a wooden rifle, which was taken from the peasants in the monastery of Salzburg in their war, about 18 shoes long, all bound over with iron rings, and which threw a stone as large as a common snake. Above this two fire rifles, and three specially prepared wagons with hailstones.

Ricey stuff and foot soldiers.

(3) Beside the cannon, the cavalry and the footmen were ordered and arranged. Namely, 550 well-equipped horses, among them about 300 horses with good armor, absolutely bright armor, armor and knee caps, plus forehead on the horse, and generally well-mounted, the spears painted black and white, with black fringes. The main colour of the clothing, long pale skirts, which almost disguised the appearance of the armour.

4th Mr. Wolf Dietrich von Knöring, knight, was in charge of the troops, and made an order of battle, drew everything together into a heap, and led it away beside the infantry.

(5) The infantry stood in two bands, a lost band and a main band, generally well armed with armor and clothing, numbering 1600.

6th And when both majesties together with other princes, ecclesiastical and secular, namely: Cardinal Campegius, papal legate to royal majesty 2c. 2c.; Cardinal of Salzburg, Liège and Trent; Bishop of Malten, Passau, Brixen 2c.; Count Palatine Friedrich; both Dukes Wilhelm and Ludwig of Bavaria; Counts Palatine Otto Heinrich and Philipp; Margrave Hans Albrecht and Wilhelm of Brandenburg, also several kings, princes and potentates, ambassadors and other princes, imperial majesty and courtiers. Court servants have come to the city of Munich, has been built in front of the gun in the open space and field on twelve cubits long and wide, foursquare with four towers, like a castle, and around it for the run-up with several servants and hand guns occupied, with a stretched out ensign, almost masterly decorated.

007 Which the servants, out of the orderly bands of the footmen, ran at several times, as if to storm, with a shout of the enemy. Some of the garrison fell out, skirmishing and shooting against each other, and so they kept up an apparent order of war.

8th Subsequently both majesties moved to the heap and moved towards it in good order, and made two turns, and the hail gun just went off.

9th Thereupon both majesties moved to the ordnance, and inspected the same in its order, but the cavalry and footmen again set out for the city in the most graceful order.

010 And when their majesties come to the end of the gun, they are gone out of the wind.

and let the same go off one after the other, and such gun was all directed to the forewarned castle, into which many shots were fired, and thus the same was felled.

(11) There have also been some good fires shot and thrown out of the rifles and mortars or firecrackers.

held pattern, as touched before.

12th When the things were done as indicated, both majesties turned to the city and entered, and in the middle of the way there was a flying dragon in the air almost really judged, which hovered in the air so long until the procession passed.

13th Further, when their Majesties arrived from the bridge over the Jizera, near the city, there were also some small canoes or barges, on which some fishermen dressed in blue and white linen trousers and worms, poked at a coloured barrel, which in the middle of the water flowed strongly against a pillar, and partly fell into the water; it was very handsome. And when one came over the bridge, one shot joy on the towers and walls, as usual custom.

Riding in imperial and royal majesty persons.

14th Imperial Majesty, in this entry into the city, has kept King Ferdinand of Hungary and Bohemia, her brother, on the right, and the Papal Legate, Cardinal Campegius, on the left. Cardinal Campegius, on the left side, and drew Imperial Majesty in the middle. Majesty in the middle. The clothing was a tabard divided with gold and black velvet strokes, the head covered with a black summer hat; Royal Majesty of Hungary and Bohemia 2c. dressed in a gold tabard with silver cloth underneath, and cut over it, somewhat more delicious and apparent than Imperial Majesty. Majesty had been dressed. Cardinal Campegius went in his usual costume, a red scarlet, and had the cross presented to him.

long, on each an imperial crown, have been paraded, also the guardians of honor have ridden in their paludaments 2) into the city, was performed on a stage, so lovely, artificial, and well-ordered, that it astonished everybody, and would not have been well possible to improve, about two hundred paces from the gate, on the right hand the history of Esther, and after that about two hundred paces, also called in the valley, on the left hand the history of Thameri [10m^ri8], who thrusts King Cyro's severed head into a tub of blood. And thirdly, in the castle gafse, the story Cambysis Persä, so to flay an unjust judge verschuf. All of living marvellous farces, held in honour of the imperial majesty. And on the square also a castle of linen and woodwork with several hundred key shots made and lit, and so in general the bonfire done there.

(17) After all these things, both majesties rode to Duke William's fortress, as to their lodging. On the eleventh day, however, the princes held a hunt. On the 12th day, the Imperial and Royal Majesties, together with all the Princes, rode to Our Lady's Church, and in the evening a princely banquet was held in the Duke's pleasure garden, called the Rose Garden. After this, the Imperial and Royal Majesties and all the Princes rode to the Town Hall to dance: the Imperial Majesty danced the first dance with Duke Wilhelm's wife, after which they danced for two hours in the night, and everyone rode back to the inn. On Monday, the thirteenth day, the Imperial and Royal Majesties and several princes hunted all day. On the fourteenth day, the Imperial and Royal Majesty went to Fürstenfeld to the monastery, and the other courtiers to Bruck, three miles from Munich, and in the morning of the fifteenth day rode toward Augsburg, as follows.

III.

The entry of the Roman Imperial Majesty, our most gracious Lord, into Augsburg has taken place, as follows.

(1) On Wednesday, the fifteenth day of June, at an early hour of the day, about 4 o'clock, the Councils of the Electors met in the Town Hall of Augsburg, and after that, at the fifth hour, the Electors, namely Cologne, Saxony, and Brandenburg, came in person to the Town Hall. After that, at the sixth hour, all the other princes, ecclesiastical and secular, also met in the council chamber. And when the said princes and princes and their counsellors were in one room, some imperial counsellors (namely the bishop of Speier, Margrave Hans Albrecht of Brandenburg, and Count Wolf of Montfort) appeared before the said princes and princes with an imperial credentials and commission, and gave their order; and after the same the imperial counsellors and "commissioners" went from the town hall to their lodgings, and soon after rode out to meet the imperial majesty in a village called Kissingen, a mile from Augsburg. Majesty to a village called Kissingen, a mile from Augsburg, in which village the Imperial Majesty ate lunch and prepared to ride to Augsburg the same day, as was done. But after the aforementioned imperial councillors came from the town hall, the electors and princes remained in the town hall until the eleventh hour, conferring with one another to ride out to meet the Roman imperial majesty. At about three o'clock, in addition to the city of Augsburg, the Electors of Mainz, Cologne, Saxony, Brandenburg, and of the other two Electors (Trier and Palatinate), appointed and excellent councillors, as well as all other ecclesiastical and secular princes who had been in Augsburg before the arrival of the Imperial Majesty. Majesty at Augsburg, with all their court servants, almost honestly up to a bridge to meet Imperial Majesty. Majesty, with the exception of the Cardinal of Liège and the Bishop of Eichstädt, who, due to age and weakness, did not appear. Also the bishop of Augsburg, who went to meet the imperial majesty in the city with the whole priesthood in procession, and waited as princes and princes at two hours of the imperial majesty until the same had arrived. Majesty, until the same, with the Royal Majesty of Hungary and Bohemia 2c. and several ecclesiastical and secular princes, namely, two Cardinals, Salzburg and Trent; Archbishop of Bremen, Bishop of Passau, Bishop of Brixen; Duke Frederick, Count Palatine; Duke William and Ludewig, brothers, of Bavaria, Count Palatines; Duke Otto Henry and Philip, Count Palatines, and many other princes more, great and powerful lords, Germans, Welsh and Spaniards, all most daintily dressed and lovely to see, rode before Imperial Majesty. Majesty.

(2) And when the Imperial Majesty, and besides their Majesty the Royal Majesty of Hungary and Bohemia. Majesty of Hungary and Bohemia, also both Majesties' Honourables and Persevents, five (who rode before them), joined the Electors and Princes (who had previously stood on foot) safely at the fifty to sixty paces.

and because the princes and princes went against the K. Majesty, she and her Majesty's brother immediately left the horses. Brother from the horses. The princes and princes (who were waiting for their Majesty to receive them) wanted to prevent their Majesty from dismounting, and hurriedly ran to their Majesty, but their Majesty was too nimble to dismount on foot. So the K. Maj. first, and then the royal Maj. Maj. shook hands with the Electors and Princes, and showed themselves to each other with quite cheerful and lovely faces. Immediately the Cardinal and Archbishop of Mainz, as Archchancellor and Prince of the Roman Empire through Germania, received the Royal Majesty on behalf of all other princes and princes with a dainty and brave speech, thus with such words or the like:

ption of Imperial Majesty. Majesty, which the Cardinal of Mainz did.

Most Sublime, Most Great, Most Invincible, Most Gracious Lord! My brothers, friends and superiors, princes, prelates, counts and other estates of the realm and the same embassies, present, and I, who have obediently appeared at Your Imperial Majesty's invitation and request at the Imperial Diet held in Augsburg. Maj. and request to the Imperial Diet held at Augsburg, are present to Your Imperial Majesty, as the most gracious Lord of our blessed arrival in the Holy Roman Empire, do hereby most humbly receive the same, and wish Your Majesty much happiness for the height and dignity of the Imperial coronation received, and a long, peaceful and blessed reign, in the submissive comforting hope that all this shall and will, by means of divine help, benefit Your Majesty, to the highest honour, praise and welfare of common Christendom and the German nation; with the humble offer that we, as the required members of the Holy Roman Empire, will help, advise and act in the most faithful way at the Imperial Diet that may first of all bring honour, benefit and good to God Almighty, to Your Majesty, to common Christendom and to the German nation, and thus we entrust ourselves to Your Majesty as our most gracious Lord.

(3) To this His Majesty answered through Count Palatine Frederick and expressed his thanks. Afterwards princes, princes and their counsellors and courtiers all sat on the horses, and first of all the prince of Saxony, the count Palatine Ludwig, prince, margrave Joachim, prince, arch-bishop of Trier, Cologne, Mainz, duke Wilhelm and Ludwig of Bavaria (who were invaded by force before Margrave George 2c.), Duke Henry of Brunswick, Margrave George of Brandenburg, and other princes' court servants. After them many counts, lords, and of nobility, K. and con. Majest. Councils, also several Spanish Princes and Counts, all belonging to Imperial and Royal Majesties. Majesties, several Counts and Lords of the Realm, who rode in honour of the Imperial Majesty. Majesty in honor. Afterwards of the Imperial and Royal Majesties Majesties noble boys, on the most beautiful stallions, geldings 1) and Turkish horses, so often seen together. After which K. and royal. Majest. Trumpeters, so with and beside each other ridden and blown, together with a German army timpanist and three drum beaters, K. and kön. Majesty. Thereupon followed three imperial and two royal guard of honour and persevants. They were succeeded by both Majesties' highest court masters, as the Count of Crop, the Count of Rops, and Lord Wilhelm, Baron of Rogendorf 2c., and all secular princes. Last of all, Duke John of Saxony, Churfürst, as Archmarshall in the middle with the bare sword, and on the right side Margrave Joachim, and on the left Count Palatine Louis, Churfürsten, Ambassador, a Baron of Erbach, called Schenk Veltin, before kais. Majesty. And behind him is the Royal Majesty of Hungary and Bohemia. Majest. of Hungary and Bohemia 2c. and all other ecclesiastical Churfürsten, Cardinals, Archbishops and Bishops, touched above, rode; and beside, behind and before kais. Majest. have gone a hundred German, a hundred Dutch, a hundred Spanish satellites, belonging to kais. Majesty. Likewise royal majesty 2c. one hundred German and Bohemian, also of other electors and princes many satellites; and after the above-mentioned ecclesiastical electors and princes 2c. one hundred imperial majesty equipped hatchets rode. Majesty, and then the Royal Majesty of Hungary and Bohemia, with a thousand horses.

4th And when the Imperial Majesty came near to the city, first of all the mayors and the council of Augsburg fell to the Imperial Majesty on foot for the third time, and received them as was due, and so went on foot beside the Imperial Majesty into the city. Majesty on foot for the third time, and received them as befitted, and thus went on foot beside the Imperial Majesty into the city. When this reception took place and they moved a little further away, on one side there were about 1500 well-equipped horses, of citizens, merchants and Purschen, quite merry to see, with beautiful clothes, feathers and ornaments, and next to them four squadrons of foot soldiers, also all the citizens, merchants and inhabitants of the city over 2000 very bravely and well dressed in silk and silk of the imperial family.

1) "Genetter" (Italian Zinsto) - light horse.

Most of them dressed, together with their armour, of which each had almost one, held in a quartered order of battle; and in front of them, so far that Imperial Majesty and the whole troop might move between the foot soldiers and the cannon, stood twelve falconets. Majesty and the whole troop might move between the aforementioned foot soldiers and the cannon, there stood twelve falconets, all of which were fired at a screen in the presence of Imperial Majesty. Majesty on a screen. Prior to this procession, however, a thousand lansquenets, belonging to His Imperial Majesty, were drafted, and the procession of His Imperial Majesty continued until night. Majesty's entry was delayed till night. And when imperial. Majesty came near the city gate, Cardinal Campegius, papal legate, stopped in a pleasure house, and wanted to ride in beside Imperial Majesty. Majesty; however, the princes and rulers did not want to permit it under any circumstances, neither with the said Cardinal, nor with the Royal Majesty or any other prince, but wanted the Imperial Majesty to ride free alone. Majesty to ride free alone. And when they came under the gate of the city, four of the council carried a beautiful sky, under which his Majesty rode further than the middle of the city; there the Bishop of Augsburg, together with all the priesthood, as reported above, went to meet her with the procession and the sky, and imperial Majesty the Pope went to meet her. Majesty. Reverence. Thus is Imperial Maj. Maj. rode under the same sky, which was carried by some of the six canons, to the cathedral church, there he descended together with the royal Majesty, ecclesiastical and secular princes, princes 2c., and entered the church; there his Majesty, the said Bishop of Augsburg, consecrated him, and read the Psalm Exaudi 2c. together with several prayers and collects; finally, by the imperial Majesty, the bishop of Augsburg, the bishop of Augsburg, the bishop of Augsburg, read the Psalm Exaudi 2c. Majest. Capellan the De vsuna lauäaiQU8 was sung, and thereupon in the Palatinate the Emperor entered his court. Maj. went to his court, and soon the Royal Majesty together with the Princes and Princes also went to their hostel.

(5) But how and what Imperial Majesty, also Princes, ecclesiastical and secular. Majesty, also Princes, Princes, ecclesiastical and secular, together with the same court servants, dressed with gold and silver cloths, pearl ornaments, velvet, silk, feathers and all ornaments, is not to be described, because all this was an unbelievable abundance.

On Thursday, June 16, that is, on the day of Our Lord's Feast of Corpus Christi, Imperial and Royal Majesty together with all the princes and princes, ecclesiastical and secular (without the Elector of Saxony, Margrave George of Brandenburg, Duke of Lüneburg, and Landgrave of Hesse) went with the procession. The Cardinal of Mainz carried the Sacrament under heaven; next to it, on his right hand, was the royal crown.

Majest. and to the left Margrave Joachim 2c. gone, and kaiserl. Majest. is behind them outside the sky (first on one side Duke Ludwig of Bavaria, Elector of Brandenburg's son, and Duke George of Pomerania, and on the left Count Palatine Philip, Duke Henry of Brunswick, and Duke of Mecklenburg, carried as far as the chapel on Verlach, after which the said princes changed, and other six princes carried as far as the Holy Cross, and there again other princes carried as far as the cathedral) with bare head and a burning light; then all ecclesiastical princes, cardinal, archbishop and bishops, and before the sacrament all secular princes, before them both Majest. court masters, honorary guardians, perseverants, trumpeters, army timpanists, and in front the priesthood, and imperial and royal majesty's court servants, from counts to bishops. Court servants, Counts and Lords, with lighted lanterns.

From the 16th day until the 20th, nothing special was done. But on Monday, the 20th day, the Emperor began to act in the Diet, as follows:

(8) First of all, the Cardinal of Mainz has an office äs spiritu sanoto, the Imperial. Majest. Capellan responded, sang in Our Lady's Church on the high altar, and both sides of the choir were hung with almost exquisite golden cloths and tapestries. First of all, the Imperial Majesty, the Holy Roman Emperor, the Holy Roman Emperor, the Holy Roman Emperor. Majesty, next to it royal. Majesty, then the Archbishop of Cologne, Elector of Saxony, Elector of Brandenburg, the Trier Embassy, Count Palatine Ludwig's, Elector, Embassy, Duke Wilhelm of Bavaria, Duke George of Saxony, Duke Ludwig of Bavaria, Margrave George of Brandenburg, Count Palatine Otto Heinrich, Duke Heinrich of Brunswick, Count Palatine Philip, Duke Albrecht of Mecklenburg, Duke George of Pomerania, Duke Barnim 1) of Pomerania, Electors of Saxony, Electors of Brandenburg, Duke George of Saxony's son, Duke of Lüneburg, and the Landgrave of Hesse, and several others have not been able to stand, have been on the Porkirche.

9th On the left side of the choir stood the Papal Legate, Cardinal Campegius, Cardinal of Trent, in place of an Archduke of Austria, Cardinal of Salzburg, Archbishop of Bremen, Grand Master of the Teutonic Order, and

1) "Barnim" put by us instead of: "Bernhard". - All those named up to now have stood in the church (see Förstemann's Urkundenbuch, Vol. I, p. 292); whether the register of those "who may not have stood" already starts here is doubtful to us because of the mention of "Duke Georgen of Saxony's son".

Administrator of the office of Grand Master, Bishop of Würzburg, Eichstädt, Speier, and other bishops. And in the midst of the choir some booths were opened, therein stood the king of France, Angelland, and other embassies.

(10) Before the offertory, the archbishop of Rossano made a beautiful oration, recounting all the tyrannies of the Turks that they had committed up to that time, and especially during the past year in Austria, and that the Germans, in whose power all the welfare, happiness, and salvation of the whole of Christendom were, were so very sleepy, negligent, and even divided among themselves, and how difficult it would be for them to be responsible for this 2c. This speech has lingered longer than an hour.

(11) After the offertory had been sung, the Imperial Majesty and all the ecclesiastical and secular princes, cardinals, archbishops, 2c. Majesty and all ecclesiastical and secular Electors, Cardinals, Archbishops 2c. went to sacrifice; and after completion of the Office of the Mass all rode to the Town Hall, and the Elector of Saxony presented the bare sword (which under the Office of the Mass the Hereditary Marshal of Pappenheim constantly held) to the Imperial Majesty. Majesty. And when now the Imperial and Royal Majesties, together with the Princes and Princes, came to the Town Hall, and each, as is proper and old custom, was in his session, without the Royal Majesty, about ten paces from and against the Imperial Majesty, on a special platform. Majesty, sat on a special three-tier high chair, covered with gold cloth, as a King of Hungary.

12: Firstly, by order of Imperial Majesty Majesty. Count Palatine Frederick 2c. began to speak orally about this opinion, and told how the Roman Imperial Majesty was initially elected unanimously by all the princes, crowned at Aachen, and later described an Imperial Diet at Worms. There, his Majesty did everything possible to bring about peace, unity, and acceptance of the Holy Roman Empire, as much as was possible in a hurry. Since, however, the same Roman Imperial Majesty could no longer remain in the German nation due to noticeable high wars and other causes, so that his Majesty was challenged, and immediately (but with all princes, princes, 2c. and foreknowledge) to their Hispanic hereditary kingdoms and lands, in the hope of bringing them, together with the whole of Italy, into peace and tranquillity, and then to return to the Holy Roman Empire, and in the meantime the Royal Majesty of Hungary and Bohemia, his Imperial Majesty's dear brother, as a state. Majesty's dear brother, as governors, also councillors and regents, who have all full power (all that sprouts for the good of the Holy Roman Empire).

may) had to act, and in that case his Majesty reserved to him little power, left behind his Majesty, the gracious hope to give the same to his Imperial Majesty. Majest. His Majesty's governors and regiment have acted in his absence in such a way that everyone should not bear any burden, although his Majesty was by no means in the mood to be out of the Holy Empire for so long a year. Rather, when it appeared credible to his Majesty on a daily basis what great error, displeasure and dissension had grown up in the Holy Roman Empire without ceasing, he considered without hesitation, out of his innate imperial mild love and inclination, which his Majesty had always borne to the Holy Roman Empire, and with God's help found ways for his Majesty to cross the sea, with great danger, from the Holy Roman Empire to the Holy Roman Empire, and with God's help found ways for his Majesty to cross the sea, with great danger, from the Holy Roman Empire to the Holy Roman Empire, and with God's help found ways for his Majesty to cross the Holy Roman Empire to the Holy Roman Empire. has come with great danger over the sea, from his dearest wife and children, through the Italian countries (which were mostly hostile at that time, but brought them to peace, tranquility and unity) and again into the holy empire, and has indeed announced an imperial diet, but for the above-mentioned reasons has not been able to appear sooner. Therefore, graciously trust, Princes, Princes and Estates of the Holy Roman Empire do not want to have any displeasure or complaint because of this. And since His Majesty sees that the Princes, Princes, and Estates, and their absent embassies, have gathered in such valiant numbers at the request of their Imperial Majesty, he will not be displeased or complained of. Majesty's request, thus show obedience, therefore bear his Majesty's high and gracious favor, undoubted hope, his Majesty. together with the affected Princes, Princes and Estates, will act so bravely, earnestly and beneficially in praise of God Almighty, with the help and comfort of all common Christendom, and especially for the benefit, welfare and uplift of the German nation, and for the resistance of the Turks, that the Turks will be broken off by force, and all peace, unity and praiseworthy order in the Holy Roman Empire will be flushed away 2c.

(13) After these and similar words, the above-mentioned Count Palatine Frederick said that the Electors, Princes, and Estates would continue to accept this and other opinions, for which reason Imperial Majesty proclaimed this Imperial Diet. Majesty had announced this Imperial Diet, would continue to take it according to its length (as written). Thereupon Imperial. Majesty's Secretary, Alexander Schweiß, began to read the lecture; as I have described word for word in another booklet of my own. But the summary content of this is the first article because of the Turkish invasion; the other is what complaints the secular authorities have against the clergy, and again the clergy against the secular, should be made.

Both parties, ecclesiastical and secular, to compose such in Latin and German writings, and to submit them to the attention of the Emperor. Therein Imperial Majesty Majesty seek a gracious, divine, honest, and inexpensive means 2c. The third article is to reject all kinds of concerns, shortages, and discord throughout the Roman Empire, and to consider what is useful for the welfare and better order.

14th After such reading the Electors and Princes stood up and talked with each other for a little while; then Margrave Joachim, Elector, in the place of all the Electors and Princes, first answered for the oral presentation made by Count Palatine Frederick, and thanked His Imperial Majesty for his gracious arrival. Maj.'s gracious arrival, and that the Electors and Princes were most pleased with such arrival 2c. Further to the written presentation, the Electors, Princes, and Estates ask Imperial Majesty in all submissiveness to grant them the right of audience. Majesty in all submission, that the same should send them the aforementioned submission, then they will have it copied, take it in hand, deliberate on it, and thus decide everything possible, on which their Imperial Majesty's gracious favor. Majesty's gracious favor. Palgrave Frederick has again answered this by order of Imperial Majesty, and has granted the read writings to be copied by princes, princes and estates. Thereupon the hereditary marshal of Pappenheim said aloud that the princes, princes and estates should each send a scribe to the town hall at three o'clock and have the lecture copied, which had been read out by the Secretarium of Mainz. After all this, the Imperial Majesty has risen. Majesty arose, and all the Princes, Princes, and with the Imperial Majesty rode home to the Court. Majesty rode home to court, which was nearly one o'clock.

From that day until the 24th of June nothing has been reported here. But on the aforementioned June 24 at three o'clock the Imperial and Royal Majesty together with all the Princes, Princes and Estates appeared at the Town Hall; some Princes and Princes had been at the Town Hall long before, but some rode to the Imperial Majesty and accompanied him there. Majesty and have accompanied them thereon. When all these had talked for a little while with and among themselves, Cardinal Campegius, Papal Legate 2c. Legate 2c. also arrived, to whom the Imperial Majesty together with the Royal Majesty arrived. Majesty together with the Royal Majesty and all the Princes and Princes went to meet him at the steps, and led him forward. After that, the Imperial Majesty Majesty, and all the Princes, each to his own session, and the said Cardinal, as previously announced, sat on the chair, whereon, on the 20th of June, the Royal Majesty of and against kaiserl. Majest. sat, and royal Majest. sat this time as a king of Bohemia below that of Mainz.

(16) Now, when Imperial Majesty and all (to whom it is due) were seated Majesty and all (to whom it is due) were seated, the said Cardinal presented his advertisement and order of papal authority in Latin, and, according to the usual old custom, issued to the first Imperial Majesty a letter of credence from the papal authority. Majesty a letter of credence from Papal Holiness. His Majesty gave the letter to the one from Mainz, and then the one from Mainz to his secretary, to read it out; and after reading it out, he, the legate, spent more than half an hour perorating the imperial majesty, the electors and the princes of Mainz. Majesty, princes and chieftains, as members of the Roman Church, that they should not turn away from it, but keep to the old custom and resist the infidels. Holiness, as a governor of Peter and servant of the servants of God 2c., will be helpful in all this, as much as is in his power and ability 2c., and after the speech he, the Cardinal, rode home again. Immediately there came forth Mr. Nicolaus, Count of Salm 2c., Mr. Wilhelm of Rogendorf, Mr. Hans of Lannberg, Mr. Wolfgang Volkra, Mr. Wilhelm of Zelting, Mr. Watzlau of Hofkirchen 2c. on account of the land of Austria under the Ens. item, Mr. Siegmund of Dietrichstein, Mr. Erhard of Polheim, Mr. Laßla Rottenstorfer, Mr. Asmus of Trautmannsdorf on account of the principality of Steyer. Item, Mr. Balthasar Thanhauser, Mr. Moritz Welzer, Georg von Neuhaus on account of the Principality of Carinthia. Item, Mr. Georg von Aursperg, Mr. Siegmund von Weixelburg, Knight, on account of the Principality of Carniola. Item, Count Julius von Hardeck, Johann Fernberger 2c. on account of the land above the Ens. Item, Hans Hofer, Captain at Tübin, on account of the County of Görtz, as appointed Commissaries and Ambassadors to Imperial Majesty. Majest. Electors, Princes and Estates of the Holy Roman Empire, of all the lands of Lower Austria.

(17) So first of all the said Lord Siegmund of Dietrichstein has orally delivered a dainty and serious speech (to Imperial Majesty the Prince and Estates), Prince, Princes and Estates), with an account of all the evils and cruel acts which the Turk has inflicted on the whole of common Christendom, in very few years and in the memory of men, and especially in the 29th year, in Austria and Styria, and how they, the lands of Lower Austria, have hitherto resisted more than they could possibly have done. So that they are now for not be able to resist a military attack, let alone such a force. Therefore to Imperial Majesty Majesty as a gracious Christian emperor, sovereign and head of all Christendom, and also to princes, rulers and estates, that they will heed their supreme, unspeakable desire to destroy their wives, children, bodies, honour and goods, and to show themselves with a considerable, brave, persevering, emphatic help against the enemy of all Christendom 2c. And since it would not be possible to announce all this verbally, they ask their Imperial Majesty, also the Electors, to send them a message. Majesty, also Princes, Princes and Estates, that they will (without complaint and annoyance) hear their highest request, as it is written, most graciously, graciously and kindly.

(18) After such a speech, which took place with somewhat more content, von Dietrichstein immediately handed over the aforementioned document, a whole libell, to the Imperial Majesty. Majesty, and the Imperial Majesty has handed it over to the Majesty sent it to the von Mainz, and the latter to his secretary, to be read out, as then happened. After the reading, which was almost piteous, pitiful, and serious to hear, the said embassies, in place of Imperial Majesty the Elector of Mainz, have been delivered to the Emperor of Mainz. Majesty, Princes and Princes, answered this opinion without difficulty: they have listened to their oral and written presentation and advertisement, and wanted to act on everything that a most gracious Christian Emperor, together with the same Princes and Princes, would consider godly, honest, mean, useful and fair 2c.

(19) When the embassies or envoys of the imperial majesty, princes, and princes gave thanks and resigned, the Elector of Saxony, Margrave George of Brandenburg, both Dukes of Lüneburg, and Landgrave of Hesse, from their session on and against the imperial majesty, have now stood up for and against the imperial majesty. Majesty. Then the Chancellor of the Elector of Saxony spoke approximately on such opinion: that his most gracious and gracious lords, Electors and Princes at present, without doubt manifold against Imperial Majesty, Electors and Princes. Majesty, Princes, Princes, and Estates of the Holy Roman Empire?) as if they had dared to raise new unheard-of sects, heresies, and errors in the Holy Empire of the German Nation in a somewhat unchristian manner, and were a cause of this. Therefore they ask their imperial majesty in all submission, princes and rulers, friendly and neighborly Opinion, they want to listen and hear at length and without annoyance, what his most gracious and gracious lords, Mr. Johann, Duke of Saxony, Archmarshall and Elector of the Holy Roman Empire, Mr. Georg, Margrave of Brandenburg, Mr. Ernst and Mr. Franz, Dukes of Lüneburg, brothers, Mr. Philipp, Landgrave of Hesse 2c, have preached in their principalities and lands everywhere, and what all the articles of their faith contain 2c.

(20) According to these and other speeches of the. Chancellor, as an almost well-reputed, brave and respectable man, speeches, Royal Majesty, Electors and Princes have gone to Imperial Majesty. Majesty, and through N. answered the above-mentioned Princes and Princes and said: Imperial Majesty desired to have the same speeches made by him. Majesty requested that the same articles of their faith and church customs be sent to His Majesty in writing, which His Imperial Majesty would like to receive with the same authority. Majesty will review them with the same council and then give a gracious answer. Thereupon the aforesaid Chancellor of the Elector, by command and in the place of the Elector and the Princes, has again subjected the Imperial Majesty to the laws of the Holy Roman Empire. Majesty again humbly requested that His Majesty hear this publicly. Thereupon Imperial. Majesty again conferred with the Royal Majesty, Princes and Princes and had them say and indicate through N. that the Imperial Majesty, for their gracious favor, would have it publicly read out the next [day], that is June 25, in Her Majesty's Court, in the presence of the Princes and Princes. They have again humbly requested the Imperial Majesty, since his Imperial Majesty does not wish to hear such articles of their faith and church customs this time, that his Imperial Majesty leave the same writings in the hands of his most gracious and gracious lords for reasons (that there may be an etching or other deficiency in them), which they want to earn for the sake of his Imperial Majesty in all humbliness, and in addition, at his Imperial Majesty's request, to read the other writings. Majesty's request, they will appear the next day as the obedient ones. Thus has His Imperial Majesty Majesty again held council with princes and rulers, and finally granted that they, the Elector of Saxony and his followers, might keep the writings in their hands. Thereupon they have expressed their humble thanks to Imperial Majesty. Thereupon Imperial. Majesty rode home in the same court, and several princes and princes with him.

21st On the 25th of June, at three o'clock past noon, by Imperial Majesty's request, the Royal Majesty, Princes and Princes appeared in the same court at the Palatinate, likewise the Elector of Saxony, together with the four princes above, with their written presentation, read out at length in the presence of Imperial Majesty, Elector, and princes. Majesty, the Elector, and the Princes, and therein their entire faith, with the introduction of the Holy Scriptures, from the Bible, the Prophets, and the Gospels, is presented, along with all their church customs, ceremonies, order, opinion, and intentions with the same clergy, and what their clergy (as the bishops and pastors), their office in the Holy Scriptures shows, and has lasted almost into the third hour.

(22) Therefore the Imperial Majesty has again consulted with the Royal Majesty, Princes and Princes, and answered. Since the articles are difficult for them, and there are many of them, His Imperial Majesty would like to draw up a council on them, and then give a gracious answer as to what His Imperial Majesty intends to do about them. So the Imperial Majesty and all men went and rode into his custody.

On Monday, 27 June, Imperial Majesty and several Princes and Princes came to the Town Hall. Majesty and several Princes and Princes came to the Town Hall, and were led before it by Imperial Majesty's tapestry maker to the balcony, where the Emperor Frederick and Maximilian also stood. Majesty's tapestry makers led them to the bay window, where Emperor Frederick and Maximilian also stood, the Imperial Majesty's exquisite tapestries were opened, and the mayor, city council and community of the city of Augsburg stood before the city hall to administer the usual oath to the Imperial Majesty. So sing to imperial. Majesty Ehrenhold (Caspar Sturm, called Germania) to speak against mayor, council and community: because S. kaiserl. Majesty requires them to take the usual oath, they should pay attention, pay attention and repeat what is read to them, then Imperial Majesty wants them to keep their liberties. Majesty would hold them to their liberties and privileges, confirm and confirm them, and be their most gracious Emperor 2c. So they, mayor, council and community, have taken the oath. According to this, Imperial Majesty After the morning meal, the imperial and royal majesty, as well as several ecclesiastical and secular princes, rode out to hunt, and that same evening both queens, Maria and Anna, joined them in the hunt, and thus stayed overnight outside at the castle, called Wellenburg, which belongs to Salzburg.

The Roman Imperial Majesty Majesty, also Royal Majesty of Hungary and Bohemia. Majesty of Hungary and Bohemia, together with all other Counts, Lords and those of nobility, who appeared with Princes and Princes at the Imperial Diet as courtiers, will be listed and named in a special print, according to the contents of the handed over slips. Date the 22nd day of June.

936 The answer given by Count Palatine Frederick in the name of the Emperor to the speech delivered by the Archbishop of Mainz in the name of the Electors, Princes and Estates.

Röm. kaiserl. Majesty, our most gracious Lord, has most graciously heard the speech of the Princes, Princes and Estates of the Holy Roman Empire, in which they congratulate him on the crown received at Bononia, and wish him long life, welfare and all the best for his regiment, and for this he gives great thanks to the Princes, Princes and other Estates.

But since his Majesty, our most gracious Lord, who by divine providence has been elected Roman Emperor and has now been confirmed by the coronation that took place in Bononia, sees in fact in what great and rich numbers the princes, prelates, counts and other estates of the Empire and the same embassies that have been summoned to the Imperial Diet by His Majesty's proclamation are present.

His Majesty is immensely pleased and testifies to this very graciously, and has also resolved to act with special earnestness and zeal with princes, princes, and the estates of the empire that which can be helpful for the glory of the Almighty, for the salvation and welfare of all Christians, for the benefit of the German nation, and especially for the overcoming and chasing away of the Turks, for the salvation and welfare of all Christians, for the benefit and best of the German nation, and especially for the defeat and expulsion of the Turks, and will think of ways and means by which the errors and discord in religion may be eradicated, and general peace and harmony established in the Holy Roman Empire. He will think of ways to eradicate errors and discord in religion and to establish general peace and harmony in the Holy Roman Empire, in the confident hope that God will lend His assistance to such undertakings and guide and promote them according to His wise counsel. But now His Majesty demands that they continue on their way and enter the city.

937. another description of the imperial entry into Augsburg. Entry into Augsburg.

According to the Wittenberg edition, it is found in des Chyträus Historie der Augsb. Conf., p. 83 no in the Latin edition of the same, p. 43.

About 6 and 7 in the afternoon, on June 15, the princes and princes assembled here rode to meet their Majesty, and the reception by the Bishop of Mainz took place at the Lech Bridge.

When the Electors and Princes had dismounted, their Majesties also departed. When, after the reception, each of them returned to his horse, Duke John Frederick of Saxony 2c. and next to him Duke Francis of Lüneburg, Wolfgang, Prince of Anhalt, with the Elector of Saxony 2c. Stuff preferred, and thus had the preference due to an archmarshal of the realm.

Following is drawn Palatine Louis, Elector, skilful counsellors, with their stuff.

Following Margrave Joachim of Brandenburg, Churfürsten, Zeug.

Following the stuff with bishop of Cologne.

Following the skill of the bishop of Trier with her stuff.

Following the bishop of Mainz stuff.

Although the Princes of Bavaria have to follow the example of other common princes of K. Majest. Churfürsten stuff, approximately with five hundred armed horses, nai<sup>u</sup>ziehen penetrated, which narrowness halben of the ways and opportunity did not like to be changed.

The following is the king of Bohemia's stuff, among which there were not many untrustworthy people, but a great number of samplers and silk skirts.

Following is K. Majest. Zeug gezogen, unter denen wenig gerüster Leute gewest, welches die Hatschierer 1) gewest, aber sonst viel sammelte und seidene Röcke.

Following are drawn the princes in their own person, Friedrich, Wilhelm, Otto Heinrich and Philipps, brothers and cousins, all dukes of Bavaria.

Landgrave of Hesse, Joachim the Younger, Margrave of Brandenburg, Duke Frederick of Saxony, two Dukes of Pomerania, brothers, Duke Henry of Brunswick, Duke Albrecht of Mecklenburg, Duke Ernst of Lüneburg, two Princes of Anhalt of Dessau, brothers, a young Duke of Liegnitz, Landgrave of Leuchtenberg, Margrave George of Brandenburg, and Duke George of Saxony.

Just outside the city, the Elector of Brandenburg received the papal legate in Latin on behalf of the bishops and ecclesiastical princes. Our clerics know so much Latin that a secular prince had to speak Latin for their sake.

The Elector of Saxony followed, and presented the Emperor with the bare sword, as is his office. On the right side the skillful one of the Palgrave, Elector, is drawn to him, on the left side the Elector of Brandenburg.

Before the three Electors is drawn the Bishop of Trier's skillful one, in place of a Elector.

Under the gate stood the abbot of St. Ulrich with a heaven and procession, under which heaven the emperor moved and thus entered. The bishop of Mainz was drawn to him on the right, and the bishop of Cologne on the left, by the foremost rods in the sky; by the rearmost rods the king of Bohemia was drawn to the right, and the papal legate to the left. Legate to the left side.

Following 3 Cardinals, and of the King of France and King of England messages are drawn between them.

After this are drawn the common bishops, the same, and all manner of messages.

1) In the Wittenberg and in the Jena: "Hertzschirer".

According to them are drawn the common secular and ecclesiastical princes witnesses, as then they belong and ordered after each other according to old usage.

And after the Council of Augsburg had received the Emperor's Majesty with two hundred well-equipped horses, two thousand very well groomed servants, and a fine cannon. Majesty, with two hundred well-equipped horses, two thousand very well groomed servants, and a fine cannon, all of which went off after the reception, they had the retinue on the prescribed princes' witness.

As the Emperor's Majesty. came to the square of the wine market, the canons stood with a great procession, many monks and priests, also received her Majesty, and took her under another heaven, thus marching up to the cathedral church; There Her Majesty and all the other princes and rulers sat down, went into the church, sang the Te Deum laudamus there, and rang with all the bells; after that the princes and rulers led Her Majesty into their lot, and after that each one went to his hostel.

Such bragging has granted until 10 o'clock the night.

938 Philipp Melanchthon's letter to D. Martin Luther about the emperor's arrival, about the prohibition of the sermons and the suggestions of the opposite. About June 18 or 19, 1530.

This letter is found in Melanchthon's spp. lib. I, x, 7, and from it in Cyprian's Beilagen zur Hift. der Augsb. Conf., p. 171. Further in the 6orp. Rec. vol. II, p. 118. It agrees exactly in content with a letter of Jonas to Luther, June 18, 1530, Kolde, p. 137. According to this, our approximate time determination. Burkhardt, p. 177 assumes June 19.

Translated from the Latin by I. F.

The day before the Feast of Corpus Christi, in the evening at eight o'clock, the Emperor made his, God grant happy and blessed, entry into the city of Augsburg. Our Elector, as usual, carried the sword before him. When one arrived very late (because the procession was slow) at the Emperor's hostel, the first request was that the sermons be stopped. There was a dispute about this for three days in succession, since our people did not want to stop preaching, until finally, after a long discussion, the emperor ordered both parts to stop preaching). He himself let one preach the gospel and the epistle without the other.

1) This happened on June 18.

I'll read your explanation. In this way, according to my understanding, the papists will harm their cause even more. But you, according to your wisdom, will be able to take much from it.

This is the beginning, and we have no great hope in the imperial court, since Campegius only advises that force should be used against us. Nevertheless, at the entire court, no one is more gentle and merciful than the emperor himself, who, as Duke Henry of Brunswick tells me, softens the bitter attacks of the princes. We have only two princes who take care of our danger, namely the Archbishop of Mainz and the Duke of Brunswick. The Elector Palatine and the Margrave of Baden are not present. The Dukes of Bavaria boast themselves very much. Pray diligently for us. Cornelius 2) thinks that we would still have had some hope of peace if Mercurinus had remained alive; after his departure, however, he knows of no man in good standing at Court who would advise peace; but he is only playing his own way, and seems to take special care that he should not be suspected of being on our side. That helps us nothing. A certain Spanish secret scribe 3) has also promised everything good, and has already held a conference with the Emperor and Campegius, in my opinion. But everything is with God. Farewell.

939 Narrative 4) of the Emperor's grace that the Protestants should cease preaching and attend the procession on the Feast of Corpus Christi, and how the matter proceeded.

18 June 1530.

This writing is found in the Wittenberg edition (1569), vol. IX, p. 409d; in the Jena edition (1566), vol. V, p. 27; in the Altenburg edition, vol. V, p. 26, and in the Leipzig edition, vol. XX, p. 202. The determination of the time results from the signature.

1. Majesty rode in on the evening of Corporis Christi, safely by three strokes to Augsburg under the heavens, and in riding in,

2) Cornelius Duplicius von Schepper, formerly in the service of King Christian II of Denmark, then became Carl V's secretary of state.

3) According to Burkhardt: Vuläbsiul, des Kaisers Secretär.

4) Walch has added this report to Spalatin, although the Wittenberg and Jena editions have only the heading: "Schrift aus Augsburg gethan, Anno 30."

2c. Likewise with the continuation No. 948 and 950.

5) That is, under a carrying sky.

When Her Imperial Majesty came across the Lech. When her imperial majesty came across the Lech, she had the Lutheran princes summoned to her and requested from her electoral and princely graces that they not allow preaching in Augsburg from now on. Thereupon the princes consulted with each other, and through Margrave Georgen again briefly indicated the reason why their electoral and princely graces could not agree to refrain from preaching; yet His Majesty again had it said that His Majesty could not refrain from their request, and thus twice raised the excuse and the reapplication; and the king himself said seriously that Imperial Majesty could not nor would not refrain from preaching in Augsburg. Majesty neither could nor would desist from it. So the Margrave said to her Imperial Majesty: "Before I want to go back. Majesty: "Before I would deny my God and his Gospel, before I would kneel down here before your Imperial Majesty, I would not be able to do so. Majesty and have my head cut off. Thereupon His Imperial Majesty said. Majesty said: Not head off, not head off; and again based on her request. The princes have taken it into consideration to answer again until the morning, that is, on the true Corpus Christi day.

2nd Early in the morning the young Duke of Saxony, Margrave George, Landgrave of Anhalt, rode to the Imperial Majesty, and the Elector stayed in the inn. Majesty, and the Elector stayed in the inn. After Imperial Majesty Majesty requested in the evening to go along in the procession, the princes answered yesterday's request, and with the aforementioned reason stood by their previous opinion, granted longer than two hours, and thus delayed Imperial Majesty so that he could not be allowed to go along in the procession. Majesty was delayed by the fact that his Majesty did not enter the church until after ten beats. Our princes went home, let the emperor hold the procession with other churls and princes. The bishop of Mainz hath borne the sacrament. And if the sovereigns had been taken away with their servants, not a hundred Augsburgs would have been found to follow the sacrament. And I may well say that in this procession, among all ranks, ecclesiastical and secular, I have seen no more devout, more chaste person than the Imperial Majesty. Carrying a burning light like the others, the whole procession went bareheaded, and, for the sake of the long procession, lasted until one stroke.

(3) But after our princes had been ordered by Imperial Majesty to hand over in writings the cause why they should be troubled with the procession. Majesty, because they refused to go along with the procession, that they should hand over in writings the reason why they were troubled to go along; also why they did not want to let up preaching. This therefore was done has imperial majesty submitted the same to all the changing princes. Majesty has submitted the same to all the changing princes for consultation, who all met on Friday in the cathedral provosty after noon, and at last formed a committee among themselves, which will come to our princes on Saturday at noon, and most earnestly requested that Imperial Majesty be granted 1) to stand still with the sermon; for Imperial Majesty desired this not from them alone, but also from the opposite party, with this promise: "If all of them refrain from preaching, then Imperial Majesty wants to have the sermon. Majesty requested this not from them alone, but also from the opposite party, with this promise: If all of them refrain from preaching, then Imperial Majesty wants the matter to be settled. Majesty will then take care of the matter and act in accordance with the decree.

(4) Our people have pleaded all their Christian necessity, why they could not consent to it, and because Imperial Majesty has indicated that he is a sovereign of this city. Majesty has claimed to be a sovereign of this city, and that the decree of the first Imperial Diet at Speier would allow that every authority should do so, as it could answer for it to God and the Imperial Majesty. Majesty, our princes, as those who are of their authority and charge, do not want to put a measure to Imperial Majesty in this; but do not want to refrain from preaching, but must suffer and bear their Majesty's business. And in this Brunswick, besides the Archbishop of Mainz, showed itself particularly well, more than one could have provided for. God grant his grace. But Imperial Majesty Majesty wants to appoint preachers from imperial authority, but not from any of the partisan ones, not even the Fabrum. Those whom Imperial Majesty Majesty decree, shall say nothing more than the Gospel with the Epistle, according to the bare text, without all interpretation, and conclude with the Confession Prayer 2).

(5) This was done, and the emperor was given great thanks with a peaceful heart. Thereupon, on Saturday, His Majesty has proclaimed through the entire city, through his heralds, with several trumpets: that no one should preach in Augsburg, with corporal punishment, except those whom His Imperial Majesty has ordered to do so. Majesty has decreed. It is a wild thing here with preaching, for it is full of sacramentalists, and Eisleben has proven himself well against them in his preaching, but has earned badly for them. God grant his mercy; there is good hope everywhere.

(6) The emperor is found inclined to peace and to establish good Christian order, although some great leaders, together with their whole group, are of a different mind and would like to see this game continue, as they decided at Munich, and the imperial majesty has said that they would be happy if they could. Majesty, if only she would command, they would be glad.

1) "herein" is missing in the Wittenberg.

2) To "the Confession Prayer" the Wittenberg and Jena editions have the marginal gloss: "offve Beicht".

that they would do what their majesty desired; as they have sufficiently proven with words and deeds. But God has graciously turned it around. Our princes, praise be to God, have been strengthened by His grace and have remained steadfast, not letting fear deter them. God grant His mercy to them. By Monday, they will begin the Kingdom Day. May the merciful God send His Holy Spirit.

Causes why the Protestant princes cannot be at the solemn company on the Feast of Corpus Christi.

(1) Your Imperial Majesty should not be disconcerted as to why we are not able to keep company with and be present at such frequent invitations and appointments. For we are minded to briefly recount and properly state the important and obvious reasons we have for this. 1) First of all, we are very humbled to have been able to offer this favor and this service to Your Imperial Majesty. Majesty this favor and service without neglecting our consciences; however, since 2) Your Majesty's command means that this favor and service must be done without neglecting our consciences. However, since we know that this kind of service is not commanded anywhere in the prophetic and apostolic writings, we cannot in good conscience consent to such a request.

2. Since it is known to all reasonable, learned, and reasonably judging minds, and there is no need of dispute and proof, that the whole and unmutilated use of the true body and blood of Christ was prescribed and instituted by the founder himself in holy scripture, we consider it a burden to our consciences to show, as it were with our applause, that a part of it, which is carried about, namely the body, is according to the commandment of Christ, and not contrary to it; which from our confession, soon to be delivered to your majesty. Majesty, which shall soon be delivered. For what would that be not only for a rash recklessness, but even desperate wickedness, insolence, and levity, holding that which is instituted and ordained by human power higher than God's commands and commandments, and boldly saying that it is a service of God in the church, when it is written, In vain do they serve me with that which men have commanded.

(3) We do not mean to strengthen and introduce such ungodly and obvious human statutes, which conflict with God's Word and Christ's commands, by our consent; rather, we unanimously declare without hesitation that such unrighteous and ungodly human doctrines (traditions) are to be completely abolished from the Church and destroyed, lest the other still healthy and pure members of the Church be infected and tainted with the same deadly and harmful poison.

(4) Moreover, we know very well that the opposite expressly seeks this and deals with it, as they have also added this declaration that this contact is to be a service of God. For they have believed for certain that we would not have so much trust and confidence in God that we would refuse obedience and submission to His Majesty, who has called us so often and so earnestly, as if one did not know that one must obey God more than men. And if, on the other hand, we were to obey the imperial command And if, on the other hand, we were obedient to the imperial command, and approved the observance by our presence, that this would serve and contribute greatly to destroying and depressing the reputation of our religion and of the divine word, because we had no hesitation in honoring and confirming the observance and the comedic performance of Corpus Christi with our presence, which, after all, is obviously at odds with the word of God and our part of the sermons and church customs, and consequently this would give a beautiful and desirable opportunity to accuse us of a tacit (or secret) recantation in the matter, and to blaspheme us with good causes, about which they would rejoice and exult to the highest, if only they could have such cause and occasion to strike down the prestige of the Gospel and the divine word.

005 For if they had not brought it about by their secret plots and treacherous counsel, Imperial Majesty would not compel us to be in the company. Maj. would not force us to be with them, but would leave it free for us, like other princes and princes. What suspicion Imperial Majesty's Majesty's entry increases with, so just Vigilia, the holy evening, before

The people of Augsburg, who had to arrive on the Feast of Corpus Christi and enter Augsburg, thought that the custom, which had already been omitted, lost, and abolished for many years, would be reintroduced, established, and confirmed by their presence, since [the] opposite flattered itself with the hope that this reestablished custom would then remain easy and continue for many hundred years, that it would agree with the word of God and evangelical truth, or that it would quarrel with it and destroy it.

(6) It can thus be clearly seen by whom it was instigated that Imperial Majesty wanted to enter the Holy Evening before Corpus Christi. Majesty wanted to enter the holy evening before the Corpus Christi feast, since they had to toil all day in the hot sun and dust, and the entry had been prolonged and extended into the late night. And this was not enough, there had to be added still more trouble and toil. For since one had to come home (to the inn) late, and imperial majesty had to take care of the rest. Since it was late to come home (to the inn), and since the Emperor's Majesty would be well disposed to rest, as soon as they got down, they had us called to them, above all other things, and earnestly requested that we cease our preaching and join them in the meeting.

Causes why the Elector of Saxony and the princes related to him in the same religion cannot abolish nor stop their preaching.

(7) And since, furthermore, Her Imperial Majesty has earnestly demanded that we cease and abolish our preaching. Majesty has earnestly demanded that we should cease and abolish our sermons: so I have, on the advice and will of the princes who are related to religion, answered Ew. kaiserl. Majesty thus:

8. 1) That by the grace of God we know for certain and believe without doubt that the doctrine which we profess is founded in the prophetic and apostolic Scriptures, and is unanimous with and similar to the creed accepted in the Church.

(9) Therefore we cannot and may not revoke or deny them by silence, unless we would esteem the commands and commandments of men higher and more than God's, preferring them to our name's greatest disgrace and the eternal ruin of souls, which God would graciously prevent and avert from us.

10. 2) Furthermore, it is more than too well known that our doctrine is neither heretical nor seditious, but has now been spread and propagated throughout the whole world for many years, and that it is more acceptable to the Christian authorities and to all estates.

than destroy and diminish; therefore no one will deny that men may improve themselves from it, and learn much a more Christian way of life from it; which we heartily desire.

11. 3) And since at all other imperial congresses, which have now been held several times, our sermons have never been hindered or forbidden, we must now be justly disconcerted as to what moved Your Imperial Majesty to urge so strongly that they be stopped. Majesty's reasons for insisting so strongly and so often that they be stopped. Be that as it may, however, we can easily guess and surmise who is behind it, and by whose counsel and operation (which we leave to God's righteous judgment) all this is being arranged and instigated. Therefore, we religiously related princes, whom we most humbly entrust to Her Majesty's high and most gracious protection, most diligently request that Her Majesty not trouble our consciences with such requests in a matter concerning the honor of the divine name and the salvation of our souls.

941 Margrave George's speech to the Emperor on his own behalf.

From Cölestin 1. 6. p. 84.

Translated into German by U. A. Tittel.

Most invincible emperor, most gracious lord!

After this has been said by the Elector of Saxony and other Protestant Princes on account of 1) urgent need, I have also presented my opinion to His Imperial Majesty. Majesty my opinion and discover it. Your Imperial Majesty. Majesty cannot be ignorant of the services I have rendered to the House of Austria, how faithfully and steadfastly I have at all times looked after and served it, what dangers I have joyfully and bravely endured and assumed for it, so that I have endeavored to show it not only the obedience owed to it with the addition of my property and possessions, but also with my goods and blood, which everyone will bear me witness to. Nothing to remember of my ancestors' glorious deeds, loyalty and zeal, as they have done for Your Majesty in the Austrian and Hungarian territories. Majesty's ancestors in the Austrian and Hungarian wars. To those of my ancestors as a laudable successor I promise and vow to Your Imperial Majesty. Majesty, that also for the House of Austria and Imperial Majesty I will assist. Majesty.

1) "Princes" put by us instead of: "Churfürsten".

I will not lack the right to do so, if only I am not forced to approve in the matter of religion what is contrary to God and His Word.

All this I ask Your Imperial Majesty. Majesty most humbly to move and signify in mercy, and not to be moved by any slander and allegations of the adversaries to believe them and to be of an unequal mind against me. For in this matter concerning God, I am driven by the unchangeable divine commandment to resist such commands and desires and to disobey them, no matter how hard and dangerous it may be, because it is written: One must obey God more than men. Therefore, because of the confession of the doctrine, which I know for certain to be the voice of the Son of God and the eternal, unchanging truth, I refuse to run any risk, even of life, since I have heard that such a risk is threatened and imposed on those who accept the true religion.

942: Written answer and apology handed over to the emperor by the Protestant princes and princes on June 17 that they could not stop preaching.

From the original conception in the Weimar archives, printed in Förstemann's Urkundenbuch, Vol. I, p. 283. Also in Chyträus, p. 88; in Müller, p. 538 and in Spalatin's Annals, p. 201. Latin in Cölestin, Vol. I, p. 86 and in Chyträus, p. 46. The author is D. Brück.

Most Sublime, Great and Invincible Emperor, Most Gracious Lord! After Your Imperial Majesty has given us this day for a farewell, among other things, that we should hand over our complaint in writings to Your Imperial Majesty. Majesty we should hand over our complaint in writings, so that Your Imperial Majesty may hold further council on it 2c. As a most humble consequence of your Imperial Majesty's farewell, Your Imperial Majesty has graciously heard from the verbal reports that have been made, which we also inform Your Imperial Majesty of and recover with this document, that Your Imperial Majesty is graciously pleased with it. Majesty should graciously consider it, where we find that our preachers teach or preach news and that which is unfounded in divine holy scripture and contrary to our holy faith, that we knowingly do not want to tolerate such from them, but want to show ourselves with fair understanding against them. But we cannot note otherwise than that they alone preach and interpret the holy gospel purely and correctly, just as it is preached and interpreted.

The following is preached and taught by the Fathers, who are to be considered the most proven 1) and credible in the Holy Christian Church, and the Imperial Decree, made at the Imperial Diet in Nuremberg in the 23rd year, publicly admits it. This is what the Imperial Decree, made at the Imperial Diet at Nuremberg in the 23rd year, publicly permits, as it appears to be in the presentation of each opinion and opinion, at the request of Your Royal Highness. Should such a preaching of the holy gospel, as if it were an unrighteous doctrine, be set down, and that the same be approved by us, would be frightening, would also stand against God the Lord (who does not want his holy word to be bound) as a sin in 2) the Holy Spirit, not to be answered for. Thus we, too, as poor sinful human beings, are in great need of such preaching and proclamation of the divine word to comfort our conscience and to seek help from God in all the needs and concerns that we and every human being encounter daily. For as little as we may need the daily food of the body, so much less can we be without the preaching and proclamation of the divine word, since man lives not only in bread, but in all the word that proceeds from the mouth of the Lord. We have informed Your Royal Governor and Brother, Royal Dignity of Hungary and Bohemia, our special dear lord and gracious lord, together with the commissioners appointed by Your Royal Highness at that time, of the same four years ago, at the Imperial Diet at Speier, which was announced by Your Royal Highness.

(2) And even though it would otherwise be preached here, Her Royal Highness and everyone know that there is a discord in the doctrine; for which reason Her Royal Highness, in addition to other causes, has called this Diet of Her Majesty, with the most gracious and Christian 3) notice that every man's opinion and opinion shall be heard here, and then that which would have been done unjustly on both sides shall be set aside. Imperial Diet, with most gracious and Christian notice, that every one's opinion and opinion should be heard here, and then that which would have been done unjustly on both sides should be set aside, and brought to Christian unity.

(3) For this reason, Your Royal Highness may graciously consider how we, for the sake of our consciences, may be helped or advised, even if it were otherwise preached, if we were to hear the same preacher alone, we should drop our sermon.

4) We would also, where we should thus consent to the discontinuance of our sermon, as we otherwise would E. K. M. in everything that is outside 4) divine.

1) Spalatin: "beweresten"; Förstemann: "wegersten". The sense is the same.

2) Förstemann: im.

3) So Spalatin. Förstemann: "most Christian".

4) So Spalatin. Förstemann: .chnser halb".

We are inclined to humbly comply with the law of the Holy Word of Glory and Honor, thereby compelled, against our conscience, to judge our doctrine to be unjust, and the contrary one to be right, before, by virtue of the aforementioned invitation of Your Imperial Highness to this Imperial Diet, the matter is heard, which on both sides is not 1) justified. For from a high imperial understanding, Your Imperial Highness can graciously consider the matter. For Your Imperial Majesty can graciously consider that one thing must follow, if we 2) stop our preaching and hear another sermon, that we are thereby urged in reason and effect to confess that our doctrine, from the fact that it has been stopped, is wrong, and the other, which we hear and accept on that account, is right.

(5) For what is to be done must, by virtue of Your Imperial Majesty's decree, and according to every man's reason, be unjust at the time. Majesty's decree, and also according to every man's reason, must be unjust at the time, and that which is erected for this reason must be just. And thereafter, as we can well judge and respect, little further action in these most important matters, concerning God our Creator, the soul and salvation, will be appreciated as necessary, which would then be immediately contrary to the often reported letter of His Majesty the Emperor. The only thing that is to be done is to take away from the other part as well as from this part, and not from our part alone, what is not rightly aligned on both sides, that is, from the other part.

(6) For if any one should say to the Lord Chamberlain, that novelty, which is burdensome to the faith, and also to vexation, is taught and preached in our part, we have above, and yesterday also, in our oral discourse, humbly informed the Lord Chamberlain, that it shall be found, if our opinion and opinion, according to the letter of the Lord Chamberlain, be heard here, that before 3) us the true gospel, and as it is also preached by the most approved and excellent fathers of the church, with the Scriptures, shall be preached in our part. 3) that the true gospel, and how the most proven and excellent fathers of the church have preached and interpreted it with the Scriptures, and nothing else, nor newness, is preached before us.

(7) And to me alone, and yet contrary to divine truth, and unproven in any way, to have known that abusive novelty was among them: so is E. K. M. also quite unconcealed what frightful news, of and unlike the holy Scriptures and the first fathers' doctrine, on the other hand, both in doctrines, customs, and walk, and daily-

1) Förstemann: "nit"; Spalatin and Walch: "with".

2) So Spalatin. Förstemann: "one".

3) So Förstemann. In the other editions: from.

4) that is, most fruitful, best. Cf. St. Louis edition, vol. XX, 455, 239 and 457, 845.

that also the whole world, and the pious before that time, have cried and lamented over it miserably, as still daily. In this regard, Your Majesty graciously recalls the noticeable abuses and the number of them that were brought before Your Majesty at the first Imperial Diet in Worms by the estates, which, along with the other and much more important ones, remain unchanged to this day.

(8) And this we show to Your Royal Highness in the most humble opinion that Your Royal Highness, as the most illustrious Emperor, must graciously accept from this how unequally the matters are demanded from Your Royal Highness by the opposing party and are presented against us.

(9) To this end, we truly hope and know that no one who hears and hears our preachers and their teaching can or may be offended by it with conscience. If, however, there were anyone who had received or would receive such displeasure about our preachers' teaching, we would hold them to that standard, as we have also humbly instructed the previous day, to give every one of them a Christian report and account of their teaching, so that no one should have to complain of any cheap displeasure about them. For it would be a grievous thing in the sight of God Almighty that, for the sake of those who do not desire to be informed and therefore want to be unnecessarily annoyed, the preaching of the holy gospel and the truth of God should be omitted and put down, even though, according to their own rights, the annoyance should give way to the truth and not the truth to the annoyance.

(10) But to what extent we would and would have to offend our neighbor against faith and love, if it should sound from us that we had consented to discontinue the preaching of the Gospel, and thus had judged our doctrine itself to be wrong, can be easily judged by Your Holiness and everyone, and how such a thing, for the sake of our conscience, would stand against God, the strict judge; which Your Holiness, as we are in the most submissive hope of the same, would not allow us, as a Christian emperor, to do in God's judgment and wrath, as we are in the most submissive hope of the same, as a Christian emperor, would not grant us in any way that we should thus throw ourselves into God's judgment and wrath, unproven things, whom we also further want to implore for mercy and call upon to graciously protect us from this and all evil.

(11) Thus, we have also reported to His Holiness that our preachers, after their sermons have been preached, daily exhort the people with the best of their diligence, to pray to God in all distress.

I urge you to diligently pray to the Holy Roman Emperor, to the half of the Church that presides over Christendom, and especially that He will grant grace to His Imperial Highness as His decreed authority, to the Princes, to the Estates, and to us, to act in these dwindling troubles for the praise of God, and for Christian peace and right Christian unity at this Imperial Diet. Which exhortations to omit, because God wills and commands that we should call upon Him and ask Him for the aforementioned need, may not be good, nor beneficial to Christendom.

(12) There is also a faithful report from them against some doctrines, which, for the sake of the sacraments, have been taught to the people here, and for this reason have been quite burdensome, and for the sake of much improvement (as to hope to God) have been harmful, where our preachers should stand still with their preaching.

(13) If we were to consent to such a rejection, our own consciences would and must judge us before God, that we were guilty of the corruption of the deceived. For this purpose, the conflicting matters have now been discussed for several years, and especially at both imperial congresses at Speier, the doctrine of the Gospel has been preached publicly and morally for us and our friends in such a way that especially now, for the sake of discussion, 1) there should be no hesitation, or, as we have been reproached by the Holy Roman Emperor, there should be no fear of trouble.

(14) Thus it is to all this knowingly and at the day, that the parting, which was made a year ago at Speier, though we were not able to heal therein for causes which were indicated there, does not affect us so much as we should now consent to the cessation of the preaching 2) of the holy gospel.

(15) It has also been free and unresisted with Your Royal Highness's ancestors, and also with Your Royal Highness himself, churons and princes (for what happened with us at the two next imperial congresses held at Speier, that the churches were refused to us for the preaching of the Gospel), that every fine preacher may have the divine word preached publicly in the church before him, and whoever else has gone to it.

(16) Your Royal Highnesses are also graciously to judge that if your Royal Highnesses should decree with us the discontinuance of the sermons in this way, it would undoubtedly be understood by men as such.

1) Förstemann: "Inhu meher disputiren halben"; Spalatin: "um mer disputation halben".

2) Förstemann and Spalatin: "Prediger", probably read from "preach", which is sermons.

as if E. K. M. wanted to lay down this doctrine on our part, unheard of, also, according to the tender issued by E. K. M., which we nevertheless granted E. K. M., as our most gracious Lord and Emperor, out of subservience, that such E. K. M., because Her Majesty's tender has spread over the whole realm and further. Her Majesty's letters have gone out over the whole Empire and beyond, and everyone, whatever his state, stands in consoling hope of God and of His Majesty. K. M. that these most important matters will be dealt with here in an orderly manner, in right faith and love, for the investigation of the divine eternal and everlasting truth; are also to E. K. M.'s most consoling confidence that E. K. M.'s opinion will not be in any way to allow these matters to be dealt with otherwise than as indicated. And after all this, it is once more to His Royal Highness., our most gracious Lord, our most humble and most submissive request, as we may and should always most humbly request, as we have also done the past two days, that E. K. M. may graciously consider and ponder this Christian notice and information of ours, given from our rightful, well-meaning hearts, and may graciously spare us the deliberate discontinuation of our preaching, for the sake of faith, love and our consciences, and may not allow Her Majesty to oppose our preachers preaching, as was done before at Speier and has been done here until now. In everything else that concerns our body, goods and property, we also want to acknowledge our guilt according to God's word and command, in order to earn E. K. M. as the same and the kingdom's most subservient Elector and Prince, in all willingness and obedience, and to keep and show ourselves to E. K. M. that in the things, so that we may have E. K. M.'s body and goods unsaved, we will not be held back by E. K. M. in any way, in the things that we may do subserviently, whether God wills it or not, so that we may not be the last. ## o concerns regarding the requested refraining from preaching.

I.

Meaning, whether the preaching can be stopped with a clear conscience at Imperial Majesty's request. Majesty's request with a clear conscience? About June 16, 1530.

From the original in the Weimar archives printed by Förstemann, Urkundenbuch, vol. I, p. 281. By Müller 1. e. p. 546. Contentwise it agrees sentence for sentence with the third objection communicated in no. 918 and this writing seems to us the first draft to that objection.

1. M.'s request that the princes and rulers cease their usual sermon, it is considered that the sermon (to be given to K. M., the answer given 1) is to be handed over this night or in the morning) is nevertheless to be continued, on the grounds that K. M. has not seriously commanded to refrain from such, but only requested it. Now it is permitted to princes and sovereigns that their graces often refuse a mediocre request with good futilities, let alone an unreasonable demand. 2) And it is to be assumed from many circumstances that the Lord's request is more a word of fright than a persevering undertaking, by which one dares to try whether the nail in the wall wants to shake, and one might frighten a hare out of the hedge, so that, whether one commits a small thing in the beginning, confidence and way are made for the adversary to break in further. And if their intentions do not extend at the beginning, their hearts will be so sore that they will not be able to continue their defiance.

(2) Secondly, that, together with the sermon, a public Christian prayer, in which one prays for all the estates of the empire, now assembled at the Diet, is led, and the same is now most necessary.

(3) If, however, the church in which the sermon was preached was closed, it is intended that it should not be opened by force, since the electors and princes here in Augsburg have no authority over the churches, but that our most gracious and gracious lords should return to their hearth, and there have their courtiers recite the word of God in a convenient place in the hearth, which, as a householder instructs his household, he himself instructs or teaches.

A Christian prince is obliged to promote the fear of God in his court by listening to Christian preaching.

(4) If, however, the king would not abide by the request he had made, but would abolish the sermon in the inn with a serious mandate, in that case the consideration has been rejected until the matter actually comes to pass, because there is no fishing before the court, and present actions generally carry the council on their backs by the miraculous prompting of God.

Concerns of Mr. Philip, and causes why preaching might be discontinued for a time. June 18, 1530.

From Cölestin, Vol. I, p. 89. It was not until the 18th of June that the emperor forbade both parts to preach, hence this concern is finely to be postponed to that day. This does also the 609. Lei. vol. II, 111 f.

(1) The first reason why it is admitted is because the emperor, since he bequeaths it to both parts, gives no cause for reproach.

2. the other, because he promises to hear our cause.

The third, because a greater good is preferable to a lesser one. If, then, the investigation of our cause were interrupted by such obstinate evidence, what might result?

4th The fourth cause of N. Agricola: because we have been called hither, not to preach; but as one party to answer for ourselves, and to give account of our doctrine.

5. the fifth, because we are not preachers at Augsburg.

944. formula of the prohibition to preach, which the imperial herald has had to proclaim publicly. 18 June 1530.

In Müller's History, p. 551, and in the German Seckendorf, p. 1039.

Hear, hear, hear, what the Roman Imperial Majesty, our most gracious Lord, has decreed. Majesty, our most gracious Lord, that no preacher here in Augsburg, whoever he may be, preach any more, except those whom Her Majesty decrees, avoiding Her Imperial Majesty's highest punishment and disgrace. Majesty's highest punishment and disgrace.

945 M. Luther's letter to Sl. Johann Agricola, in which he praises the fact that the Elector has given way to the authorities, but at the same time opens up his thoughts that the Imperial Diet will come to a bad end in terms of reputation. June 30, 1530.

This letter is found in the Ooä. 3on. L. 24. n. toi. 163 and in Aurifaber, vol. III. p. 37; afterwards in De Wette, vol. IV. p. 57, also in Buddeus, p. 119. Incomplete in Cölestin, vol. I, p. 92 d, also in Chyträus, p. 40, and in the German edition p. 96, also in Walch. A small piece, German from the Weimar archives, in Müller, p. 556, and in the Leipzig edition, vol. XX, p. 194. We have translated after De Wette.

Newly translated from the Latin.

Grace and peace in Christ. Of the letters and the silence I write to the others who are with you, 1) my dear Agricola. By the way, of the Emperor's interdict, by which he forbade all preaching, this is my opinion: that our prince did right, that he acknowledged the Lord in a foreign city, and did not seek to rule, however much it may seem to be an act of violence. For one must not resist evil [Matt. 5:39.], and Christ commanded that one should depart, saying [Matt. 10:23.], "If they persecute you in one city, flee into another"; likewise [v. 14.], "Come out of the same house." Thus I hold that the prince, since as a member of Caesar's body he may not depart, yet by his silence fled, as it were, into another city, and went out 2) from that house. He may read and honour the word with Naaman the Syrian in the temple of Nisroch [2 Kings 19:37. 5:18.], yea, even for himself. But the matter serves as an evil example, not, of course, to cause annoyance, but I suppose that a similar end of the Diet may come from it, namely, that 3) the emperor asks the prince to renounce the whole doctrine, as he first asked him to do.

1) On the same day Luther wrote letters to Augsburg to Jonas, Spalatin, Melanchthon and Joh. Brenz, No. 958 and No. 981-983 in this Volume, also to Duke Johann Friedrich, No. 1180.

2) In Latin here the construction is broken, and instead of the infinitives and exivisso the torupora ünitä, namely luzit and oxivlt, are placed.

3) Here we have deleted prirunn because it is too much.

But if, when he is asked, he will not, the same thing follows against the doctrine. Such are my thoughts. And only then will the right crisis of the kingdom (purox^sinus eomitialis) be there, in which the hand of God is to be expected and implored. For it is quite certain that the papists, who have been handed over to the devils, cannot do otherwise than rage. For the blood of Abel oppresses them, and their abominations harden them, so that they cannot live unless they have drunk blood.

Admonish Philip to temper the sacrifice of the crushed spirit, so that he will not finally lack the cost of sacrificing longer. It is indeed a great comfort to know that one is anxious in spirit for the sake of the best cause, for the sake of God Himself, where one cannot doubt that one pleases God like an exceedingly sweet odor, but in things moderation is to be kept. It is sacrifice that is pleasing, not destruction, and God does not want souls to be ruined. This is an addition from the devil. For hoping for the Emperor's mercy is nothing. I think that the papists have urged the emperor to hear the matter, so that, after they have heard our defense, they may then do as they please, and obtain this pretext, that they have heard us sufficiently, and thus the blasphemy, that we are obstinate, may be brought against us all the more freely and apparently, since, after all, we, having been heard and admonished, have not given ear to the emperor either. For what should Satan intend otherwise, or what good can we expect from him? Do we not know fine thoughts, that he turns all things with false appearances, lies, cunning, and guile, so that he is beautiful, but Christ exceedingly ugly? In Augsburg you have certainly not to do with men, but with the gates of hell itself, and that with exceedingly well-equipped and well-practiced, but what is consoling, very angry ones; blinded by this anger, they cannot escape at last that they run against the wisdom of God, and cheat themselves in their prudence. Amen.

It is here with me Caspar Müller 4) with mei-

4) Chancellor of the Count of Mansfeld.

I have been with my brother Jacob, and he has told me what he told you to tell. Therefore this evil must also be added for us, so that we are plagued everywhere with the abominations of the devil. Of this another time. The Lord Jesus, who has sent you all there as his confessors and servants, for whom you also present your necks, feast with you, and give you through a fine spirit the testimony of certainty of faith, so that you may know and not doubt that you are fine confessors. This faith will give you life and comfort, because you are the messengers of a great king. These are trustworthy words, amen. From the desert, on the last day of June, 1530.

This letter is found in the Wittenberg edition (1569), vol. IX, p. 411; in the Jena edition (1566), vol. V, p. 28b; in the Altenburg edition, vol. V, p. 28, and in the Leipzig edition, vol. XX, p. 175. Also in Chyträus, German p. 114; Latin p. 69, and in Cölestin, vol. I, p. 139.

e of God John, Duke of Saxony and Elector 2c.

To the venerable, highly learned, our dear devotee, Mr. Martins Luther at hand.

1. Our greetings first, venerable and learned one, dear devotee! We know not to leave unreported to you, in your gracious opinion, the state of our affairs, concerning God's word.

(2) For first of all, as soon as the same came to Augsburg, the Imperial Majesty requested us and our kinsmen to cease preaching. Majesty, as soon as she came here to Augsburg, and was dismounted from her horse, requested of us and our fellow relatives that we cease preaching; against this we most humbly petitioned her Majesty that evening and the following day, with the instruction of many good reasons.

(3) We did not receive it, however, but were finally informed that her Majesty, for movable reasons, wished to forbid preaching on both sides, and to appoint preachers who should preach the gospel loudly and clearly, so that no one should be in want of nourishment, and that the royal dignity of Hungary and Bohemia, her Majesty's brother, should also not allow the Fabrum to preach. Brother, shall also not let the Fabrum preach.

004 And thereupon the emperor commanded that preaching should be forbidden in the city, and that such prohibition should be proclaimed in all the streets by one of her majesty's servants. Servant, who blew two trumpets beforehand, proclaimed this prohibition in all the streets.

005 Now we are told that the preachers whom the emperor ordains commonly speak no more than the text of the gospel; what they teach beside it, fei childish and unskillful thing. Therefore, our Lord God must remain silent at this Imperial Diet. We know, however, not to blame the pious emperor at all, but rather our enemies and the clergy, those who favor the Gospel.

(6) Thus we, together with the other princes and estates who are related to us in this matter, have agreed to surrender our opinion and confession of faith. But our opponents who do not want to surrender it (as we are reported) should be willing to report to the emperor that they have kept the edict and the faith that their fathers grounded and brought upon them, and that they intend to remain so. If, however, the pope, or in his place the legate, together with His Majesty, should direct them to a different faith, and that they should accept a new one, they will humbly hear the emperor's objections.

(7) Therefore, on the day of St. John the Baptist, we appeared with our relatives before His Majesty the King of Bohemia, and also the Electors and Estates, in public audience, and offered to present our articles in Latin and German, according to His Majesty's request, and to read out and hand over the German articles in public.

(8) But we have not been able to obtain the public reading in such a way, despite many submissive requests. For the King and the opposing party have most diligently pleaded for it. But we have received so much that today His Majesty wants to hear the same article in His Majesty's palace. Palace. Therefore it is arranged that not many people can be there.

009 May the Almighty God continue to bestow His grace, that these things may be done unto His praise and glory. Therefore, let you also pray to Almighty God and call upon him diligently, as we have no doubt that you will do so without this remembrance of ours.

010 And how these things shall come to pass, we will also make known. For we are graciously inclined to be gracious to you and to do you good. Date at Augsburg, June 25, 1530.

947 The articles or the short concept of the Protestant and the opposite doctrine, which the emperor demanded from Phil. Melanchthon, and which Melanchthon handed over to the imperial secretary Valdesius.

Walch has taken this writing from Cölestinus, Vol. I, p. 93 under the above title. But already Seckendorf, Hist. Outü., lik. II, p. 166 8<sup>h</sup>. has justly doubted that the timid Melanchthon should have written so sharp a document, and even have delivered it to the imperial secretary for his master. In Cölestin this writing has the title: drevīs et eruāitn utriūZgue xurtis dootriurn 6ontin6N8 n O. kdilixxo Neiunedldone eon8Mpta et linx. Oarolo V. exdikitn. According to Förstemann, Urkundenbuch, Vol. I, p. 461 f., this writing originally appeared in German in another external form, and was republished by Ströbel under the title: "Phil. Melanchthon's Difference between the Protestant and Papist Doctrines, German and Latin. Lehre, deutsch und lat." Nuremberg 1782. octav. Also Förstemann says 1. 6. p. 462: "We are completely satisfied with the most definite certainty that these antitheses cannot have been handed over to the Emperor by Melanchthon at Augsburg in 1530." According to Melanchthon's letter to Camerarius of June 26 (in this volume no. 976), Valdesius had taken a look at the Augsburg Confession before it was handed over.

Translated from the Latin by U. A. Tittel.

Preface.

1. Our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, the Son of God, when he hung on the altar of the cross, and paid a sufficient ransom to his eternal Father for the sins of the whole world, shortly before, in the presence of his mother Mary and the disciple John, before he gave up the ghost, commanded Mary, his mother, John, and thereby wished to indicate that he commanded his poor church, which is subject to all contempt and persecution in this world, to protect and guard all men, but especially emperors (rulers).

2. Therefore, all people, especially baptized Christians who are members of the church, who have lived from the beginning of the world until now, and who are still alive, should think as if they were standing under Christ's cross, and should look with their eyes and most diligently contemplate the wonderful work that surpasses all human wisdom, since the Son of God bears the sin of the whole world and the heavy wrath of His Father, does enough for us, reconciles us to the Father, and opens the door to eternal life for us. We are to recognize and contemplate these great and unspeakable benefits and praise Him with gratitude, and we are also to earnestly direct all our lives and actions to God's praise and glory, and we are to see to it that the sound, godly and right doctrine of such great and important things is preserved.

and be passed on to their descendants, so that they too may have the opportunity to recognize such benefits and thank God for them. Let us therefore preserve and protect the church, in which this teaching resounds loudly and purely, and God the Father is rightly called upon in the knowledge of His Son, our Lord Jesus Christ, to the best of our ability; which Christ also requires of Petro, when He says: "If you convert once, convert your brothers also [Luc. 22:32]."

For it is well established and true among all people who do not deny God, but who have only a spark of true godliness and faith, that every person who has the true knowledge of God, and who wants to know or do more than others, must make every effort and endeavor not to spend his life in silence, like cattle, or to seek only the lusts of the flesh through the temptation and stimulation of the world. The Church of the Holy Spirit is the only church in the world that has the power to teach the pure doctrine of God and to preserve the true faith of the Church.

(4) Which no doubt, out of the impulse of the spirit, Her Imperial Majesty is now considering and contemplating. 4. Which, no doubt, from the impulse of the Spirit, her Imperial Majesty is now well considering and contemplating, for which reason (as can be seen and inferred from many circumstances) she is diligently consulting with learned men, and is anxious with all her might that not everything in the church should go against each other, but that the disputes should be brought before a legitimate church assembly (synod) and settled by peaceful means, but that the abuses should be corrected, and the doctrine of godliness restored. If we did not gratefully recognize these benefits of Her Imperial Majesty, this zealous effort to settle the disputes in the Church, the earnestness and the intention to establish good discipline and to put an end to vicious customs, also to improve the abuses, and heartily thank God for it, we would not only be considered incomprehensible and stupid, but also most ungrateful and unworthy of the name of man with every right.

(5) We therefore beseech God with heartfelt wishes, earnest prayer and supplication of the heart, that He may graciously assist Her Imperial Majesty in her useful and good intentions. Majesty in such a godly, useful and good undertaking, that He may strengthen it and keep it strong against the marvelous cunning of the devil and the plots of evil men, Amen!

006 But the thing itself is, and the greatest need shows and proves it, that this prayer is most necessary at this wretched and miserable time, and in this very miserable state.

007 For first of all he must be wholly blind that not to see what the devil, as the worst enemy of the human race, endeavors to do; what tricks he uses to hinder the course of the divine word, and how he challenges the true and sound doctrine of God. For he is always bent on, and directs his daily thoughts and endeavors toward, completely exterminating, destroying, and exterminating the confessors of the pure doctrine and of the true God, and on the other hand, introducing all kinds of false, ungodly, erroneous, and inconsistent doctrines, which have absolutely no basis in Scripture, and causing terrible turmoil and miserable wars in the German nation, and thereby causing destruction, plunder, and other mischief and harm.

(8) Such misery as is now told and other misery, of which there is no number, Her Imperial Majesty desires by kindness and gentleness to avert and prevent as much as possible, in which she is doing, in my opinion, a most noble work worthy of eternal remembrance.

(9) For it is incumbent upon their majesty not only not to strengthen or tolerate by their authority open idolatry and worship, which are evidently in conflict with the word of God, and thereby to open the door to others and more of the same, but rather, in order not to be guilty of other sins, to forbid them, to root them out, and to remove them from the church.

(10) Thereafter, Her Majesty also acts as a praiseworthy and godly emperor in this, that she, without any regard to person, graciously tries many ways to bring about harmony, and is not ashamed to defend the word of God; for Your Majesty, as well as all men, is especially created for the end that she may rightly recognize and praise God, and that, as she has already happily and diligently begun (through her), she may be able to bring about harmony. Majesty, as well as all men, is especially created for the end that she may rightly know, honor, and praise God, and that, as she has already happily and diligently begun, (through her) the doctrine of godliness may be restored and the glory of Christ may be propagated and extended.

(11) But since Her Imperial Majesty has sent to me through her councilor and secret scribe, Mr. Alphonsus. Majesty, through her councilor and secret scribe, Mr. Alphonsus, asked me to draw up a brief outline of both our doctrine and the doctrine of the other side and to have it presented to Her Imperial Majesty. Out of the most humble obedience and courtesy, I have, as briefly as possible, compiled both parts of the doctrine in this document; and I ask, in the deepest humility and most dutiful reverence, that Her Majesty may most graciously accept, overlook, and well consider it, and also conclude, pronounce, and judge from it what may serve God's honor and serve and benefit the settlement of the church's disputes. With this I most humbly command myself to their grace.

I. Article.

Of Christ and faith.

The teaching and content of the gospel is this: that God, out of unspeakable mercy and goodness, sent his Son, our Lord Jesus Christ, into the world, that he might be completely sufficient for our sin, and take away sin and eternal death, and show us that this is his unchangeable will, that sin is forgiven us only through Christ's merit, that we are counted free from it, and declared righteous before God without any merit on our part, and that we have no other reason to believe and think.

Contrast.

Contrary to this, the antitype does not even think of faith, but argues against it, and teaches that one must always doubt whether one has forgiveness of sins and is in grace. Then he mischievously attributes the honor due to Christ's merit to our works, and boldly says that we thereby obtain forgiveness of sins and are reconciled to God. This doctrine is not only very detrimental to the death, suffering, and merit of Christ, but it also confuses and entangles the conscience in a series of constant and terrible doubts.

II Article.

From the invocation (prayer).

The Gospel teaches that we must call upon God in true and firm faith, not doubting, but believing with certainty that He will hear our prayer.

Contrast.

But the adversaries teach: one must not put aside all doubt in prayer. But this distrust they have in common with the heathen and the Jews. Therefore it is not easy to see and say how different they are from paganism and Judaism.

III Article.

Of good works.

The Gospel teaches that these are only good works, pleasing to God, which He commanded in His word to be kept and performed; e.g., to love God, to trust and believe in Him, to love, confess, praise, and call upon Him, and to thank Him for the benefits received, to diligently practice and spread sound and godly doctrine, to diligently and gladly attend to our professional work, and to direct all works to God's glory according to the Ten Commandments.

Contrast.

But the adversaries devise and forge for themselves good works and special divine services, without God's command, such as monasticism, distinction of food and dress, celibacy, and many other quite childish and ridiculous innumerable antics; And so foolishly and impudently do they proceed, that they hold such divine services, which are instituted and commanded by human will, much higher than what has been ordained by divine command, to the extent that they also call such works excess works 1) and set them above the ministry of the word (or preaching office), marital status, worldly offices, and domestic life.

IV. Article.

How the works please GOD.

The Gospel teaches that the good works of those who are born again, even though they are imperfect and still have sins attached to them, are pleasing to God, if they only recognize their weakness, rise again in faith, and firmly believe that such works are pleasing to God because of Christ.

Contrast.

The adversaries teach that there is no sin left in the saints, so much so that they can also do works of excess and more than the law of God commands. Nevertheless, they always cause man to doubt whether he is in grace. This harmful error, which comes from the heathen, is so ingrained and has gained the upper hand that it can hardly be eradicated.

V. Article.

Of invocation of the saints.

The Gospel teaches that we should call upon God alone, who is one in essence and three in persons, God the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit. Spirit; and that we have no other mediator and intercessor than Jesus Christ, the Son of God, for whose sake God will surely hear our prayer. On the other hand, the gospel of all saints reproves and hinders invocation as ungodly and sinful.

Contrast.

The adversaries teach that one must invoke the saints, and they gloss over and excuse this invocation in many ways. But if one considers the right cause, he will find that it is a pagan idolatry, which carries with it a multitude of abuses that defile the name of God.

1) supererogationis.

VI Article.

e of the Sacrament of the Body and Blood of Christ.*

The gospel teaches that in public assemblies the sacrament of the true body and blood of Christ is to be administered to the people, not that it may be a sacrifice for others, but, according to the words of Christ, to awaken and strengthen the faith, and to remind all of the suffering and death of Christ, by which he reconciled us to the Father. These great benefits of Christ must be appropriated by every man in true faith, and he must certainly believe that he is incorporated into Christ as a branch or member, washed away by his blood, and cleansed from all sins, and that by such highly important things his memory is awakened and kindled to thanksgiving.

This usage has been completely changed in the Papal Mass. This use has been completely changed and reversed in the papal mass and its canon. But since a sacrament, apart from its use, e.g. in sacrifice, silent masses, and transubstantiation, is not a sacrament, or is considered equal to it, everyone can see how horribly and terribly guilty those are who do not shrink from reversing this order and manner instituted by Christ in an entirely false way, and instead introduce idolatrous services and superstitious, ungodly invocation. Moreover, our Lord Jesus Christ has instituted and commanded the Sacrament of His Body and Blood to be taken whole and unmutated.

Contrast.

The pope, however, with his army (or guard) of priests and monks, teaches that the sacrament of the altar is a sacrifice, and pretends that it (such a sacrifice) earns forgiveness of sins not only for the one who offers it, but also for all living and dead, and that after and with the mere act (ex opere operato). Therefore they boldly assert that with such Mass stuff they obtain all kinds of good from God for both the living and the dead; and they say that the priests' nefariousness does not prevent the good that he asks for through such sacrifice from happening to others. After this, they also want to dispute by all means that a mass said for many is not of as much use as if one were said for each person. Moreover, by the playful (and comedic) transference, they have shamefully mutilated and separated the sacrament of the altar; since such ceremonies are not to be regarded as sacraments without their proper use.

This is one of the most noble abuses, to which Christ, as it were, points with his fingers, when he speaks out of Daniel, saying, Let abomination arise in the church, and thereby the true worship of God be destroyed and cut off. For Christ is the priest who sacrificed himself, by whose once perfect sacrifice we are all sanctified, as it is written in Heb. 10:14. Then it is clear from Romans 4:5 that we receive forgiveness of sins through faith, but not through the work of sacrifice.

Afterwards they are also very lacking in this, that they may give the laity (or common persons) only one form, and pretend that it happens that the priest's deeds are the more highly esteemed and valued.

VII Article.

Of repentance.

The Gospel teaches That it is necessary to have a sincere will to recognize and repent of sins, and that we should fear the wrath of God. It also gives the remedy by which we may be helped from such pain, anguish, and terror of conscience, if we believe the promises of the Gospel, and are assured that our sins are forgiven and given to us by grace, freely, without any works or merit on our part, in which faith we feel comfort and the grace of the Holy Spirit working in us.

Nor does the gospel require a recital of all and every sin, but utterly rejects and banishes as ungodly all the shameful and unrighteous lies of human satisfaction, which obscure and render worthless the grace of Christ and the faith.

It also instructs us very usefully how to comfort troubled consciences, by presenting to us such a doctrine of counting lots, by which we are reminded that forgiveness of sins is offered and proclaimed to us through the gospel; and that this doctrine is not to be commonly practiced, but must be specially administered to each one, with the most sweet consolation, that by means of the ministry of preaching, through the doctrine of the gospel, forgiveness of sins is announced to us. This excellent custom of counting lots, and the most delightful consolations to be taken from it for frightened consciences, has been entirely abolished and obscured by the opposite, as may be seen from the contrast.

The gospel adds that repentance or conversion must be followed by new obedience in all good things.

Actions and customs which God approves of, which works God rewards with all kinds of bodily goods; as it is written:

"Turn to me, and I will turn to you" [Mal. 3, 7].

Contrast.

The opposing party uses the name, but leaves the matter as it is. But he does not touch faith, by which we obtain forgiveness of sins, and says that we must doubt, so that our consciences are plunged into despair. So not only does he reproach and revile God, but he also persecutes and severely tortures those who preach and inculcate this faith, by which we obtain forgiveness of sins, before the people.

They also press and weigh down the consciences with a recital of all sins, and say, in contempt and disdain of the reckoning, that it is of little use unless sufficient satisfaction is added to it.

Then they darken the true doctrine of repentance still more, when by their own power they bring self-chosen statutes into the church, and ordain certain works, by which they boldly assert that one can do enough for his sins, and thereby acquire redemption from eternal torment.

Which falsifications of the pure doctrine are so many and great, that we may be justly excused by all the pious, that we have separated ourselves from them. But since there are still many greater and more foolish ones, I hope that with a reasonable mind we will be all the more forgiven. For since they have obscured the true doctrine of repentance, falsified it, and rooted it out of the church, they have brought another, false, lying, and incorrect one into the way. Not to mention that by their fictitious pardon they strengthen and increase other innumerable, harmful and abominable errors, such as the mass, monastic life, pilgrimages, indulgences, purgatory, and innumerable other antics and superstitious customs, which all serve to disgrace and dishonor God.

VIII. Article.

Of the violence of the keys.

The gospel teaches that through the keys we are given power to preach the gospel, to administer the sacraments, and to call to repentance and punish those who are in manifest gross sins, so that they may hear that they are no longer members of Christ, but of the devil, and thus condemned and rejected.

Unless they repent, and enter into the way of salvation from which they have departed; likewise to number them that are righteously penitent and sorrowful for the sins they have committed, and repent.

The gospel also teaches this, that by the power of the keys we are not released to decree anything new in the church, to conquer many countries, and to change the ban into a worldly rule.

Contrast.

The pope uses the keys of the coat of arms and desecrates them shamefully. For, first, he arrogates to himself the power belonging to the church, and teaches that he is set up to be the judge and superintendent of all churches, pastors, bishops, and the whole world, in all spiritual and temporal matters. And secondly, that he has power to appoint and govern bishops, and to introduce doctrines of men into the church, and to use the ban for temporal government, so that he may take away the power and dominion of the kings whom he pleases. All these things are contrary to the word of God, and they are all repugnant to it.

IX. Article.

Of human statutes.

The Gospel forbids the bringing into the church of such services as are not expressly commanded in the Scriptures. For the audacity of man's jesting to create services that God should consider good is a terrible sin that few recognize and repent of.

Therefore the world, which has always been in such darkness, out of blindness has carved new and all kinds of saints (or gods) and offered them for worship. Such examples are to be found among the pagans, some of whom have chosen Jupiter, others Mars, for worship. From which pagan usage our popes and bishops differ little, in that they impose on us the distinction that should be kept in food and clothing in the church, enjoin celibacy, establish new orders and rules, approve and defend the worship of images and the invocation of saints, and also choose certain days of fasting. In which customs and statutes it is not merely a matter of considering and contemplating the fact that eating meat or not is not a great matter, but rather it is to be emphasized and held in high esteem that God does not want, but seriously forbids, to choose such services and to interpret them to others, which do not have the slightest reason or command in his word. Therefore, we must consider it certain that such works do not earn us forgiveness of sins.

God abhors all such falsities when He says: "In vain do they honor Me with the commandments of men" (Matt. 15:9). Therefore, those who abhor and abolish such hypocrisy do not sin, but those who support it become a burden to others by deceiving and confusing the simple, who think they are doing God a great service by keeping and performing such things.

Contrast.

The pope, bishops, priests, and monks, as well as those who have been ordained by men, claim and defend such services as those that merit justification and bring about grace and forgiveness of sins, and say that they are works of excess. Yes, whoever does not keep them, they strike him with the ban, call him a rotten member who has fallen away from the church, and banish him as a heretic, a rebel, and a spirit of the mob; with which thunderbolts and harsh words they frighten the people and force them to do such works forbidden by God.

But they adorn and disguise such errors with human wit, pretending that good order is very necessary for discipline in the church, and that one cannot blame them for having these orders and scales of persons in them, by which the rulers of them are distinguished. Moreover, the ceremonies, the difference in food and dress, and many other things cannot be told now, which they say are useful and profitable for good order.

All this has a fine appearance and seems to be well tolerated, but God does not want to take away the rule or to prescribe services. Nor can he suffer and tolerate that we, disregarding his word and command, follow our own conceit and opinion, from which, as from a rich fountain, all manner of errors have come and are coming forth. In this we have the example of the Egyptians, who worshipped cats and serpents. For this is where we must finally fall when we forsake the word of God and begin to keep and embellish the statutes of men. Nor can it be unknown to anyone that the timid consciences have often not been able to bear such things.

X. Article.

Of the priestly marriage.

The gospel teaches that no one who is capable of marriage should be forbidden to marry, and that the doctrine which does this is brought into the way by the devil. Yea, it commendeth marriage, and testifieth that such chaste and purity in the faithful pleasing to God; also commanding all persons to be called or to be whoever they will, and in some places also expressly to the priests, speaking of them as 1 Cor. 7 and Tit. 1, that they should marry.

Contrast.

The pope, however, has taken marriage away from the priests, contrary to the order set by God, and thus has opened a large window to abominable lechery and has brought innumerable scoundrels into the world. And although the old church statutes (canones) merely deprived the priests who married of their church goods and pay, yet the pope was not satisfied with such punishment as had been set before, but with his ancestors began to exercise greater tyranny over them, so that he killed and put away all who took such a stand. These are all abominable sins, and the very marks of the Antichrist, of which the prophet Daniel prophesied, saying, He shall despise women [love of women] [Dan. 11:37.]. Thereby the contempt of the marriage state and abominable lusts are indicated.

XI. Article.

Of monastic life and monastic vows.

The monastic vows, as well as everything else in the same state, are contrary to the gospel and the law of God. For the monastic state abolishes and annihilates faith by robbing and taking away Christ's glory and ascribing it to human works; it asserts that human ordinances and ordinances in the church are equal to the service of God, urges the sacrifice of the Mass and the invocation of the saints, and prefers this holiness of life, as they call it, far above the works and states ordered and instituted by God. All this is obviously contrary to the Gospel.

Contrast.

The monks teach that their vows merit forgiveness of sins and eternal life; that in them there is a holiness and perfection that is valid before God, and that they can be compared to the state of Elijah and Elisha, the prophets, who taught the word of God among the people, and in great tribulations and persecutions helped to carry the state (or the worldly government) with their shoulders, and did not deal with the statutes of men; Whereas in the monastic state nothing but lies, idolatry, and a lascivious life is to be found.

XII. Article.

Bon of Sin.

The Gospel teaches that not only outward works that conflict with the law of God are sin, but also inward wickedness; for example, not fearing God rightly, not trusting in Him, burning with many and various forms of unchastity, all of which are forbidden in God's law and are truly sin.

Contrast.

The adversaries teach that natural inability and inclinations contrary to the law of God are not sin. And consequently, they horribly obscure the doctrine of the law, repentance, sin and grace.

XIII Article.

Of the difference between the law and the gospel.

It is important to know the difference between the law and the gospel, which Paul teaches and describes in Romans 3 and 7 and 2 Corinthians 3. For it gives great light to the word of God to understand this correctly. For the law commandeth and requireth perfect obedience, punisheth all men, remitteth no sin, and taketh not away death, except there be merit.

But the gospel is such a preaching of repentance, which at the same time forgives sins for Christ's sake, without any merit on our part, and thus begins a new and eternal life for us. This high and most consoling article we do not wish to deal with here in its entirety.

Contrast.

The opposite man, who has no understanding, speaks in all his books of three kinds of laws, the natural, the Jewish, and the evangelical, and teaches that all were saved by the law of their time, and that there is no difference between the law and the gospel. Then he imitates the law of Moses, and establishes in the gospel the same priesthood, ceremonies, and sacrifices as are found in Moses. And this is the foundation on which the foolish clergy build their mass.

XIV Article.

Of pilgrimages.

The Gospel teaches and gives that one must call upon and honor God alone, and does not bind Him to a certain place or time; as Christ speaks Joh. 4, 21. ff, therefore much less must one bind the power and help of the saints to the place or that image, because they are not omnipotent.

Contrast.

The adversaries teach that God is more gracious and more powerful in this or that image, which is clearly contrary to God's word, in which the worship of images is seriously forbidden. But the adversaries reject this reason, follow their own conceit, attribute a divine power to idols or images, and say that their power is stronger in this or that place. Which idolatry is a manifest impiety, and is nothing else than the heathen custom which they used in the worship of their Diana of Ephesus.

XV. Article.*From purgatory.

The gospel teaches that those who die in the Lord are blessed. Likewise, one should not believe in ghosts, and Paul says in Romans 6:7 that those who have died are justified from sin. Therefore the contrary doctrine, that in purgatory one must do enough for sins, is full of shameful lies.

Contrast.

The adversaries teach that one must atone for one's sins, and on this weak foundation they build purgatory and all the masses. All of which is false and ungodly.

XVI Article.

The gospel teaches that it is incumbent upon the temporal authorities to punish all men, of whatever rank or honor, who are guilty of manifest crimes, and as a member of the church also to abolish all idolatry, and to enjoin and ordain the true doctrine and worship of God.

Contrast.

But the priest and his army broke away from this law and defiled his life with all kinds of fornication and lewdness. In addition, he arrogates to himself the power to set and decide whatever he pleases; on the other hand, he denies kings and princes the right to oppose it, or he does not allow them to pass judgment at all. And this is not enough for him that he asserts and spreads such errors; he also deposes those who punish them from God's word, drives them out and torments them with all torture, and even puts them to death. In this way he shows clearly enough that he is the servant of the devil, the father of lies and murderers, and that he has sworn to be his servant.

Therefore, all who ask about the true religion and their own salvation, which they see so desperately evil, will pay no attention to doctrine and commandments, nor will they let their faith rest on them; but rather they will eagerly and earnestly care how God may be rightly honored and called upon.

XVII Article.*From the fair.

We call such a sacred custom the Lord's Supper, 1 Cor. 11, because not only the same words of Paul confirm our opinion, but also the learned antiquity agrees with us in this: in which I find that in former times it was customary that mass was held in all churches, in which the priest might offer such to those who wished to eat and drink the true body and blood of Christ.

Then we believe that the Mass was especially instituted and ordered for this end, that this ceremony is, as it were, the strength and support of the public assembly, in which we may give thanks to the Son of God, our Lord JESUS CHRIST, for the whole work and benefit of the redemption and gathering of the Church, and appropriate His promises and merits to ourselves, and certainly believe that God will receive us. Some of the ancients called this custom Agapen (love feasts), because this communion was, as it were, a covenant of common love among the pious, and because in former times bread and other offerings for the poor were sacrificed or pooled.

Finally, we do not hold fairs to be like vain, empty, and ridiculous spectacles, but that in such meetings the sacrament of the true body and blood of Christ, according to his commandment or commandment, is acted and dispensed.

Contrast.

The adversaries, however, have brought a multitude of abominable errors into the church, and have passed off the mass not only as a sacrifice of thanksgiving or praise, but also as a sacrifice of atonement, and have said that it must be offered for the living and the dead, for sins, punishments, pardons, and other necessities.

And many have written before these times, that in the mass there is a sacrifice for the living and the dead, and that it merits forgiveness of sins and deliverance from the penalties of purgatory to him who does it, and to others, by the mere act (sx oxsr operato). They have also boldly taught that a bold and unlearned priest may, by the mere murmuring of the silent mass, not only to themselves, but also to all others who stand by, to bring about and acquire all manner of bodily good, as fresh life, good health, blissful well-being, desirable navigation, rich profit in trade and commerce, victory and happiness in the chase, and the like.

All of which has not the slightest ground in Scripture, was unknown in the old Catholic Church and orthodox antiquity, and obscures the true doctrine of the faith; therefore it is right for me to reject it and abolish it from the Church.

This is now, most invincible Emperor, Major of the Empire, most gracious Lord, the doctrine and opinion of both parts; and I wish and ask from the bottom of my heart that your Imperial Majesty may well and devoutly consider these on both sides in God. Majesty may well and devoutly consider and contemplate such on both sides in God, and may also finally conclude on which side she will incline and agree.

948. report of the gift presented to the imperial majesty and of the action of Valdesius with Philipp Melanchthon.

This document is the continuation of No. 939 and can be found at the locations indicated there.

On the aforementioned Saturday [June 18] the chapter of Augsburg received the imperial majesty and sent their gift, which he personally heard, and ordered the bishop of Hildesheim with eager eyes, so that it would be noticed, to say these words: the imperial majesty accepts the gift with grace, his majesty asks, together with his brother, to want God to give him the gift.

Ask the Almighty for him, as a poor sinner, to send him his Holy Spirit to instruct and teach him, so that he may establish a common and Christian order in these great matters and not anger God. If his eyes are open.

Alphonsus, 1) imperial. Majesty Hispan. Alphonsus, the Chancellor of Spain, and Cornelius, have had some friendly conversations with Philip, and have shown him that the Hispanics are persuaded that the Lutherans should not believe in God, nor in the Holy Trinity, nor in Christ and Mary, so that they thought that by slaying a Lutheran they were doing God a greater service than by slaying a Turk; Although he talked with them a great deal and explained what he was doing, he obtained nothing, and at last they left their opinion.

On Saturday, Alphonsus sent to Philip, informing him that he had been with the Emperor's Majesty that morning and had not had a more convenient place and time to speak with his Majesty for a long time, that he had informed the Emperor's Majesty of all the Lutheran articles, and that they believed nothing against the church. Did the emperor say: Huiä vGunt ä" nionueiis? And commanded Alphonsus to tell Philip that he should send a short list to his Majesty without all prolixity. That Philip did so, and therefore also commanded Alphonsus to go to the legate, and to deal with him therefrom, was also done so, and the shock is greatest everywhere in the mass. So, praise God, there is good hope. The emperor wanted to help the cause gladly, God also threw his means to him.

1) Alphonsus is Valdesius. - Cornelius Schopper, formerly in the service of the King of Denmark, now secretary to the Emperor.

Of the opening of the Diet, and of the public reading and delivery of the Augsburg Confession.

949: Address of the Papal Nuncio, Vincentius Pimpinellus, to the Emperor Carl V., King Ferdinand and the Estates. King Ferdinand, and to the Estates. 20 June 1530.

This speech is in Latin in Cölestin, Vol. I, p. 105. It was published in German in Augsburg in 1530 in octavo under the title: "eine oration; oder Rede vor Röm. Kays. Majest. Carolo V. Augusto, King, Princes, Princes and Estates of the Holy Roman Empire, delivered in Latin at the entrance of the present Imperial Diet, by the Reverend Vincent, Cimpinollo, Hereditary Bishop of Rossano, Papal See. Holiness' message. Most diligently translated."

Translated from the Latin by L. A. Tittel.

Vincentius Pimpinellus, Archbishop of Rossano, Apostolic Nuncio, sends his greetings to Her Most Holy Imperial and Catholic Majesty. Nuncio, his greetings!

Since, most noble emperor, the Christian religion has been brought about by the sins of men (as I believe), that it has almost never since the birth of Christ been in greater distress, and the little ship of Peter has been driven about in one place by so many sectarian eddies, it has needed a good hero and undaunted ruler in such perilous circumstances. And therefore God has chosen you an emperor, by whose government and institution everything would be kept in good condition, and what is broken and unstable would be mended and restored. For you have heard that the tyrant of the Turks has spread so far on one side that he has now already (after Greek-Weissenburg, Rhodus and Hungary have been taken away) devastated Austria, your ancient hereditary land, last year with fire and sword, as it were from the bottom; and not yet all know what we must wonder more at, whether the insolence of venturing into so distant a land, or the cruelty to all inanimate creatures, let alone to men themselves, without distinction of years.

(2) On the other hand, you see new evangelists and seducers of souls who have torn the Christian faith into so many pieces that it must necessarily either fall altogether or be called back to its former path. All this you alone, though you have your brother Ferdinand to help you, deny.

and the most supportive must bring to an end. And that it will be done happily, and that your excellent deeds will be highlighted throughout the world, for the encouragement (or succession) of all other princes and the immortal fame of the House of Austria, is the wish of Clement, the Roman Pontiff VII by that name, as a most faithful shepherd, every day from the bottom of his heart, and has indeed tried everything to this end so far. Who, although he praises your brother, the unconquerable king, for his spiritedness in all dealings, and admires his courage in the resistance against the Turks, has nevertheless wanted to assign me to him, not as an assistant, but as a visible witness of all his deeds and undertakings, and as a faithful messenger, who in everything, in the name of the apostolic see, would like to assist him with counsel and action (where such was needed against the raging enemies). Which I have also done most diligently.

(3) But to your Majesty, who is happily returning from tranquilized Italy, and wants to fight as an unconquerable Hercules against unheard-of many-headed monsters, he has placed the Cardinal Campegius, apostolic legate, as another Jolaus, 1) at your side, so that what your Durchl. puts down with the mace of imperial power, Campegius holds down with his learning and fiery eloquence. Campegius, with his erudition and, as it were, fiery eloquence, will hold down, and with your prestige prevent the monsters from rising again and gathering anew to our destruction. So there is no small salvation and happiness to be hoped for, since two kings, brothers, are leaders of such undertakings, and such a learned Cardinal-Legate contributes to such praise, and becomes a part of it. May God grant that our time may see you, as in the restoration of Christian harmony as courageous authors, so also in the restoration of the Catholic faith and the overcoming of the enemies as brave victors!

004 But since it is the work of you all to do valiantly, that I also might have something to do in this battlefield, it hath pleased me (by the commandment of our most holy Lord) to speak my mouth.

1) "Jolaus," son of Jphiclus, a constant companion of Hercules.

to make good use of it, and to make known what is necessary to be done. Not that I should first encourage you to do what you already find necessary, but that I might persuade others, who are lukewarm and perhaps do not have the same opinion, to do the same by more than one presentation.

(5) And therefore the most illustrious King Ferdinandus has seen fit to put into public print this, which, with your knowledge and will, was brought before the German princes the other day, with the usual ceremonies. And therefore the most illustrious King Ferdinandus has deemed it good to put into public print what, with your knowledge, was presented orally by me before the German princes the day before, with the usual ceremonies, so that all may read it, and not only Germans but also all other people may be informed of it. But because all your deeds are praised by all righteous men, and our writings are barked at by many envious minds, I did not want to let them go around in people's mouths and hands without protection and protection. Therefore, if they are not protected under your mace and supported by two strong pillars, they may easily fall.

(6) Therefore, I ask your sovereigns and implore them most diligently that what the sovereign Ferdinand has wanted to be issued, you protect with your sovereigns, so that it is read favorably by all, if not for my sake, then for your sake. And if some wish that I would have spoken more learnedly, more delicately, and more neatly, and would have set everything more wisely, as often happens, then they may look to my good intentions and plans, and for that reason refrain from censuring me, even what I was not able to do through lack of wit, they may replace abundantly and make better in the same piece, as they please; if they only do not spurn my bad things, which they see attributed to your Majesty, sanctified and secured, as it were, under your divinity. Farewell, fight and win!

Vincentius Pimpinellus, archbishop of Roffano, apostolic envoy and nuncio, speech delivered at Augsburg, June 20, 1) 1530, to the most illustrious king in Hungary and Bohemia, Ferdinandum rr. in the public imperial diet.

1. for the happiness and salvation of the Christian religion and tranquility of the Roman Empire and the whole world, let us pray to Almighty GOD that what I am about to speak in this place today,

1) In the old edition, by wrong resolution of the date in Latin: "the 19th of June". This was a Sunday. But it was not until Monday, June 20, that the Reichstag was opened. See No. 950.

so that it will not disappear from your hearts, but will be accomplished by you with the greatest zeal and diligence.

002 O God, who wilt not the death of sinners, but that they may be converted and live, look down to the help of Christians, and grant that the adversaries of the holy faith, who persist in their hardening, may, enlightened by the Holy Spirit, diligently return to thy ways from which they have long departed.

Whether I see many reasons, godly Carl and Emperor, all-time ruler of the empire, unconquerable King Ferdinand, and most worthy apostolic Cardinal Legate, Campegius, as well as all you other highborn, great princes, of what rank, honors and dignities you are ! Although, I say, I have many reasons why I could have declined today's duty to speak and left the burden, which is too heavy for me, to other learned and well-spoken men, I have nevertheless considered it more decent for me to be reprimanded by those present here, at my discretion, rather than to neglect my duty in this, because I could not have denied my duty without disgrace to my most holy Lord Clement, who entrusted me with this office.

004 But I am almost sorry for such a thing. For when I look at your fine assembly, which in majesty, nobility, and power is glorious above others, at which I now want to speak first; and if something should slip my mind that is not too well and delicately set, I do not see how it will be held to my credit. Not to mention that, if you should imagine (as tends to happen with new things) that you would hear something special from me, because a Roman, an archbishop, an apostolic envoy, who has long practiced the art of oratory, would necessarily give and present not words, but thunderbolts; not eloquence, but erudition never heard; not the art of persuasion, but the art of persuasion, as something heavenly; and you therefore expect such things and are of the firm opinion that I can do something, for which my ability is too weak, my reputation will necessarily decrease greatly if you see and hear in me not a god but a man, not a speaker of divine (and incomparable) but of human things, and not to wonder but according to ability.

005 But, on the contrary, this again comforts and encourages me, that I believe ye, though high and great, yet will very kind and fair judges, listen to me, and, if I should do so today, think that I have not stumbled with will, and that what I have done, I can mend; even if I have been annoyed by the presentation of a hateful and adverse matter, I can once again gain favor in a more pleasant matter.

6th Since it cannot be otherwise, I will speak, first, of the cruel nature of the Turkish war, secondly, how they must be overcome by us, and how easily they can be defeated, and thirdly, if you do so, what honor, benefit, and reward will come to you from it, with your most gracious permission. And now, before I have gone through this recently, I ask, according to your usual kindness, an attentive and highly favored hearing.

(7) If I were to recount here one by one all the terrible and bloody wars with which the cruel Turks have oppressed the neighboring peoples, and have undertaken to conquer and subdue almost the whole world to their empire because of Christian disunity, since they have conquered more countries than others desired (or might desire), and have so far done such great and famous deeds that I cannot express them all in words in so short a time, and therefore I will withhold them. If I wanted to tell you how many years they fought with the Hungarians, whom Christianity once defended so valiantly; what defeats and victories occurred now and then among themselves; how many prisoners were dragged away: it would certainly be annoying for me to tell you all this today, but it would be annoying for you to listen to such things.

(8) But if we want to tell of the unfortunate and lamentable destruction of Vienna and all of Austria, we will, as it were, proclaim our shame, and thereby secretly raise the bravery of the enemy to the heavens. For who must not admire and highly praise the Turks' march from such distant lands? while the Christians' lukewarmness, indeed, their sloth or malice, must be utterly detested?

009 But though I have been willing to describe the cruelty of the Turks, that ye may see therefrom how they, being tyrants, only desire to spoil all things, and to usurp and dominate them more and more, yet, if I should set forth all that hath happened to you to plague you, I will not abuse your patience, nor use vain endeavours therein.

010 For ye Germans know very well, and

I wish you did not know that the cruel Turks plagued you with fire, robbery, blood, destruction, fornication, violence, imprisonment, and other such horrible tortures for years past.

011 Ye Germans know, and God would that ye knew not, that the cities have been burned, the villages devastated, the vineyards uprooted, the seed substituted, the trees cut down, and at last all destroyed to the ground.

(12) You Germans know, and would to God you did not know, that men have been stabbed to death, that some have been cut in two, that others have had their limbs mutilated, that others have been buried in the ground, that others have been hanged in the air, and that others have been killed by hunger.

013 Ye Germans know, and would to God ye knew! you would not know that the women were cut out (torn open), and the womb torn out of the wounded place; the children partly smashed to pieces on stones, partly pierced through the gullets with pointed stakes, partly tied like rabbits to the saddles of horses at the back with their heads hanging down to the ground, before the miserable eyes of the parents, who have to watch such misery of the children, and so quickly dragged away, and soon after strangled (or suffocated).

014 Ye Germans know, and would to God ye knew not, the public cruelty of the enemies, yea, the mockery and public dishonour of the corpses, not that the spoils should be stripped and taken away from them, as war brings, but that, when all the precious things from the head to the legs had been taken, they should lie naked, and the shame of the Christians should be seen. As I have seen her lying naked and bare with my eyes, to the everlasting shame of Christianity and its unheard-of sloth.

015 And ye Germans, knowing this, do ye yet consider yourselves, do ye yet sleep, do ye yet shut your mouths for sloth!

(16) Where is your ancient strength? where is your valor? which before, though it was not seen, yet was feared of foreign nations? Would to God that this tale would not fit you for tears, which hardly puff for women, or for crying and weeping, so much for cowardly people; not for lamentation and pity, so only a female mind indicates, but for the fury, anger, hatred and revenge of you and the German nation's innocent blood to ignite and provoke! because today, as another Fabius Maximus, I bear war in the bosom, and no peace; death, and no life; fire, and

No water; revenge, and no kindness. You have lost goods, friends, wives, children, all things which, though they hurt, are to be repaid, and not so much as to be mourned over. For since all things are born to die, it matters not much whether the turn comes to one today or in a few years. For we are born to die. But who will replace our honor, glory, and name again, if you Germans, I say, do not do the same harm and damage to our enemies, even much worse harm and damage, and as they, without anyone's resistance (as could not have happened without your disgrace), have, as it were, come upon the necks of you defenseless ones? So also ye, who are armed, by your valour come to the assault of them, and snatch your spoils out of their hands, that they may be laden, and restore the cities, towns, and countries, which they possess by force, to their former liberty (as is due to valiant warriors)? All this you will easily accomplish with God and with your united might.

017 Ye have now lately heard of the tyrant's murders, and his bloody way of warring, and that he is no human ruler, but a very barbarous and savage executioner.

018 But now hear also how and in what manner he is to be destroyed, and how easily he may be beaten and overcome. We read that P. Scipio Nasica and Marcus Cato, very wise men, endeavored zealously with the Roman council, the one that Carthage, ever emulating the Roman majesty, might be destroyed; but the other that the neighbors and confederates might always be helped even in the smallest wars; that the warlike Romans, when they lived at Rome in the city in peace and comfort, would not learn the trade of war and become womanish; or, having a lack of foreign enemies, would begin internal wars. As long as they kept these rules (but always with zealous worship of their gods), they had such peace at home that they not only kept a quiet city for a long time, but also, because they kept the religion and helped their friends, neighbors, and confederates, they used it to help themselves and expand their dominion.

(19) It is a beautiful thing, noble lords, to keep the sacred orders of your ancestors, and to help others in such a way that you do not neglect yourself; to keep the fire from your neighbor's house so that your own does not burn. Therefore also you, dear Germans, do not despise such great people's rules and admonitions, from which you can hope for peace, your descendants for glory, and the empire for continuity.

020 Are the Germans, who before were so devoted to religion and war, and so strong and experienced in body, warfare, and valor, to lie idle and idle at home, with religion set aside? What a shame it is that those who were accustomed to teach others Christianity are now lacking in it themselves and are being punished for it? and that the Turk keeps on tearing in and destroying everything as he pleases, while the Germans sit quietly by without keeping such devastation from themselves and their neighbors' borders? Beware lest, through the wrath of God, if you do not take foreign wars to heart, you again become entangled in internal ones!

If God had willed, you would have saved and preserved other places according to Cato's example, so that you would not now have to worry about your own. Would to God that you had helped Hungary before it was so miserably oppressed by the robbers! which you could have protected much more easily and comfortably than you can now save from the enemies.

022 But as ye have denied your power unto your neighbours and confederates, so they have inflicted a great slaughter upon you first, and then also upon Hungary and Austria.

(23) Beware, ah! beware, lest, when you still have to deal with inner dissension, and again keep the enemy low and do not come to the aid of your neighbors, you atone for such unbelief and obstinacy once, but too late. Only look at the wretched and unhappy Austria's misery, which lies torn and miserable before you on its knees, and not without tears begs for help, and cries out to you as friends, allies, neighbors and fathers. And if you do not hold their destruction as well as your own, then I must call you justly hard and inexorable.

024 The council and people of Rome, though they were heathen, and far from the right religion, yet were not so slothful as to keep their religion, nor to suffer their enemies so. For they cared for nothing more than to propitiate their gods, whether they had already been invented, with their usual and own ceremonies, and to avenge their enemies' wrongs and violence, even in the slightest, with force, fire, and sword, always saying, which has now almost become a proverb: if one tolerates the old wrong, one gives rise to a new and different one. For this reason, they have started fierce wars even in the smallest matter, so that the reputation and dignity of the Roman council and people may be preserved in the eyes of the people.

foreign peoples would be preserved unbreakably. But you Germans, who are Christians and worshippers of the true and almighty God, with contempt for the sacred customs of your mother, the Church, want to let the greatest insolence of the enemy and his unheard-of knavery go unsmelled?

025 The Romans believed that Varro, the mayor of Cannae, had fought unhappily with the Carthaginians on account of Juno, whom he had offended; but you Germans think that if you have abolished the true sacrifice, denied the sacraments, cast down the priestly reputation, even against the will of him who is a Lord of hosts, valiant and mighty in battle, you will conquer and smite the enemies?

026 The Romans have sought to pull down and destroy Corinth, a city of great renown in Greece, because they might have heard falsely that their ambassadors were not kept honest enough: and will ye let live them which have afflicted your friends, your kindred, your brethren, your children, with all manner of torments, and have not only heard them, but have seen them with your eyes?

(27) The Romans, because of a false god, Aesculapius, cut down the grove which Turullius, the commander of M. Antony's war, had hewn down to build ships, and when the imperial army overcame Antony, they first had Turullius cruelly beaten in that very place and then cut to pieces: but you Christians will let such robbers of the temples of the true God and destroyers of the sanctuaries live? Virginus, a Roman, though of low estate, yet noble in mind and deeds, has publicly stabbed with a dagger his daughter, whom Appius Claudius, one of the ten men, only wanted to provoke to fornication, and you, of such a noble estate, want to let those who have really violated your daughters, without thinking of your honor, run over them like this and close your eyes to it?

028 Come now, dear Germans, when all the Roman power has come to you; if you wish to be rightly called the heirs of the religion, the dominion, and the warfare of the Romans, keep above that which you have received, and make yourselves ever more worthy of a higher glory, and let no such mischief be done in your lives.

029 Let the miseries of your cities, which ye cannot leave, be a matter of public concern unto you; let the contempt of religion, the profaned sanctuaries, the honour and chastity of your wives, for which ye have the chief care, move you, that this may stir you up to pity, pity to hatred, hatred to war. For ye shall

You will become peasants again, or slaves of the Turks, or lead a miserable and pitiful life as exiles. Neither nobility nor wealth will help you, but rather the enemies will be attracted to attack you and take them away because of your discord. Consider the outcome; consider the cases, and learn (as befits wise men) to avoid your pending misfortune by other means. No repentance will help where there hath been no counsel or forethought.

030 Alas! that ye might hear your captive sons, and the noble women carried away into the worst servitude, speak. Day and night they would ask nothing but that your brave hands might be stretched out to them for salvation, or that death might come upon them, for the quieting of their lamentation and their anxiety.

31. So it is for you to overcome the fierce enemies and to snatch the captives out of their hand. It is for you to bind and to loose the bound. It is up to you to save and deliver Christendom, which you will now do without hindrance, since you may not have been able to do so before.

32 For since you, most invincible Emperor Carl (for so I must address you, the Savior of Christendom), since you, I say, have gone to Italy, where everything was full of war and inner hostility, everything was found sick and, as it were, already decayed by you, you have appeared as a desired physician who, even with the mere arrival, immediately restores the sick and brings them back to life with the promise of health. For you, as if sent by God, have healed all the wounds of Italy with your wisdom, care, patience, and most delicious medicine. How much hatred, strife, and discord have you, as the sun, dispelled! and you have not come there both for your crown, honor, and praise (though all should burst who think otherwise!) and for the love of the Christian faith, the desire for peace, and the hope of calming all in the bet.

033 For when ye saw that the tyrant would come soon after, calling from the former war to another, and from the sword to another, ye yourselves, according to the example of our Saviour Jehovah Christ, whom ye follow continually in all things, sought to lift yourselves up from the uttermost parts of the west, and to bring peace with us. Neither rain, nor weather, nor storm, nor sour ways, nor any other affliction of yours and yours, has been able to keep you from helping us, and save us from want, fear, and death itself.

(34) Therefore, through your virtue and your word, peace has come: everything that had lain down and wanted to perish before is laughing and living again, which thanks you for its life, salvation and peace. If God had willed, you would not have departed from there in such a timely manner, and could have strengthened poor Italy, which is only now recovering, and left everything in it well and efficiently preserved and cleansed. But so, most wise emperor, it is the duty of a prudent householder to see first of all where the danger is greatest.

035 And therefore, since ye have helped up Italy, which was in danger, and saved her from further fall, ye have risen up in Germany: You have risen up in Germany, that you may restore this sick and devastated empire, which is oppressed by many hardships. Which you will easily do, because you are an excellent, wise and happy physician, and whoever is healed by you will, which is something rare in these days, never again become ill in eternity.

036 Now that the quarrels of the French have been quieted by the emperor, and (for I turn again to you Germans) you will also have quieted your quarrels in the Christian faith, how easily will you not be able to start the Turkish war?

(37) You will not lack Italian power; nor will Clement VII, the Roman Pontiff, who is the most benevolent in name and in deed, arise, but with his fathers, by his prestige and fortune, will help in so great a war, and, according to need, will himself take all trouble, danger, and hardship, that he may be first in such a war, and will by all means omit nothing, by which the salvation and peace of the world may be promoted.

38 You, most noble King Ferdinand, can especially testify to the help, money, and gifts he sent you, so that he would not leave you in your distress. And if other Christian princes had followed his example, they could not only have prevented the defeat of the past year, but could also have chased the tyrant out of Hungary and the Turks away from its borders.

039 Nor will the most Christian king Franciscus come into being, for he should no longer wish to bear this high surname, as all would judge, since he is called the most Christian not only from the protection of the Christians, but also from the extermination of the unbelieving enemies.

40. nor Henry, the king of England, the protector of the faith, he would rather (God forbid!) the same persecutor (or exterminator) because that is just as much as persecuting when one leaves and does not protect one.

(41) Nor Joannes, the most powerful king in Portugal, who is the diligent successor of his ancestors. Nor the brave and pugnacious Spaniards, whose valour and prudence we shall perhaps praise in some other, more convenient place, where not now, and their victories and praise, which they deserve not to be hidden, with full mouths.

042 Neither shall all other Christian princes, by whatsoever name they may be called, come into being. And if they come into being (which we do not believe), you alone will do it. Let this, you noble Germans, be your own praise!

043 And the multitude of the Turks need not terrify you: for valiant men need never ask, How many are they? but, Where are the enemies? Where are the enemies? He that would rule over many must contend with many. Their power is indeed very great, but God's power is much greater, as it scatters and smites everything before it, wherever it wishes, like dust, chaff, and stubble. It is GOD alone who strengthened and conquered Moses, Joshua, the Maccabees, David, and others who prayed and fought with small multitudes against innumerable ones. He it is whose hand shall help you, and whose arm shall give you strength. It is he who is able to do all things; who gives and takes away, in whose hand is life and death, war and peace. For with God there is nothing so hard that will not be made easy, nothing so firm that will not be easily and completely conquered by you.

044 But so, that, when ye fight against the Turks, ye first fight against yourselves, and reconcile the Almighty God, whom ye desire to have on your side, and so establish the faith of Christ, that ye may be sure that neither can stand without the other. I will not mention the examples, I will not mention the ancient victories, I will not mention the many miracles of our time.

(45) The Turks have plenty of money, but chiefly that which they have torn from the hands of the Christians by force, and which they have acquired almost every year by ransoming your prisoners. But you do not lack money either. You have large numbers of people, and among them more Christians than Turks are soldiers; but you also have enough people. They are swift, and that is the praise of horses. You, however, have much more in the way of cavalry and heart. The Turks always win. But not so much by their valour as by your slothfulness do they overcome all that they will. Awake, and consider all things aright, and ye may have as much or more in all things than the Turks.

(46) Consider only the tradition, consider the way of life. They are base, ye noble. They womanish, ye manly. You weak and soft Asiatic peoples, you hard and strong Germans. They robbers, and therefore fearful; you (as you have always had this praise) faithful, honest men. But if they are superior to you in anything, it is only the wit and strength of the captive Christians that makes them attack you and throw you to the ground, if you do not believe nor arm yourselves properly.

047 But do ye think that all the captives will be able to bear their cruel tyranny and servitude<sup>2</sup> and that, when they shall see you armed, they will be able to hope that by your help they will obtain the victory over the enemy, and not fall to you, or let any occasion pass, when they shall show themselves the enemies of the Turks? They will be the first to go out with you against the Turks, that they may one day be free from their hand, which is so burdensome to them; the first to fight against the unbelievers.

048 But the Turks especially fight against you with two principal enemies, namely, by your discord, and by their supreme concord, which they love and value as a goddess on earth.

Dear Germans, do not take it amiss if I tell you the truth here. I name (as that one says) no one, therefore no one must be angry with me who will not first show himself met. For the Turks are under one prince, whom they obey; but among the Germans there are many who obey no one. It is the Turks alone by whose unanimous counsel all things go well, but among the Germans there are many by whose discord all things come to ruin.

(50) Those do not think that they are wiser than the ancients, and therefore, by following them, they always gain new kingdoms. But among the Germans there are many who ridicule their ancestors as fools, and therefore acquire the name of new servants. The Turks live under one law, custom, and religion; but among the Germans there are many who are always devising new laws, new orders, new religions, and keeping them as they please, but ridiculing the old as something rotten and stinking. They spoil and destroy the unsewn skirt of Christ, which is already torn into many pieces.

051 The true and most honourable doctrines of Christ, which have been ordered by the consent of so many pious fathers, and confirmed by the Holy Ghost, they corrupt out of devilish conceit, and make of them mere buffoonery and shameful things.

052 But if this monster should give birth to anything, you should at least have had a better, wiser, and holier faith brought forth in the place of the former, that you might have departed without foolishness and shame from the true way of our ancient fathers, which always has been and always will be the best.

(53) Would to God that you had not only deceived the poor, gullible people, but also the pious and prudent princes, with your evil and poisonous teaching! But I have many things to say, which I pass over with diligence, lest I fall into a rich field, over which a great laborer (husbandman) is tilled, who (with your, the princes', permission) will make all the fruits better by his wisdom, diligence, and teaching.

(54) I return to my purpose. How much are Aristides and Themistocles praised among the Greeks, who were always sent away as envoys or commanders; and therefore, even though they were enemies, they were still in the habit of leaving all enmity and injustice at the borders of the Athenian region, and then (if it pleased them) wanted to accept them again on their return.

55 Cretinas and Hermias, who, in the Mithridatic war, contended in the city for the supreme dominion, were also esteemed as worthy of praise; but afterwards, seeing that the commonwealth was perishing through their enmity, they did not refuse to cede the dominion to each other, so that Cretinas at last took possession of the city with his counsel, but Hermias departed with his wife and child, and let go the long-sought dominion.

056 This is true peace, this is harmony, and consequently the salvation of cities and countries, by which small things are lifted up. There is victory, life, and dominion. With peace dwelleth righteousness, with peace truth, with peace bliss. If, then, you consider these things, according to the examples of Aristides and Themistocles, Cretins and Hermits, you will drive out discord by unity, and disunity by unity, and selfishness by common good:

57 If you imitate Father Scipio Nasica, M. Cato, the Roman people, and, after the manner of your forefathers, keep the one holy Catholic faith, you will not sit still at home, but will help your neighbors and covenant relatives, and will respect other people's suffering as well as your own.

058 What fear ye of the Turk? What of the infidel barbarians? What of the whole

What is the world like? Send yourselves to this blessed war, and be loosed from the cords of wicked men, that ye may do this.

59. Poor devastated Hungary waits from you, to whom you cannot refuse help. For if it has resisted the Turk for many years at its own expense, and has covered the whole of Christendom with its power, why, now that it is exhausted and miserably oppressed by its enemies, should not all of you hasten to its aid? since not only your peace, but also the common peace of all, with its salvation and preservation, rests on it.

60 Therefore, if you will (as is proper and right) do with all diligence what we hope of you, only hear patiently and attentively what glory, benefit, and welfare you will have from it.

(61) Two things are chiefly implanted in man, which it is difficult for men who are otherwise sensible (rntioni osäsrrckidns) to refrain from, namely, virtue and honor or glory; the one of which is the preserver of souls, but the other is a child (ulrrmnn) of the body. For virtue is repugnant to vice, and he who desires it forsakes all that is shameful, and acquires what is honorable. But honor (or glory) is the reward of our bodies and of our good deeds. And if the desire for honor is not present, it can, as anyone can easily see, be of great benefit to the soul.

(62) Virtue is attained by good morals and a well-directed life, but honor is attained by valiant deeds and great examples. For the sake of virtue, St. Paul, St. Anthony, St. Benedict, St. Hilarius, St. Jerome, and many others went into forests, lonely and desolate places, and sustained themselves with water, dates, sedge, and herbs.

For the sake of honor Curtius threw himself into a pit; the two Decians sacrificed themselves; Mucius Scävola burned his right hand; not to mention others. But how much more blessed will you Germans be, if you will diligently carry out what I advise you to-day. I do not call you to go into solitude to attain virtue; I do not desire that you eat herbs, or drink water, or put on sackcloth and scourge yourselves, or walk barefoot, but that you go to war well armed, well clothed, well fed, yet with restoration of the sacred customs of your ancestors, for which the

1) OMLikus, where it should not be dry figs, 6nrfoi8 (Walch). - Perhaps rndieidus (roots) is to be read. For enrioikus (from enrex) is sedge. Heaven will be opened, but hell will be closed. But if you seek honor, which is the desire of all good souls, what better opportunity can you have for a greater reward and a more glorious recompense than this holy and righteous war, which no man can blame you for? For ye seek not to destroy Christians, but to preserve them; not to shed their blood, but to subdue, or at least to keep off, the enemies of Christendom. Who will blame this? Who will not praise it?

64. After this I exhort you, not to conquer and take away any little spots, huts, or deserts, but great cities, mighty and famous kingdoms, dominions, silver, gold, precious stones, which I hope you will not spurn. And so you may see what tokens of victory, honor, praise, and immortal glory await you.

65. For when ye have stripped off the shells of the wicked teachers, who bring forth none of their own, but have brought forth again to your destruction the sheepish opinions, which have long since been rejected and laid aside by the most holy Conciliarities; And when the godly princes have subdued their wickedness, ye shall pluck the holy city Jerusalem, the sepulchre of our most glorious Lord JEsu Christ, the place of Judaism, Mount Oel, Mount Sion, and other places where our Saviour shed his blood, out of the hands of unbelieving dogs and vile murderers, and shall hereafter gain more kingdoms and countries, and spread the borders of Christendom everywhere.

(66) Soon you will restore the Hungarians, too, such pious and Christian men, who were so useful to you in the past, who protected and preserved the Christian faith for so long, to their property, from which they were driven by the wickedness of the foreigners. To you the pious will entirely ascribe their fatherland and their peace (where they are grateful). All this, as I have promised you, will bring bliss to the soul, and immortal name and fame to the body. So shall ye also ward off war and sedition, as wise men are wont to do, from your borders, because the calamity is on your head and your destruction. Finally you will catch (as they say) two wild sows in one forest (or with one effort create two kinds of good).

67 For you will protect Ferdinandum, your son, foster child (nlumnuin), friend and benefactor, the king in Hungary, against all false kings and wicked adversaries in his kingdom, and save you from many a vexation.

(68) For the good prince knows not to whom he should take refuge, but to you Germans. To whom, if you (as is fair, and his virtue certainly seems to deserve it) will restore his kingdoms and crush his enemies, he will not only not be allowed to continue to ask you for help, money, and assistance, but will rather dedicate all his income, all his kingdoms, principalities, and everything he has or can have to your will and make it your territory.

(69) I ought to state here all the reasons why the Germans should not have refused to help you, most noble King Ferdinand. But it could not be told without your great praise. But since I know that you do not like to be praised at present, because you are so chaste that, when you hear your own praise, you are overcome with distress, and you would rather hear the praise of others and the deeds of brave men, which you also like to do, than your own in your presence, then I will rather with diligence conceal what good you have done in this your youth, both because not everything can be said in a short time, and because you are so great and praiseworthy that you do not need my fame, but are famous before in the whole world.

70. But how will you, dear Germans (that I may come upon you again), be rightly called worthy, if you will bring back and restore the true Christian faith, which has been almost entirely driven out everywhere, so that it may, as it were, come back through you after a long time; if you prepare yourselves for this holy, just, and necessary war; when you shall seize the kingdoms and dominions of your enemies; when you shall protect your neighbors and confederates by the right of nature; when you shall avenge the wrong done you; when you shall drive your enemies from your borders; when you shall restore King Ferdinand, as is right, to his kingdom. All the fairest epithets of the ancients will be attached to you alone. For ye shall be just, godly, friendly, wise men; ye shall be called the vanquishers of tyrants, and the saviours of kings by all right.

(71) Whatever you do, therefore, whatever you contribute to the preservation of religion, whatever you use and direct in this war, all this will be attributed to you. You will have no companion in this, for without you no one will be victorious. The common good rests on you. Others protect the fatherland, others the parents, others their own goods; but you will not only protect all this, but also Christ, the Redeemer of the world.

and the whole world, and preserve them unharmed. You will be quite blessed, and will be praised with one mouth by all Christians. The holy Mother, the Church, will call you children, heirs, and, with disregard for others, saviors. You will be the ones by whose salvation and life our salvation and life will be preserved. To you shall be rightly honoured; to you shall be due reward; to you shall be prepared triumph, crowns, and titles of honour. Those will be considered unworthy of the Christian name who will not pray, vow, and sacrifice for you. And because I firmly conclude from your beckoning and attention that you are quite ready and well disposed for these two necessary and most holy works, that you need no further coaxing from me, I will pass over the rest with silence.

(72) I only have to say that because you, most blessed Emperor Carl, have willingly accepted such points, which otherwise would not be suitable for your Highness and imperial name, that you only want to calm everything down, and you, most invincible (bravest) King Ferdinand, day and night for the entire Germany and other Christian princes. You, most invincible (bravest) King Ferdinand, have been concerned day and night for the harmony of the whole of Germany and other Christian princes, so that you may bring about what is and is called Christian, and that peace in Italy may be sown by you, as much as possible, in such a way that the whole world may reap abundant fruit from it: We must entreat the Almighty God with one another to keep the peace in Italy continually, because it is well seen that life and death, salvation and destruction of the entire Christian religion hang on it as on a delicate thread. And if some maliciously want to prevent such peace from lasting long, nor the Christian religion from recovering; if some do not want to give help against that seven-headed serpent, the tyrant of the Turks; if some do not want to allow Hungary, as the stronghold of our faith, to be conquered again, Austria to be protected, Germany to be defended: then we call you, St. Peter and Paul, of the Christian faith. Peter and Paul, heads and causes of the Christian faith, that you, key-bearer, lift up rock-hard and sluggish hearts of all princes and men; and you, sword-bearer and chosen vessel, cut away, separate, and set apart such unheard-of hardness from the hearts of mortals.

73. Come in the clouds of heaven, scatter the nations that love to war against the Christians, and convert these sorcerers of Simone, these Xttilus and Dotilus, as many as they are, and bring them back to the former Christian faith. And if their wickedness (which God does not want!) is so great that they will not be converted by you holy apostles, they will not be converted by you holy apostles.

If they blindly honor the enemy, the devil, more than they honor God, our Savior; if they concede more to unbelievers than to Christians, and without mercy on the incoming faith will mock and crucify Jesus Christ again: let not, then, thou, redeemer of all men, the human race, which is wholly devoted to thee, be lost through the faithlessness of some wicked men; but smite them, O LORD, smite them, that they may have locusts, moths, and maggots enough; Let them be blinded and ravaged, that their ways be not right; let them lack the fruit of the olive tree, and the fields yield no meat; let the sheep be plucked out of the folds, that there be no cattle at the manger; let death take hold of them, and let them go alive into hell!

(74) But if they think of human weakness, and turn to thee, and set thee, O God, before their eyes; if they will honour thy holy catholic and apostolic church (how just) with a sincere heart; if they will not break the bonds of peace; if they will assist Ferdinand against the Turks: let all things prosper and be well with them continually!

75. Give them, O LORD Almighty, abundant blessings, that the rivers may flow to them with milk and honey, that the earth may bear them seed of its own accord; let them not, O LORD, lack any good. Their flocks, their herds, their flocks, their flocks shall increase and be blessed; their years shall be many and long, that they may see their children's children and their offspring. The fish of the sea and the birds of the air must be obedient to them, so that all may know that you, O LORD, are lord over all, giving to each one according to his works; you alone do great wonders.

950. narration of the previously held mass de Spiritu Sancto and the subsequent opening of the Imperial Diet.

This document is the continuation of No. 939 and 948. The location is given at No. 939.

On Sunday [June 19], His Imperial Majesty received the Sacrament of the Holy Cross. Majesty, according to his usage, received the reverend Sacrament of the Holy Cross, and after noon summoned all the princes to him, and, for the sake of the session, made them friendly, which could never have happened before at any Imperial Diet. On Monday [June 20] the Mass de Spiritu Sancto, with all its glory, was sung; the Archbishop of Mainz officiated. After the Orocko that orator xontiuious a quick Oration in Latin and German language; promise me, it will be printed and scholirt 1). After the oration was done, the Emperor's Majesty went to the sacrifice. Majesty went to the sacrifice, and the Elector of Saxony presented him with the sword. Afterwards the king and all the princes went to the sacrifice, but ours with laughter; only the landgrave did not sacrifice, but was present at the mass.

After Mass, Imperial Majesty rode up to the house. Majesty rode with the princes and chieftains to the house, where the Imperial Diet began, and two things were held before them for deliberation according to length: first, that one should deliberate how one wants to appear before the Turk, and second, that each prince should put his opinion of religion into writings on the morrow of Wednesdays, in two languages, one Latin, the other German. Be it known to me, Your Imperial Majesty. Majesty will act on the matter in his own council, since the princes are opposed to this.

This much is acted hitherto. Be warned with this; if rumor should come that our princes should have given way somewhat, then know that it is not true. They have, at the highest request of Imperial Majesty. Majesty, and especially the Elector for the sake of his office, they could not refuse to go with them to church. However, they protested earlier that the mass is none of their business, and they do not want to pay homage to it, as has happened. To this end, they do not refrain from preaching, but rather interpret the commandment, because the papists are also not allowed to preach, and those whom His Imperial Majesty has appointed from high authority are not allowed to preach. Majesty has decreed from high authority, must say nothing more than the Gospel, without all interpretation. Here the eating of meat, and other things, is not challenged. Ask God to give his Holy Spirit to preserve his divine word and common peace.

951. lecture of Count Palatine Frederick in the name and in the presence of the Emperor to the estates of the Empire, held on Monday, June 20, 1530, at Augsburg.

This document is found in Latin in Cölestin, Vol. I, p. 116 and in Chyträus, p. 53; in German in Chyträus' German edition of the History 2c. p. 99. The second part, concerning religion, is also found in the German editions: in the Wittenberg (1569), vol. IX, p. 442b; in the Jena (1566), vol. V, p. 99 (wrong 92); in the Altenburg, vol. V, p. 225, and in the Leipzig, vol. XX, p. 213. Also in Müller's Hist. p. 564.

1) "scholirt" will mean: to be provided with bulkheads, glosses.

First proposition point, concerning the Turkish War.

1. Majesty, our most gracious Lord, has no doubt that her Majesty's dear friends, nephews, brothers, grandparents, princes and commoners of the Holy Roman Empire have in fresh memory and good knowledge that her Imperial Majesty was first elected by a unanimous vote of God Almighty to the dignity and height of the Imperial office and government of the Holy Roman Empire, and that her Royal Majesty was first elected by a unanimous vote of God Almighty to the dignity and height of the Imperial office and government of the Holy Roman Empire. The Holy Roman Empire was first elected by a unanimous vote, and received its royal crown at Aachen. They received their royal crown at Aachen, held a general imperial diet at Worms, and thereupon they discussed the affairs and necessities of the Holy Roman Empire. They have also been able to act with the highest and most gracious diligence in the matters and necessities of the Holy Roman Empire that existed at that time. When, at the same time, in the Diet that was or is still in progress, her Imperial Majesty was confronted with enemies of the Holy Roman Empire, the Holy Roman Emperor was forced to take action. When, at the same time, in the same Imperial Diet, which was standing or was still in progress, her Imperial Majesty was opposed with enmity against her Majesty, and war and hostile acts were begun and practiced, and her Majesty conceded such great and excellent causes as were possible, that, although she had fully consented to remain longer in the Empire, she had again made her departure therefrom to her Majesty's hereditary kingdoms. Hispanic hereditary kingdoms; however, with the good knowledge and will of the estates of the empire, after that all necessary business and things of the holy empire had been previously established and decided, and with the consent, advice and decision of the estates, her dear brother Ferdinand, of Hungary and Bohemia, whom her Maj. respects no differently than her Maj. himself, to her Majesty's state. himself, as her Majesty's governor, and appointed and established a regiment in the Holy Roman Empire consisting of princes, chieftains and all the other estates; which governor and regiment had all the power, in the absence of her Majesty from the realm, to do and act everything that the realm's necessity and the matters at hand required, as if her Majesty herself were present. (little, content of the order, reserved); and for this purpose also her Majesty's brother and governor, also the regiment, have not spared their persons' trouble, labor and expense, but have at all times done all that has been possible to his love and to them in the form of the things and events that have occurred after such Diet of Worms was held, and have been contrary to the edict and order made and committed thereon, so that at her Majesty's command, for the preservation of peace and rights in the kingdom, the kingdom may be preserved. For the preservation of peace and rights in the Holy Roman Empire. For this reason, her Majesty has left the empire with less complaint to the kingdoms mentioned above.

(2) After which Her Majesty's Re-arrival in Hispania, Her Majesty. has now been informed that not only have some troublesome things occurred, but also that there has been some disagreement between the inhabitants of the Holy Roman Empire of the German Nation, on account of the Christian religion and otherwise, but also that the hereditary enemy of the Christian name and faith, the Turk, is in the process of damaging some of the Christian frontiers, namely the kingdom of Hungary; as he has begun to do, and has thus conquered by force some of the gates and passes of the place. For this reason Her Imperial Majesty has been pleased with him. Majesty's brother and brother-in-law, King Louis of Hungary, by his and the common country's excellent message, to her Majesty's governor and regiment in the Holy Land. Governor and Regiment in the Holy Empire, thus and besides also with her Majesty's Commissaries and Orator. The Holy Roman Emperor, the commissaries and orators, and also the princes, princes and estates of the Imperial Diet held at Nuremberg at that time, have the invading danger and distress, which they then had to worry about from the Turks, after the capture of Greek-Weissenburg and other passes of the Hungarian country, and have especially indicated, in addition to others, that they, the Hungarians, carrying the complaint of the Turks, would be one thing with the same imperial estates and other Christians, and would bear a common danger on them. And if they, the Hungarians, were not provided with substantial help, that they would be too weak to avert the Turk's authority and force from them; where they would also be assisted in time, so that they, the Hungarians, would not only meet with sufficient salvation for their fortune, along with other help from the empire, but would also intend to conquer again by force what they had been deprived of. If, however, they were ever not supplied with the shell, they would, as is to be feared, be subjected to Turkish power themselves, and thus not only would no longer be able to prove salvation or help to other Christians who were attacked, but would also be forced to act against them as the enemy of the Christians. All with further narration of the same messages, advertising how formerly the Christian empire of Constantinople and Trapezium, the kingdom of Bosnia, Dalmatia, and a large part of Croatia, together with many other kingdoms, lands, and regions, were also conquered by the Turk, thus, that in a short time the Turk has extended his power to such an extent that, besides many other nations and great lands, he has forced two empires and twenty kingdoms under his power, all of which are subjected to him with the most burdensome and humiliating servitude, and must wait and serve him.

of the same Hungarian message, also the pressing danger which would certainly arise not only for the Crown of Hungary, but also subsequently for common Christendom, their Imperial Majesty has taken to heart and, in order that this danger might be countered in haste, has issued to their Majesty the order previously presented by the common imperial estates at the Imperial Diet of Worms. Majesty has therefore taken to heart, and, in order that this danger may be countered in haste, has taken the measures formerly taken by the common estates of the Empire at the Diet of Worms for Her Majesty's march to Rome and the attainment of Her Majesty's crown. Rome and the attainment of her imperial crown. And because the same had promised and granted help for such necessary work and rescue of the Hungarians against the Turks, they had willingly agreed to follow it. And because the same aid granted to her Majesty was not followed at that time by the Hungarians, but in part by the Hungarians to the rescue of the Hungarians, and because the Hungarians were not able to shoot them at that time, then that the Turk, after the conquest of Greek-Weissenburg, as reported above, had taken other passes and towns in Hungary, other passes and towns in Hungary were taken, with grievous damage and destruction of the Christian people, and then also overrun not far from Rhodes, and after a hard siege were subdued under his power, which were two strong fortresses and passes against the Turk, on which there was no small comfort to Christendom; And because the reported Turk then directed his power to the Hungarian country, after further conquest of many passes, castles and best places, the above-mentioned King Louis and his warriors, who were thus forced by his, the Turk's, rage and invasion to salvation and resistance, were defeated in the field, and thus the Christian army was laid low with difficulty; So that the same King Louis perished, and the said Turk followed his victory, forced all castles, cities and towns between the rivers Sau and Drava by force, and Ofen, the capital in Hungary, and Pesth opposite, also other towns and cities, so that they were also thoroughly plundered and burned, many Christian peoples beaten, and the survivors dragged away with considerable goods; That he also became insatiable, but from one victory to another to damage and ruin the Christian lands much more meager and eager, then directed his fierce mind on common Christianity and especially on the German nation, and her Majesty's kingdom and principality of Croatia and Kram invaded, burned, devastated and from it led away more than thirty thousand people, male and female, and those who did not want to follow with the robbery, cruelly murdered.

004 And now most recently, in the year next past 1529, with such great power, as before and since the time of Attila, who was a scourger

God, has never been heard, has again and in his own person marched on Hungary, has again thoroughly devastated the same from all sides, has immediately thereafter turned his innumerable military campaign on her Majesty's lands of Lower Austria. There he besieged the capital of Vienna, and with cruel challenge he pressed and coerced it, and besides, with his roving troops, on the side where Vienna is situated, he roamed everywhere with great rage, and destroyed, devastated, and burned everything that was before him, far and wide, near Linz, up to the water, the Ens, old and young Christians and children with inhuman fury, and also many women and virgins, as often happened before, and is his, the Turk's, practice and desire, abused to their worst will, and otherwise dragged away like cattle with them, besides a noticeable plunder.

(5) Whereupon, if the reported hereditary enemy of our Christian name and faith had not departed, her Majesty was completely determined and prepared to put aside all things, and to oppose it personally with all her might, and to put all her fortune into it, as her Majesty wrote to the said her brother, and also to the chief captain of the estates in the Holy Roman Empire, and also to the knights and men-at-arms who were besieged in Vienna. to the aforesaid her brother, likewise to the chief captain of the estates in the Holy Roman Empire, also of the knights and men of war who were besieged in Vienna, and finally put them off, that they should completely leave it, but nevertheless, as her Maj. understood, refrained from the Turk's departure. and, for many good reasons and motives, considered it best and most useful to bring and place the Italian lands in peace and tranquillity before her Majesty's departure; also to dispose of the city of Bononia for Papal Holiness, and to act with her Holiness in this and other matters concerning the welfare of the whole of Christendom, including our holy faith; as is further understood in her Majesty's proclamation of this Imperial Diet.

6th That also hereafter Her Majesty, when she found that the supreme necessity of things, reported in the mentioned notice of this Diet, and especially thought of our hereditary enemy the Turk and of our holy faith, required the same Diet to be held; besides which, she considered and judged it best and most useful to take her royal crown there at Bononia immediately, as she has done; which crown, as being manly knowing, her Majesty might well have taken at Rome without some objection and hindrance. without any objection or hindrance at Rome, dispose of herself thence in her Majesty's kingdom of Neapolis, and of the same excellent objects and things, which are especially present at the time, and the kingdom's welfare and her Majesty's benefit. But in this case Her Majesty has also set aside them so that she may promote the common Christian benefit, as she has always been and has been inclined to do, and so that they may come and appear here at this Imperial Diet the sooner.

(7) And even though he, the Turk, has not been able to conquer the city of Vienna by the providence of God and by the fortified hand and salvation of the knights and men of war who were in it, nevertheless her Majesty the Archduchy of Austria has suffered such great damage to the land and the people by such ravages that it may not soon be recovered and restored. And even if he, the Turk, nevertheless withdrew at that time, he nevertheless left his followers, Masha and captains, behind him at the borders there and decreed that since then the Kingdom of Hungary and Crabaten [Croatia], also the German nation of Austria, Styria 1) and Carniola, have been challenged with constant assault and incessant damage. Moreover, nothing else and nothing more certain is to be assumed than that he will again break in for his opportunity and his advantage, with previously used and perhaps more power and rage (because he is now unfortunately bordering with Christendom), to persecute Christendom, especially also the German nation, thus without ceasing with constant challenge, and to thoroughly and finally destroy and exterminate it. And what and how much the Turks, before and after the conquest of Constantinople, have taken with no less cruelty and Christian bloodshed, weakened Christendom, and thus forced it into a corner and a place, is partly shown above; and because it may be manly to pity and complain more than is necessary to tell at length.

8. What deeds and rages, which have thus been accomplished with the loss of many Christian lands and people, also with cruel bloodshed, all Christian members and estates should ever consider with heartfelt compassion, and take an example from the past deeds, and thus certainly hold for it, where now, however, as before, they have acted negligently, carelessly, and without restraint, and where the dubious intentions, cruel rage, and introduction of the Turks have not been met with good intentions and braver and more serious counteraction than has hitherto been done.

1) Walch: "Speier".

that some welfare or progress of the Christians could no longer be hoped for, but that one Christian country and region after another would be lost, and that in a short time they would be completely subdued and exterminated by the Turks.

(9) Now, however, in Her Majesty's absence, the concerns and affairs of the Empire, and most especially the unmistakable annoyance of the Turks, and how to counter them, have held several imperial congresses and assemblies, at which Her Imperial Majesty would have liked to appear in her own person in her time, but has always been prevented from doing so because of the troublesome encounters of her enemies and repugnance. Her Majesty would have liked to appear in person in her own time, but was prevented from doing so due to the troublesome encounters of her enemies and repugnance, as her Majesty has indicated in part by her letter and also verbally by her appointed commissioners in the next Imperial Diet and elsewhere, and has been excused for such absence. With which of her Majesty's enemies and adversaries her Majesty has nevertheless united and come to terms, for the sake of the Empire and the common Christian good, so that these complaints of the Turk and others may be the more strongly rejected, and has not considered their benefit, but has left a considerable part of hers for the promotion and confirmation of peace. Has also inquired about this, when her Majesty the Turk's invasion and other above-mentioned ingrown objections in the holy realm appeared more burdensome than ever before, has not wanted to forgive their arrival for a longer time, and has thus departed from the aforementioned hereditary kingdoms, lands and people; has, not with little danger of the sea, in Italy, where at that time still the several part of her Majesty the Turk was an enemy and an objectionable person, has taken up residence in the Holy Land. and also, by the grace of the Almighty, restored peace and unity to the affected Italian lands, which her Majesty has somewhat prevented, so that her arrival at this Imperial Diet has so far been denied; as her Majesty has recently made known to the Electors, Princes, and Estates such prevention and the reasons for it.

(10) And after Her Imperial Majesty has found that at the nearer assemblies and imperial congresses some notes and records have been drawn up of a substantial and persistent help against the Turks, which has been sent beforehand to all the estates of the realm, so that they may consider and discuss it with their subjects, so that such a persistent help might certainly have been decided upon at the next imperial congress following it: but on account of such help nothing is necessary.

neither acted nor resolved. And only on several occasions urgent assistance was undertaken and ordered, which urgent assistance was granted by the estates at Worms at the Imperial Diet, only from her Majesty's assigned request, and thus her own money, for her campaign in Rome to attain the imperial crown. This help was granted by the Estates of Worms at the Imperial Diet, which Her Majesty nevertheless, regardless of her own disadvantage, extended and allowed to follow for the benefit of the Holy Empire and Christendom and rescue against the Turks, even mildly, as mentioned above.

11. And because this article, which concerns the urgent and persevering help, is the most important, not only for the holy kingdom, but also for common Christianity, and because the delay in this is very serious, and every hour of delay may bring disaster, considering the grave and threatening danger, and that the insatiable and scanty tyrant of Christian blood does not celebrate, but with daily and persistent damage harasses and disputes Christendom, and his purpose is ever to bring it under his power and finally to destroy it: so is J. K. M. s friendly and gracious request to the princes, princes and the other estates of the realm, who therefore want to take up this matter of persistent help without delay, and, as the occasion and the necessity require, to apply it to the above-mentioned written and handed over note, or in other suitable and expedient ways, so that the unavoidable and urgent resistance may one day be arranged, ordered, raised, and maintained with strong force and earnestness, shooting warriors in persistent exercise, certain entertainment, and stately execution and emphasis. In order that the same Turk may, by the gracious grant of the Almighty, turn and break his plots and plans of further rage against Christendom, that the Christian empire, kingdom, country, cities, castles and towns which have been wrested from him may be again conquered, and that he, the Turk, may at last feel the Christian defending hand in his lands as well, to compensate for his manifold damage and rage, I. K. M. has decreed that in this case, the Christian hand of the Turkish Empire must be given to him. In this case, her papal sanctity gives her good comfort to advise and help with everything that will be in her papal sanctity's power, as she will then also do, and to refrain from anything that may benefit the present affliction.

(13) So also Her Imperial Majesty wants to be satisfied. Majesty, on the fact that she has not fulfilled the promise made by the common estates of the Empire at the Diet of Worms for her Majesty's accession to Rome and the attainment of her imperial crown. and the attainment of her imperial coronation.

to such necessary work and salvation against the Turks as above mentioned, and afterwards to receive her Imperial Crown at her own not inconsiderable expense. Crown, at their own not inconsiderable expense, also without regard to the fact that their Majest. without having had so many other considerable, excellent costs and expenditures, which amount to many millions of gold, has graciously offered and granted, with all her kingdom's and country's wealth, to keep and show herself so imperial, Christian, and as is due in such a case, that males, high and low, shall publicly feel that in this, with comforting, brave, and respectable help of her K. M., nothing shall lack nor be lacking. M. nothing would lack nor go astray. Her Majesty is also in no doubt that her dear brother, the King of Hungary and Bohemia, who is now the rampart of common Christendom and especially of the German nation against the raging Turks, will prove and hold himself no less comforting, brave and helpful with his own person, all his and his kingdoms, lands and people's fortunes; as he has also done so far, which has also been quite well shot and come to good places.

(13) In addition, His Majesty is confident that all other Christian kings, princes, and potentates will, according to their common need, also keep up this Christian work in a proper, Christian, and good manner, who will then be requested to do so in part by Their Majesties, and will also receive it in a needy manner.

II.

Second proposition point, concerning religion.

Concerning the confusion and discord of the holy faith and the Christian religion, Her Imperial Majesty, soon after receiving her royal crown and accepting her reign in the Holy Empire, heard with a heavy heart how the same confusion and discord had arisen in some places in the Holy Land. Majesty, soon after receiving her royal crown and accepting her government in the Holy Empire, heard with a heavy heart how the same confusion and division had arisen and grown in many places in the Empire of the German Nation. as Roman Emperor, Bailiff and Protector of the Christian faith, religion and church, in consideration of her office, at the first of her Imperial Diet at Worms, to meet the same complaints with temporal understanding, and before they took further root, were prevented and rejected, had diligent consideration, and thus for the rejection of such confusion and division, with the knowledge, counsel and consent of princes, princes and other common estates, issued an open edict and spread it throughout the empire.

of the complete oversight, where this was obediently complied with and lived, such error and grievance would not have been so far torn down. But regardless of all such most gracious, most necessary and well-considered action, Her Majesty has not heard and heard with any small complaint of her mind how since then in more ways the said most gracious action has gone against and contrary to. This has resulted not only in the diminishment and contempt of their imperial majesty, but also of God the Almighty and His commandments, and 1) in apostasy from the superior authorities ordered by God, which then 2) all has been to the detriment of the estates themselves, and not otherwise than to robbery, fire and war, and all that which may have come to the highest displeasure of God the Almighty and contrary to the holy faith, also otherwise to ruin and death; as this has unfortunately occurred in more ways in the German nation, especially in the recent common peasant revolt, also with the rebaptism and other things that have occurred as a result, and may still occur, occur, and occur. Therefore, and now her Majesty, with the great grievance of her mind, has found that such confusion and discord has increased and grown more and more burdensome, and that the manifold, diligent, and most diligent actions that have been practiced here and there have not yet been left alone or settled, her Majesty has considered that these confusions could not be more effectively nor more salutary in the end than by her Majesty's own presence, and that they could be brought back into unity. And therefore, out of innate kindness and gentleness, this path has been taken by virtue of the tender, the final hope, that it will have a favorable reputation with all those who understand, and that it will manfully move and guide that all things be turned around and turned to the best, so that Her Majesty may persevere and remain in her gracious intention, and furthermore, may carry out and accomplish what may be beneficial and good for all beings. And therefore Her Majesty is graciously pleased to take up this matter, to deliberate and to decide how, in addition to the aforementioned averting of the troublesome burden and invasion of Christendom by the Turkish invader, the aforementioned confusion and discord in the holy faith and the Christian religion may and should also be acted upon and decided upon; in a very friendly, gracious, and Desiring with the utmost diligence and earnestness that Princes, Princes, and the common estates be equal in all this, as much and as this affects each one and is due to him, and that for the advancement of things each one, according to the ability of their Majesties, be able to exercise his discretion and opinion. For the furtherance of the matter, each of them, according to the authority of their Majesty's writings, will set forth and deliver in writing [his] discretion, opinion, and opinion, of the confusion and discord touched upon, and also of the abuses which the clergy may have against the secular, and again the secular against the clergy, or among themselves, or by one another, so that this confusion and discord may be the better heard and considered, and also the more speedily brought back to a unanimous Christian being, and thus settled.

952 Some scholars' concerns for a papist prince, in which they show that it is necessary first to examine the point of religion, and then to deliberate on the help against the Turks.

From Cölestin, Vol. I, p. 122. In Walch with wrong heading: "Bedenken eines Gelehrten, worin erweise" 2c.

(1) To the question: Which of the articles presented by Her Imperial Majesty [whether of help against the Turks or of] 3) disunity of Christian faith and religion? 3) of the disunity of the Christian faith and religion, of every man's opinion, delusion, and belief, and of the abuses in the church which exist between the ecclesiastical and secular princes, to be written in German and Latin and presented to Her Imperial Majesty. We answer, after having deliberated on the matter, thus:

2. although in kaiserl. Majesty. The first thing mentioned is the tax to be levied against the Turks, and it is added that it is then intended to act on the basis of faith: Experience has taught us that as often as help against the Turks has been spoken of and acted upon at previous imperial congresses, the Lutheran princes and their envoys have never consented to such a request before they had been sufficiently assured that, on account of religion and the Gospel, no displeasure would befall them or any violence would be inflicted. From this it is easy to infer that, if one were first to begin to withdraw from the tax and from the institution against

1) Walch correctly added this "and".

2) In the old editions: "the that".

3) Added by us.

The Turks are to act and to conclude, but not how the religious disagreement is to be settled: so nothing praiseworthy and fruitful will be concluded and brought about.

(3) Therefore it seems to us to be very helpful for the advancement of the cause, if it can be brought about with their imperial majesty that first the matter of religion is settled, and the dispute about the faith is settled. But since some ecclesiastical and secular princes will write down their voice and opinion before your sovereignty, it seems that others, and especially Lutherans, will also ask and insist that the discussion of religion and Christian faith be undertaken first; whereupon your sovereigns will also have the opportunity to accede to such a request.

(4) If, however, all the others desire and agree that a fairly permanent and lasting measure should first be taken against the Turks, your Highness will be able, for many and very important reasons, to present, request, and urge that both matters be dealt with in one and the same treatise, and that council be held on them in due course, according to the necessity of the matter. This seems to be easily done for this reason, since the matter of religion and faith is discussed in writings, and the matter of aid and taxation against the Turks is discussed by the Imperial Majesty and princes, or by the Pope. Majesty and princes, or certain people appointed for this purpose, must necessarily be acted upon.

(5) Concerning every opinion and delusion in faith, your sovereigns can answer this with the utmost confidence and a good conscience, and assert that your sovereigns, before and after the edict issued by the Imperial Majesty, have shown obedience to the Roman Church and the Apostolic See in everything up to this time with the utmost diligence and zeal. Majesty's edict, your sovereigns can answer this with a clear conscience, and assert that before and after the imperial edict, your sovereigns have shown obedience to the Roman church and the apostolic see in everything with the greatest diligence and zeal, and have also earnestly enjoined and commanded their subjects to do and keep the same; for this reason they have also endured much persecution, and have incurred the scorn and ridicule of almost all men. Nevertheless, her daughter had little regard for such ill-minded ridicule and blasphemy, and held that all that the catholic, holy, Christian, and Roman church ordered and decreed must be observed with earnestness and kept above it, as had been held for so long a time, and had been in godly and praiseworthy use, and her daughter had received and handed down, as it were, from hand to hand, from her ancestors. - (6) She had kept and done all this the more diligently mainly because her imperial family had been the first to keep it.

Majesty, by a public edict issued at the Diet of Worms, commanded and enjoined all to observe the same; to which also her sovereigns do not in the slightest degree contravene, but wish to maintain the old laudable order and manner instituted in the church, together with Imperial Majesty's command, until such time as the Catholic and Christian Church, and its united concilio (or spiritual assembly), and her Imperial Majesty's order, are in harmony. Majesty's command, until the Catholic and Christian Church, and its unanimous Concilio (or spiritual assembly), and Her Imperial Majesty, have done something better here. Majesty, something better would be agreed upon and taught in this matter.

(7) Concerning the matter of abuses, their rulers may answer that it may happen that in the Catholic Church some abuses are found among the ecclesiastical and temporal princes; but why their rulers cannot present them written in a Latin and German script, these are the causes, because until now they have not perceived much of the kind in their territories and dominions; moreover, their rulers cannot present them in a Latin and German script. But the reason why she could not hand over and present her letters written in a Latin and German script would be that up to the present time she has not perceived much of the kind in her territories and dominions; especially since from her youth her letters have not been inclined to change or innovate anything in the spiritual and secular state. Should it be admitted, however, that some abuses have crept into the church, they would certainly be written down and handed over by those who had already separated themselves from the church. Maj. would gladly do everything that could be reasonably done and indicated, so that by a general concilium (or church assembly) the abuses would be corrected and abolished from the church in every possible way.

953 Speech of the Papal Legate, Laurentius Campegius, to the Estates of the Empire, June 24, 1530.

From Cölestin, Vol. I, p. 124. - The time given by us is according to the information of Justus Jonas in the 957th Documente. Walch has the 20th of June.

Translated from the Latin by L. A. Tittel.

(1) If, Emperor Carl, most Christian King Ferdinand, and you other noble, great princes, of what rank, dignities, and honors you are, the matter of which I am about to speak were mine, and not yours; if it were something peculiar, and not something common; if it concerned the welfare of only one, and not of all: then I should like to fear that Their Majesties and Their Serene Highnesses, if I spoke of it, would not speak of it according to dignities, but only to a few,
